STATEMENT OF JURISDICTION

This Court has jurisdiction over this appeal pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1292 because it is an appeal of an order that denied Innovation Law Lab's motion for limited intervention. Innovation Law Lab may appeal the nationwide scope of the preliminary injunction together with the denied motion for limited intervention. DeOtte v. Nevada, 20 F.4th 1055, 1066-67 (5th Cir. 2021) (holding denied intervenors may appeal intervention and merits simultaneously).

Innovation Law Lab timely appealed by filing its notice of appeal within 60 days of the district court's orders of May 13, 2022 (limited intervention) and May 20, 2022 (nationwide injunction) in a case where a federal agency is a party.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

ISSUES PRESENTED

1. Whether the district court erred in denying Innovation Law Lab's timely motion for limited intervention as of right where Innovation Law Lab has a unique protectable interest—to ensure any injunction is appropriately tailored to run only in Plaintiff States—that Federal Defendants do not adequately represent.
2. Whether the district court erred in issuing a nationwide injunction where nationwide relief was not justified by the record evidence nor the need for uniformity in immigration law where the program at issue is a public health policy that has been characterized by dis-uniformity.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

For over two years, the CDC's Title 42 order has blocked access to asylum at the southern border by authorizing the summary expulsion of individuals who lack proper entry documents without allowing them an opportunity to present their claims for protection. The order, which was entered pursuant to public health law, allegedly seeks to mitigate risks posed by the COVID-19 pandemic, but the claimed public health justification for the order has been repeatedly debunked. After Federal Defendants announced their plans to terminate the Title 42 order and resume normal processing at the border in May 2022, Plaintiff States—only two of which share an international border with Mexico—sued to keep it in place, seeking a preliminary injunction blocking the termination order on a nationwide basis. Federal Defendants have defended their right to terminate Title 42 generally, but have failed to oppose the nationwide scope of any relief. The district court granted Plaintiff States' motion for a nationwide injunction, relying on two primary justifications: that the operation of Title 42 along any part of the border would harm the Plaintiff States; and that immigration law must be uniform nationwide. As explained below, neither rationale justifies the extraordinary relief the district court ordered.

Innovation Law Lab ("Law Lab"), a legal services organization that serves people seeking asylum along the entire southern border, has sought to intervene in this case to defend against the nationwide injunction blocking the termination of the Title 42 expulsion order in California and New Mexico. Although Federal Defendants explicitly declined to argue, even in the alternative, that the injunction be limited to the Plaintiff States, the district court denied Law Lab's motion for limited intervention on the ground that Federal Defendants adequately represented Law Lab's interests. The district court issued its nationwide injunction shortly thereafter.

The district court erred in denying Law Lab's motion to intervene on the grounds of adequate representation. In reality, the federal government has never sought to obtain the relief that Law Lab seeks: a limitation on the injunction that would prevent it from operating in California and New Mexico, neither of which are parties to this case. Indeed, the district court interpreted the government's failure to seek that relief as opposition to it, but inexplicably found its interests aligned with Law Lab's anyway. Under this Court's rules strongly favoring intervention in this context, this was error.

The district court also erred in issuing a nationwide injunction where the justifications it relied on—namely, the record evidence and the alleged need for a uniform immigration policy—are deeply flawed.

Not a shred of record evidence supports the factual premise for nationwide relief: that the termination of Title 42 in non-plaintiff states, including California and New Mexico, will harm the Plaintiff States. In contrast, there is no dispute that the district court's order causes serious harm to many non-parties who will never set foot in the Plaintiff States, let alone cause them cognizable injury. The district court ignored the gaping holes in the evidentiary record, and entirely failed to balance the equities of non-parties—people and states—harmed by its injunction.

The district court's rationale based on the alleged need for uniformity in immigration policy is equally faulty. That reasoning ignores the fact that the government has never justified the Title 42 order as immigration policy; rather, the legal authority for it derives entirely from public health law. And as virtually everyone living in this country knows, the public health policies in response to the COVID-19 pandemic have varied drastically from region to region. Moreover, the rationale based on the alleged need for uniformity also ignores that, in practice, the Title 42 order has been characterized by dis-uniformity, just like other policies governing asylum processes at the border.

Given the inadequate record evidence and the nature of the policy at issue, the district court committed grave legal error in ordering a nationwide injunction. Assuming injunctive relief was warranted at all, the district court should have tailored that relief to run only in the states that are parties to this action. As Chief Judge Sutton recently explained in a concurring opinion reversing a nationwide injunction in a case about another immigration policy, "[e]ven if it turns out that the … States in this case are entitled to relief, it is difficult to see why an injunction applicable only to them would not do the trick." Arizona v. Biden, No. 22-3272, 2022 WL 2437870, at *14 (6th Cir. July 5, 2022) (Sutton, C.J., concurring); see also Dep't of Homeland Sec. v. New York, 140 S. Ct. 599, 600 (2020) (Gorsuch, J., concurring); Trump v. Hawaii, 138 S. Ct. 2392, 2425-29 (2018) (Thomas, J., concurring). Such is the case here.

Because the district court erred in issuing them, this Court should reverse the district court orders denying Law Lab's motion for limited intervention and granting Plaintiff States' motion for a nationwide preliminary injunction.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

BACKGROUND

Before the implementation of Title 42, individuals apprehended at or near the southern border who did not have proper entry documents were typically processed pursuant to Title 8 of the U.S. Code, including by being subjected to expedited removal under Immigration and Nationality Act § 235 or full removal proceedings under § 240.[1] See 8 U.S.C. §§ 1225(b)(1), 1229a. Individuals subjected to expedited removal who expressed a fear of persecution or torture were given a Credible Fear Interview to assess whether they had a significant possibility of establishing eligibility for asylum. See 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(1)(A)(i). Individuals who passed the Credible Fear Interview were placed into full removal proceedings, where they were permitted to present their cases before an immigration judge. See 8 U.S.C. §§ 1229a(c)(4), 1225(b)(1)(B)(ii); 8 C.F.R. §§ 208.30, 235.3. Individuals who passed the Credible Fear Interview remained in the U.S. pending completion of removal proceedings. Some were jailed by Immigration and Customs Enforcement ("ICE"), while others were released pursuant to conditions of bond or parole. See 8 U.S.C. §§ 1182(d)(5); 1226(a).

That process was changed at the beginning of the COVID-19 pandemic, when the CDC and the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services ("HHS")

[1] Following the January 2019 implementation of the Migrant Protection Protocols, nearly 70,000 people who would have been subject to the expedited removal and Credible Fear Interview process were instead put directly in § 240 proceedings and forced to wait in Mexico for the duration of their asylum proceedings. implemented Title 42, an emergency Interim Final Rule that largely suspends asylum procedures at the southern border due to claimed risks posed by COVID-19. 85 Fed. Reg. 16,559 (Mar. 24, 2020) ("Title 42"). Concurrently, the CDC Director ordered the "suspen[sion] [of] the introduction" of certain individuals seeking to enter the United States via land borders without entry documents, whose entry is otherwise contrary to law, or those who seek to unlawfully enter between ports of entry. 85 Fed. Reg. 16,567 (Mar. 24, 2020). On September 11, 2020, the CDC and HHS published the final rule, which took effect on October 13, 2020. 85 Fed. Reg. 56,424 (Sept. 11, 2020) (to be codified at 42 C.F.R. pt. 71). The CDC renewed Title 42 after the final rule took effect. 85 Fed. Reg. 65,806 (Oct. 16, 2020).

Customs and Border Protection began implementing Title 42 by halting all processing of asylum-seeking individuals at ports of entry, and U.S. Border Patrol began expelling most Mexican, Guatemalan, Honduran, and Salvadoran families and adults to Mexico without an opportunity to seek asylum.[2] Since Title 42 has been in effect, Border Patrol has expelled individuals of other nationalities to Mexico or their countries of origin without an opportunity to seek asylum.[3]

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Both federal courts and the CDC itself have limited Title 42's scope during the two years that it has been in effect. Courts have enjoined its implementation against particularly vulnerable groups, including children and families. See P.J.E.S. ex rel. Escobar Francisco v. Wolf, 502 F. Supp. 3d 492 (D.D.C. 2020); P.J.E.S. ex rel. Escobar Francisco v. Pekoske, 2021 WL 9100552 (D.C. Cir. Jan. 29, 2021); Huisha-Huisha v. Mayorkas, 560 F. Supp. 3d 146 (D.D.C. 2021), aff'd and remanded by 27 F.4th 718 (D.C. Cir. 2022). Later, CDC orders exempted unaccompanied children from the application of Title 42, see 86 Fed. Reg. 38,717 (July 22, 2021), and then terminated Title 42 as to unaccompanied children.[4]

On April 1, 2022, the CDC Director announced the termination of Title 42, effective May 23, 2022 ("Termination Order"). ROA.140-169. On April 3, 2022, three states (the "Plaintiff States") filed this lawsuit challenging the Termination Order. ROA.97-138. On April 27, 2022, the district court granted Plaintiff States' motion for a nationwide temporary restraining order enjoining implementation of the Termination Order. ROA.1972-1975. On May 5, 2022, Plaintiff States amended their complaint to include other states as plaintiffs. ROA.3156-3225. Only two Plaintiff States actually share a border with Mexico: Arizona and Texas.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

On May 9, 2022, Law Lab, a legal services organization that serves asylum-seeking individuals along the southern border in states including California and New Mexico, along with two asylum-seeking individuals who were blocked by the Title 42 order, moved to intervene for the limited purpose of raising an alternative defense to the nationwide preliminary injunction Plaintiff States sought. ROA.3528-3558. Plaintiff States and Federal Defendants opposed intervention as of right and permissive intervention. ROA.3665-3676, 3678-3689. On May 13, 2022, at the preliminary injunction hearing, the district court orally denied intervention based on its finding that Federal Defendants adequately represented Proposed Intervenors' interests, without allowing Proposed Intervenors an opportunity to present argument on the issue or otherwise reply to the parties' respective oppositions to its intervention motion, ROA.3696-3697, but invited Proposed Intervenors to present oral argument and submit a brief on the scope of the injunction as amici curiae, which Proposed Intervenors did, ROA.3731-3751.

On May 20, 2022, the district court granted Plaintiff States' motion for a nationwide preliminary injunction. ROA.3758-3804, 3852-3853. Both Federal Defendants and Law Lab filed timely notices of appeal. Law Lab sought a stay of the nationwide scope of the injunction before the district court and this Court, both of which were denied. Order, Louisiana v. CDC, No. 6:22-CV-00885-RRS-CBW (W.D. La. May 27, 2022); Order Denying Stay Application, Louisiana v. CDC, No. 22-30303 (5th Cir. June 16, 2022). Federal Defendants declined to seek a stay of the nationwide preliminary injunction.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

SUMMARY OF THE ARGUMENT

The district court clearly erred in denying Law Lab's motion for limited intervention. Contrary to the district court's summary finding, Federal Defendants do not adequately represent Law Lab's concrete, protectable interests in this litigation. The outcome of this case will affect whether and how Law Lab can fulfill its mission and expend its resources in service of people seeking asylum along the southern border, including at the California and New Mexico borders.

The district court's ruling to the contrary ignores this Court's precedent governing intervention; this Court's decisions in Texas v. United States and Sierra Club v. Epsy require reversal. In Texas, this Court held that even when the government defends a policy benefiting proposed intervenors, the government's interest may still diverge from intervenors' due to the government's overriding interest in "expansive… executive authority" and "efficiently enforcing the immigration laws." 805 F.3d 653, 663 (5th Cir. 2015). Similarly, in Sierra Club, this Court found that the government's need to represent the "broad public interest" did not adequately represent the economic concerns of groups representing the timber industry, thus requiring intervention. 18 F.3d 1202, 1208 (5th Cir. 1994).

Here, Federal Defendants do not adequately represent Law Lab's interests. This is most clearly demonstrated by Federal Defendants' failure to seek the relief for which Law Lab sought limited intervention: a limitation on the geographic scope of the injunction blocking Federal Defendants' Termination Order. Indeed, the district court interpreted Federal Defendants' decision not to present any argument for limiting the scope of the preliminary injunction as agreement with the injunction's nationwide scope. ROA.3803 ("The Defendants do not appear to contest the entry of a nation-wide preliminary injunction …."). Thus, the difference between Federal Defendants and Law Lab is not merely about litigation strategy. Law Lab asserts a unique defense to the nationwide aspect of the injunction, supported by arguments for remedial tailoring that no other party has advanced, the results of which would lead to a unique result that Federal Defendants have not pursued. Such differing objectives and divergence of interests clearly satisfy the inadequate representation requirement of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 24.

The district court also erred in issuing a nationwide injunction. That sweeping remedy is inconsistent with the district court's equitable powers and unsupported by the record, which did not contain any evidence establishing that the termination of Title 42 in non-plaintiff states, including California and New Mexico, will harm the Plaintiff States, let alone enough evidence to justify extraordinary nationwide relief. In contrast, it is undisputed that the district court's order imposes significant burdens on people who will never even enter the Plaintiff States, let alone cause them harm, because it bars access to the asylum system for people who have no intention of ever leaving California or New Mexico. The imbalance in the record on this point is striking. It contains sworn declarations of individuals barred from accessing the asylum system who have no intention of leaving California, see ROA.3559-3563 ¶ 15, 3569-3573 ¶ 20, but not a single document concerning harm to Plaintiff States caused by the termination of Title 42, let alone enough to justify a nationwide injunction.

The nationwide scope of the injunction in this case also cannot be justified by the alleged need for uniformity in immigration policy because Title 42 is, at its core, a public health policy. While it of course has dramatic effects on immigration policy, the Title 42 order has been justified only on public health grounds, and it derives its authority from public health law. See 85 Fed. Reg. 16559, 16,560-16,563. Plaintiffs have cited no authority requiring nationwide uniformity in public health policy, and COVID-19 responses have never been uniform nationwide. Indeed, states have taken different approaches to how COVID-19 rules should be implemented.

Moreover, even if the Title 42 order could be justified by reference to immigration policy, that still would not support nationwide relief here. The Title 42 order itself, like virtually every border immigration policy, has not been implemented uniformly across the entire Southern border. Instead, it has been characterized by disuniformity—implemented differently in different regions based on various considerations.

The district court correctly declined to rely on the Administrative Procedure Act ("APA") as providing independent support for its nationwide injunction. Courts retain equitable authority—indeed, they are obligated—to order remedies that are appropriately tailored to the needs of the cases before them. Put simply, the district court here was not required to issue nationwide relief simply because Plaintiff States present a claim under the APA.[5] This is entirely consistent with this Court's recent [5] Law Lab has sought intervention exclusively to defend against the scope of injunctive relief in this case, but it bears noting that recent Supreme Court decisions interpreting 8 U.S.C. § 1252(f)(1) to deprive lower courts of jurisdiction to enjoin or restrain the federal government's enforcement of immigration statutes call into question the propriety of injunctions like the one entered on behalf of Plaintiff States more broadly. See Garland v. Aleman Gonzalez, 142 S. Ct. 2057 (2022); see also Biden v. Texas, 142 S. Ct. 2528 (2022).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

decision in Texas v. United States, in which this Court clearly distinguished between vacatur under the APA and injunctive relief like that ordered below, expressly declining to consider whether nationwide injunctive relief would have been appropriate in that case. 2022 WL 2466786, at *5 (5th Cir. 2022).

For these reasons, this Court should reverse the order denying Law Lab's motion for limited intervention and vacate the order granting Plaintiff States' motion for a nationwide injunction.

ARGUMENT

I. Standard of review

A ruling denying intervention as of right is reviewed de novo. Edwards v. City of Houston, 78 F.3d 983, 995 (5th Cir. 1996). "Although the movant bears the burden of establishing its right to intervene, Rule 24 is to be liberally construed. Federal courts should allow intervention where no one would be hurt and the greater justice could be attained." Texas, 805 F.3d at 656–57 (cleaned up).

An order granting a preliminary injunction is reviewed for abuse of discretion, but "[a]s to each element of the district court's preliminary-injunction analysis … findings of fact are subject to a clearly-erroneous standard of review, while conclusions of law are subject to broad review and will be reversed if incorrect." Texas v. United States, 809 F.3d 134, 150 (5th Cir.), as revised (Nov. 25, 2015) (citation omitted).

II. Law Lab has organizational standing to appeal the nationwide scope of the preliminary injunction.

Law Lab may appeal the nationwide scope of the preliminary injunction together with the denied motion for limited intervention. See DeOtte v. Nevada, 20

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

F.4th 1055, 1066-67 (5th Cir. 2021) (holding denied intervenors may appeal intervention and merits simultaneously). Law Lab has suffered (and will continue to suffer) harm from the nationwide scope of the injunction, which establishes its standing to appeal. Id. at 1070 ("Standing to appeal requires injury from the judgment of the lower court," and requires appellant to show injury in fact, causal connection, and redressability); see also OCA-Greater Houston v. Texas, 867 F.3d 604, 610-12 (5th Cir. 2017) (voting rights organization satisfied injury-in-fact requirement for standing purposes where it was required to divert resources to explain challenged voter law changes to people with limited English proficiency, which frustrated and complicated its routine community outreach activities).

Law Lab's organizational mission is, inter alia, to advance migrant and refugee justice, including by providing legal services to individuals seeking asylum along the California and New Mexico borders with Mexico. ROA.3580-3588 ¶¶ 2, 10. Title 42's wholesale suspension of the asylum system at the border has frustrated Law Lab's mission "on multiple levels." Id. ¶¶ 14-16. Title 42 has "stalled certain core aspects" of Law Lab's mission-related programming, id. ¶ 14, including by impeding its ability to engage in collaborative legal representation projects in California and New Mexico, id. ¶ 16. In addition, Law Lab has had to interrupt its routine programming and divert resources to meet the needs of individuals on the Mexican side of the California-Mexico border who are blocked from seeking asylum or have been expelled without the opportunity to undergo even a preliminary fear-based interview. This includes distributing accurate information and explaining the options that such individuals have. Id. ¶¶ 20-21. Law Lab has also had to "respond to a flood of inquiries and community uncertainty." Id. ¶ 22.

The nationwide injunction extended the life of Law Lab's harms, and has already worsened them by creating yet another layer of uncertainty and opportunity for harm to asylum-seeking individuals that Law Lab must now address. Id. ¶¶ 20-21. "If Title 42's termination does not take effect," this "would compel Law Lab … to continue diverting resources to combat another prime opportunity for misinformation and exploitation of asylum-seeking individuals on the border." Id. ¶ 20. But for the nationwide injunction, Law Lab would have been permitted to resume its services to individuals seeking asylum at the southern border in California and New Mexico on May 23, 2022. ROA.318-347. The nationwide scope of the injunction thus stymied Law Lab's operations by blocking access to the asylum system for individuals who intend to seek asylum along the southern border in California and New Mexico even if they have no intent to reside in Plaintiff States. ROA.3580-3588 ¶¶ 10, 12, 13. An order tailoring the scope of this injunction and allowing it to run only in the Plaintiff States' geographic boundaries would permit Law Lab to resume its mission-driven work in states that are not parties to this litigation. Thus, Law Lab can establish injury in fact, causal connection, and redressability in support of its standing to appeal the geographic scope of the preliminary injunction.

Law Lab's concrete examples of resource diversion and mission frustration fall squarely within the injuries this Court has held sufficient for organizational standing. See OCA-Greater Houston, 867 F.3d at 610-12. Below, Plaintiff States argued that NAACP v. City of Kyle forecloses Law Lab's standing. 626 F.3d 233, 238 (5th Cir. 2010) ("[T]he mere fact that an organization redirects some of its resources to litigation and legal counseling in response to actions or inactions of another party is insufficient to impart standing upon the organization." (quoting La. ACORN Fair Hous. v. LeBlanc, 211 F.3d 298, 305 (5th Cir. 2000) (emphasis added)). But this argument ignores the fact that Law Lab does not rely on its litigation in this or any other case challenging Title 42 to establish standing. The reality on the ground is that Law Lab's mission-driven work, which includes providing direct services to asylum-seeking individuals in California and New Mexico, has been stalled, and it has been forced to move part of its U.S.-based work to Mexico. Having to shift one's services in this way, including to a foreign country, is plainly a sufficient interest for purposes of standing or intervention.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

III. The district court erred in denying intervention as of right.

The district court erroneously denied Law Lab's motion for limited intervention. It did so without issuing a written denial, instead orally explaining that Federal Defendants adequately represent Proposed Intervenors' interests and declining to give Proposed Intervenors an opportunity to present argument on their motion. ROA.4014:6-4016:5. That ruling contravened this Court's governing law.

Rule 24 allows nonparties to move to intervene as of right. Fed. R. Civ. P. 24. "Although the movant bears the burden of establishing its right to intervene, Rule 24 is to be liberally construed." Wal-Mart Stores, Inc. v. Tex. Alcoholic Beverage Comm'n, 834 F.3d 562, 565 (5th Cir. 2016) (citation omitted). Intervention should be permitted "where no one would be hurt and greater justice could be attained." Sierra Club, 18 F.3d at 1205 (citation omitted).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Law Lab demonstrated that it is entitled to intervene as of right by showing (1) that its application to intervene was timely; (2) that it has an interest related to the policy that is the subject of the action; (3) that the disposition of the action may "as a practical matter, impair or impede [its] ability to protect that interest"; and (4) that its interest is inadequately represented by existing parties to the suit. Fed. R. Civ. P. 24(a); see Wal-Mart, 834 F.3d at 565 (citation omitted).

A. Law Lab's motion was timely.

When considering whether a motion to intervene is timely, courts should consider four factors: (1) the length of time during which the would-be intervenor actually knew or should have known of his interest in the case before he petitioned for leave to intervene; (2) the extent of the prejudice that the existing parties may suffer as a result of failure of the proposed intervenor to apply sooner; (3) the extent of the prejudice that the proposed intervenor may suffer if the petition is denied; and (4) any unusual circumstances militating for or against the determination of whether the application is timely. Stallworth v. Monsanto Co., 558 F.2d 257, 264-66 (5th Cir. 1977). Law Lab satisfied the timeliness factors—an issue no party contested. See ROA.3665-3675, 3678-3689.

Law Lab filed its motion for limited intervention less than two weeks after Federal Defendants first made clear that Law Lab's "interests would no longer be protected by the original parties" because Federal Defendants did not intend to argue that any relief the district court ordered should have been limited geographically in their response to Plaintiff States' motion for a preliminary injunction. Sierra Club, 18 F.3d at 1206; ROA.3055-3109, ROA.3528-3558. Because an earlier motion would have run the risk of being "premature" and "wast[ing] judicial resources," no party was prejudiced by the timing of Law Lab's motion. Sierra Club, 18 F.3d at 1206. Indeed, at the same time that Law Lab moved for intervention, it included briefing on the geographic scope of the injunction in order to ensure its motion would cause no undue delay in the proceedings. ROA.3528-3558. Finally, Law Lab made clear it would be prejudiced if the motion was denied as it properly predicted that absent intervention, no party would pursue geographic limitations to any relief the district court ordered.

Thus, Law Lab's motion for limited intervention was timely.

B. Law Lab has legally protectable interests in this case.

Proposed intervenors must show a "direct, substantial, legally protectable interest in the proceedings." Texas, 805 F.3d at 657-58 (citation omitted). "[A]n interest that is concrete, personalized, and legally protectable is sufficient to support intervention." Id. at 658. In other words, "the inquiry turns on whether the intervenor has a stake in the matter that goes beyond a generalized preference that the case come out a certain way." Id. at 657. Intervenors need not have an interest that would give rise to standing: "[A]n interest is sufficient if it is of the type that the law deems worthy of protection, even if the intervenor does not have an enforceable legal entitlement or would not have standing to pursue her own claim." Wal-Mart, 834 F.3d at 566 (cleaned up); see also DeOtte, 20 F.4th at 1068.

As described in Section II, Law Lab's organizational mission is to advance migrant and refugee justice, in part by providing legal services to individuals who seek asylum at the border under Title 8, including near the California and New Mexico borders with Mexico. ROA.3580-3588 ¶¶ 2, 10. That mission has been frustrated during the period that Title 42 has barred access to asylum at the border. Id. ¶ 16. In addition, Law Lab has had to divert resources from its routine programming to meet the needs of individuals on the Mexican side of the border who are blocked from seeking access to asylum, including by distributing and explaining accurate information about the options that such individuals have. Id. ¶¶ 20-21. This case will therefore determine the extent to which it can fulfill its mission and also dictate how it will expend resources. That establishes Law Lab's protectable interests in the case's outcome. Cf. OCA-Greater Houston, 867 F.3d at 610-12.

C. This case will impair or impede Law Lab's ability to protect its concrete interests.

Once a proposed intervenor establishes a protectable interest, it must "demonstrate that disposition of that action may, as a practical matter, impair or impede [its] ability to protect that interest." Brumfield v. Dodd, 749 F.3d 339, 344 (5th Cir. 2014) (citation omitted). The impairment must be "practical," not merely "theoretical." Id. For example, in Brumfield, the Fifth Circuit held that parents of children receiving school vouchers through a program that was challenged in litigation could intervene under Rule 24 because the lawsuit's outcome might have put some parents at risk of losing vouchers or their full range of school choices. Id.

Law Lab's ability to protect its interests in serving people seeking asylum at the southern border, including in California and New Mexico—and thus its ability to fulfill its mission and expend its resources—has been and will continue to be impaired by the outcomes of this case. As discussed, Law Lab has had to divert resources from its routine programming to meet the needs of individuals on the Mexican side of the California-Mexico border, including by distributing and explaining accurate information about asylum and responding to uncertainty about the shifting state of the law. The nationwide injunction has both extended the life of those harms and worsened them by creating yet another layer of uncertainty and harm to Law Lab and asylum-seeking individuals.

Law Lab's interests are protectable, and the outcome of this case has impeded and will continue to impede Law Lab's ability to protect those interests.

D. Federal Defendants do not adequately represent Law Lab's protectable interests.

The burden of proving inadequate representation is "minimal." Sierra Club, 18 F.3d at 1207. However, the Fifth Circuit has held that a presumption of adequate representation applies in two situations. First, where the proposed intervenor has the same ultimate objective as a party to the lawsuit, then the proposed intervenor must show "adversity of interest, collusion, or nonfeasance on the part of the existing party to overcome the presumption," Texas, 805 F.3d at 661-62 (quoting Edwards v. City of Houston, 78 F.3d 983, 1005 (5th Cir. 1996)), such as by showing that the respective parties' interests diverge "in a manner germane to the case," id. at 662. Second, when the existing party is a governmental body charged by law with representing the interest of the intervenor, the proposed intervenor must show that their respective interests in fact differ and the government will not adequately represent those of the proposed intervenor. Id. Indeed, where there is a "lack of unity in all objectives," it is sufficient for Law Lab to show that it plans to advance "real and legitimate additional or contrary arguments" to meet Rule 24(a)'s requirement that the government's representation "may be inadequate." Id. (cleaned up).

The district court erred in finding that Federal Defendants adequately protect Law Lab's interests. First, Law Lab and Federal Defendants plainly do not share the same ultimate objective in this litigation. Whereas Law Lab seeks to limit the geographic scope of relief ordered, Federal Defendants seek to defend the Termination Order as a whole, as a function of its authority to efficiently enforce public health and immigration laws. Second, no mandate charges Federal Defendants with representing Law Lab's interests in serving asylum-seeking individuals along the southern border. But to the extent there is any presumption that Federal Defendants adequately represent Law Lab's interests, Law Lab has rebutted it.

This Court's decisions in prior cases illustrate the district court's error in its finding of adequate representation. In Texas v. United States, this Court held that even when the government defends a policy benefiting proposed intervenors, the government's interest may still diverge from intervenors' due to the government's overriding interest in "expansive … executive authority" and "efficiently enforcing the immigration laws," rebutting the presumption of adequate representation. Id. at 663. Similarly, in Sierra Club, this Court found that the government's need to represent the "broad public interest" did not adequately represent the economic concerns of groups representing the timber industry. 18 F.3d at 1208 (reversing district court order denying timber purchasers' association's motion to intervene as of right).

This Court has applied these principles in at least two recent cases, both reversing district court orders denying intervention as of right under analogous circumstances. In La Union del Pueblo Entero v. Abbott, a case brought to challenge a Texas voting law, this Court reversed the denial of intervention to Republican Party committees where both the state government and the committees shared the objective of upholding the state law, but where the respective parties' interests diverged over "how to carry out the ultimate objective." 29 F.4th 299, 308 (5th Cir. 2022). There, the state government sought to dispose of the case on jurisdictional and standing grounds, whereas the committees sought to have the constitutionality of the state law upheld on the merits. Id. at 309. In concluding that the committees overcame the presumption of adequate representation, this Court relied on the committees' "private interests" in the "expenditure of their resources to equip and educate their members" and on the state government's "relationship with the federal government and with the courts." Id. (citation omitted). "Though we cannot say for sure that the state's more extensive interests will in fact result in inadequate representation, we can say that surely they might, which is all that Rule 24(a)(2) requires." Id. (cleaned up).

The district court's ruling also contravenes this Court's decision in Miller v. Vilsack, a case brought to challenge a federal law that provides financial support to socially disadvantaged farmers. 2022 WL 851782, at *1 (5th Cir. Mar. 22, 2022). There, the district court had found the federal government would adequately represent the interests of a nonprofit cooperative association of Black farmers. This Court reversed, holding that even where the cooperative and the federal government shared the same ultimate objective of upholding the constitutionality of a federal law, their respective interests in the litigation were adverse because the cooperative sought to advance a unique argument about ongoing discrimination against its members that conflicted with the position of the federal government in a manner "germane to the case." Id. at *3.

This case is indistinguishable from the ones discussed above. First, Federal Defendants' interests diverge sharply from those of Law Lab, which seeks to advance migrant and refugee justice, including by expending its resources to assist and provide pro bono legal services to individuals seeking asylum at the California and New Mexico southern borders. ROA.3580-3588 ¶¶ 2, 10, 12-13. Law Lab has no interest in expanding Federal Defendants' immigration authority or the efficient enforcement of immigration or public health laws. Moreover, as the district court noted, Federal Defendants have made their divergent interests manifest by declining to present any argument for limiting the scope of the preliminary injunction to the Plaintiff States, which the district court interpreted as agreement with the injunction's nationwide scope. ROA.3803 ("The Defendants do not appear to contest the entry of a nation-wide preliminary injunction ...."). The issue around which these interests diverge—remedial scope—is unequivocally germane to this case.

Thus, it is no answer that Law Lab merely seeks to pursue a litigation strategy that Federal Defendants have rejected. Law Lab's unique objective, which no other party has pursued, is to ensure any relief the district court orders is appropriately tailored by geography. This does not amount to a litigation strategy in pursuit of a shared objective with Federal Defendants. While Law Lab no doubt opposes the Title 42 order as a general matter, the purpose of its intervention in this litigation is not to defend the Federal Defendants' Termination Order as a whole. Instead, Law

Lab asserts a unique defense to the nationwide injunction, supported by arguments for remedial tailoring that no other party has advanced, the results of which would lead to an outcome that Federal Defendants have not pursued or suggested they will pursue. Thus, any potential presumption that might apply here is easily rebutted by reference to Federal Defendants' own actions, which illuminate their divergent government interests. See Texas, 805 F.3d at 663.

Federal Defendants do not adequately represent Law Lab's interests in this case and the district court erred in denying Law Lab's motion for limited intervention. This Court's precedent necessitates reversal.

IV. The district court erred in issuing a nationwide injunction.

The district court also erred in issuing a nationwide injunction based on its findings that the record evidence and the alleged need for uniformity in immigration policy justify nationwide relief in a case featuring a policy that derives its authority from public health law. First, the district court exceeded its equitable powers in granting nationwide relief in this case, where not a single piece of record evidence supports the central premise for the nationwide scope of the preliminary injunction: that the termination of Title 42 in non-plaintiff states, including California and New Mexico, will harm the Plaintiff States. On the other hand, it is undisputed that the district court's order imposes significant burdens on non-parties, including people who will never reside in the Plaintiff States, because it bars access to the asylum system for people who have no intention of ever leaving California or New Mexico. Second, neither the alleged need for uniformity in immigration policy, in this case challenging a public health order, nor the fact that this is an APA case mandate a nationwide injunction here.

A. The district court ignored the limits on its equitable authority by failing to balance the interests of nonparties.

As Justice Gorsuch explained in his concurring opinion in DHS v. New York, "[e]quitable remedies … are meant to redress the injuries sustained by a particular plaintiff in a particular lawsuit. When a district court … goes further than that, ordering the government to take (or not take) some action with respect to those who are strangers to the suit, it is hard to see how the court could still be acting in the judicial role of resolving cases and controversies." 140 S. Ct. at 600 (Gorsuch, J., concurring); see also Trump v. Hawaii, 138 S. Ct. 2392, 2425-29 (2018) (Thomas, J., concurring). In other words, "a district court should think twice—and perhaps twice again—before granting universal anti-enforcement injunctions against the federal government. Even if it turns out that the … States in this case are entitled to relief, it is difficult to see why an injunction applicable only to them would not do the trick." Arizona, 2022 WL 2437870, at *14 (Sutton, C.J., concurring) (concurring in an opinion reversing an order granting nationwide injunction on behalf of several states challenging federal immigration policy). Here, as in Arizona, a nationwide injunction is unnecessary to remedy—and entirely out of proportion with—Plaintiff States' alleged harms.

Injunctions must be tailored to take account of case-specific factors. Califano v. Yamasaki, 442 U.S. 682, 702 (1979); see also Fiber Sys. Int'l, Inc. v. Roehrs, 470 F.3d 1150, 1159 (5th Cir. 2006) ("[A]n injunction must be narrowly tailored to remedy the specific action necessitating the injunction."). Such tailoring requires consideration of the precise injury that gave rise to the suit and modulating relief accordingly. Lewis v. Casey, 518 U.S. 343, 357 (1996); see also E.T. v. Paxton, 19 F.4th 760, 763 (5th Cir. 2021) (state-wide injunction should have been narrowed to address only the harms to the plaintiffs). Where the injury to the prevailing party is slight, equitable relief should typically be correspondingly modest. See Milliken v. Bradley, 418 U.S. 717, 738 (1974) (in "any equity case, the nature of the violation determines the scope of the remedy") (citation omitted); Scott v. Schedler, 826 F.3d 207, 211 (5th Cir. 2016) (an injunction "is overbroad if it is not narrowly tailored to remedy the specific action which gives rise to the order" (cleaned up)). To apply this principle of proportionality, courts must weigh the harm suffered by the plaintiff against the burdens of imposing injunctive relief on the defendant and the public at large, including parties not before the court. See eBay Inc. v. MercExchange, L.L.C., 547 U.S. 388, 391 (2006); Weinberger v. Romero-Barcelo, 456 U.S. 305, 312 (1982).

Courts must also consider the viability of narrower alternatives. In Trump v. International Refugee Assistance Project, the Supreme Court trimmed an injunction that swept "much further" than would have been necessary to redress the injuries of the plaintiffs and others "similarly situated." 137 S. Ct. 2080, 2087-88 (2017) (per curiam). Likewise, in Dayton Board of Education v. Brinkman, the Supreme Court reversed the lower court because "instead of tailoring a remedy commensurate to the three specific violations, the Court of Appeals imposed a systemwide remedy going beyond their scope." 433 U.S. 406, 417 (1977). Similarly, in Lewis, the Supreme Court struck down a sweeping injunction because the "violation ha[d] not been shown to be systemwide, and granting a remedy beyond what was necessary to provide relief to [plaintiffs] was therefore improper." 518 U.S. at 360.[6] And the Sixth Circuit recently stayed and later struck down a nationwide injunction entered on behalf of several states challenging federal immigration policy. See Arizona v. Biden, 31 F.4th 469 (6th Cir.) (granting stay), rev'd and remanded, 2022 WL 2437870 (6th Cir. July 5, 2022) (vacating preliminary injunction). As Chief Judge Sutton noted, "Left unchecked, such nationwide injunctions have become a springing easement on the customary deliberative process for dealing with issues of national importance." Arizona, 2022 WL 2437870, at *16 (Sutton, C.J., concurring).

By refusing to even consider the severe harm that nationwide relief imposes on thousands of individual non-parties who will never impose any burden on Plaintiff States, the district court erred in failing to balance non-party interests, in contravention of equitable principles. See Weinberger, 456 U.S. at 312. There is no dispute that the Title 42 order, which is kept in place by the preliminary injunction, bars access to asylum for people who have no intention of leaving California or New Mexico prior to their cases being resolved, much less travelling to Plaintiff States.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The record already includes evidence proving the existence of at least two such people, and no one has disputed that there are many more. See, e.g., ROA.3559-3563 ¶ 15, 3569-3573 ¶ 20. The nationwide injunction unduly harms those individuals forced to stay on the other side of the border by barring them from accessing the asylum system even though they will never do anything that harms the Plaintiff States. This stark discrepancy illuminates what the district court failed to do: balance the various interests and fashion an injunction that is tailored to redress the proven harms to the particular plaintiffs in this case.

Thus, under basic principles of remedial proportionality, even if the evidence on which the district court relied suffices to warrant a preliminary injunction in Plaintiff States (a view Law Lab does not share, as discussed below), it did not warrant extending that injunction to apply in states that are not parties to this case. See Dayton, 433 U.S. at 420; Lewis, 518 U.S. at 361.

Moreover, ordering nationwide relief for Plaintiff States without considering the countervailing interests of other states effectively permitted fewer than half the states to set nationwide immigration policy at the expense of those that did not participate in these proceedings. Plaintiff States' economic interests are no more compelling than other states' countervailing interests in, for example, expanding their tax bases and labor forces by welcoming people seeking asylum, or their interest in reunifying family members who would otherwise be expelled under Title 42. See Brief of Illinois, et al., as Amici Curiae in Support of Petitioners, Biden v. Texas, No. 21-954 (U.S. Mar. 21, 2022), 2022 WL 876862, at * 16 (noting the "wide range of benefits" to states arising from the federal government's decision to parole asylum seekers into the country, "from access to safe living conditions to family reunification"). To give another example, Plaintiff States' stated interest in not expending costs associated with "educat[ing] [undocumented] children," ROA.1074, runs directly counter to California's interest to do just the opposite by funding extended educational opportunities for undocumented students, see Cal. Educ. Code § 68130.5 (allowing qualifying undocumented students to pay in-state tuition at state community colleges and universities). The nationwide injunction improperly privileges the Plaintiff States' interests, while disregarding core structural principles of interstate equality.

By failing to balance the interests of nonparties, the nationwide injunction ordered below contravenes these foundational principles of equity.

B. The district court overstepped its equitable powers by issuing a nationwide injunction that is unsupported by the record evidence.

The district court erroneously held Plaintiff States established irreparable injury in support of their request for a nationwide injunction "based on the government's own predictions[] the Termination Order will result in an increase in daily border crossings," potentially as high as "18,000," and on "evidence supporting the Plaintiff States' position that such a rise in border crossings will increase their costs for healthcare reimbursements and education services" that are not recoverable. ROA.3801. That evidence does not come close to justifying a nationwide injunction leaving the Title 42 order in effect, demonstrating the district court's equitable overreach once more.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

First, the 18,000 figure (itself just a projection for purposes of emergency planning, see ROA.1133-1135) says nothing about how many, if any, individuals will (1) enter non-plaintiff states as a result of the Termination Order; (2) later move to and reside in Plaintiff States; and then (3) impose economic costs on those Plaintiff States once there. The projection does not describe any injury "directly traceable" to the Termination Order taking effect in non-plaintiff states, let alone sufficient injury to justify the nationwide scope of the preliminary injunction, particularly given the manifest harm to non-parties that the order imposes. Cf. California v. Texas, 141 S. Ct. 2104, 2117 (2021) (plaintiff states failed to establish standing where they "failed to show how this injury is directly traceable to any actual or possible unlawful Government conduct").

Second, the evidence of increased healthcare costs is based on examples not traceable to the implementation of the Termination Order anywhere, let alone in non-plaintiff states. Plaintiff States' assertion that "Yuma Regional Medical Center ("YRMC") in Arizona was forced to provide $546,050 in unreimbursed medical care for unauthorized [immigrants]," ROA.1075, is entirely unrelated to the termination of Title 42, as it refers to costs associated with providing services to individuals who are detained "while in ICE custody," ROA.1237, not individuals who enter through non-plaintiff states and freely move to Plaintiff States because of the Termination Order. Similarly, evidence of increased healthcare costs to Missouri refers to the costs of treating "ineligible [immigrants]" generally. ROA.1677. It says nothing about the hypothetical group of people who would have been expelled pursuant to Title 42 but for the Termination Order, let alone the subset of such individuals who would enter the United States through California or New Mexico and later move to Plaintiff States. Plaintiff States' evidence of education costs is also untraceable to the operation of Title 42 in non-plaintiff states. See ROA.1676, 1075.

The evidence the district court relied on to issue a nationwide injunction relates exclusively to the impacts of unlawful immigration generally. But that justification is wholly irrelevant to this case, which is not about remedying the alleged harms of unlawful immigration to Plaintiff States and instead is about the termination of the Title 42 order, which blocks processing of people seeking asylum at the southern border pursuant to Title 8 procedures described above. If the Title 42 order is terminated and Federal Defendants resume processing individuals through Title 8 procedures, such processing is not somehow the equivalent of unlawful immigration; individuals who are permitted to enter the United States pursuant to Title 8 processing are not unlawful immigrants. Thus, it should come as no surprise that there is no evidence in the record proving that Title 42's rescission will increase unlawful immigration at all, let alone enough to cause irreparable harm to Plaintiff States that is directly traceable to people who would enter through California or New Mexico and reside in Plaintiff States absent the injunction. Plaintiff States' paltry evidence comes nowhere near establishing the justification for nationwide relief against the order pertaining to Title 42 at issue here.

Thus, the district court overstepped its equitable powers where the record in this case does not justify the nationwide injunction.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

C. The alleged need for uniformity in immigration policy does not justify nationwide relief.

The district court also relied on the alleged need to "promot[e] uniformity in immigration enforcement," ROA.3804, but that consideration does not justify the nationwide scope of the injunction it entered.

First, the Title 42 order (like the order terminating it) derives from the Public Health Services Act, 42 U.S.C. §§ 265, 268, which the federal government read to provide authority to suspend the entry of certain individuals due to the "danger of the introduction of COVID-19 into the United States." 85 Fed. Reg. 65,806 (Oct. 16, 2020). Title 42 must therefore be analyzed as a public health measure for doctrinal purposes—not as immigration policy. As DHS Secretary Mayorkas has stated, "Title 42 is a public health authority and not an immigration policy."[7] Given that Title 42 derives its authority from public health law, there is no requirement that it be implemented uniformly nationwide. COVID-19 public health measures have varied from state to state and region to region throughout the pandemic. Accordingly, the district court erred in relying on the need for uniformity in immigration enforcement.

Second, even if understood as immigration policy, there is no rationale for uniformity with respect to the Title 42 order specifically. Like border policies more generally, Title 42 has been characterized by dis-uniform implementation since its inception. As the record reflects, Federal Defendants apply Title 42 differently at some ports of entry than others, and to some nationalities and not others.[8]

[7] The White House, Press Briefing by Press Secretary Jen Psaki and Secretary of Homeland Security Alejandro Mayorkas (Sept. 24, 2021), https://www.whitehouse.gov/briefing-room/press-briefings/2021/09/24/press-briefing-by-press-secretary-jen-psaki-and-secretary-of-homeland-security-alejandro-mayorkas-september-24-2021.

For that reason, the district court erred in relying on this Court's holding in Texas, which upheld a nationwide injunction as to a very different immigration policy. 809 F.3d 134. Texas relied upon the need for uniformity in the implementation of the deferred action program at issue, which was characterized by standardized eligibility criteria and would have conferred uniform benefits upon successful applicants across the country. Id. at 147-49. No comparable uniformity has ever existed here, where Title 42 has been implemented differently across different ports of entry. Thus, any alleged need for uniformity is insufficient to justify nationwide relief with respect to a policy that is already implemented differently across different regions along the border.

Additionally, in Texas, no party raised a factual dispute before the district court over whether the millions of potential beneficiaries of that immigration benefits program would move from one state to another. Id. In contrast, Law Lab has raised that issue here. It is the burden of the Plaintiff States to prove that they will suffer harm in this case, which they have failed to do. Notably, the district court's assertion that a tailored preliminary injunction "will likely do nothing more than shift border crossings from the Plaintiff States to states not covered by the preliminary injunction," ROA.3804, is mere speculation unsupported by the record in this case.

[8] See, e.g., ROA.3602-3603 (listing only six ports of entry at which different numbers of individuals have been excepted from Title 42 pursuant to the NGO-supported humanitarian exception process); see also Kate Morrissey, Ukrainians only: Racial disparities in U.S. border policies grow more obvious, San Diego Union Tribune (Mar. 19, 2022), https://www.sandiegouniontribune.com/news/immigration/story/2022-03-19/ukrainians-border-title-42.

Third, even in cases involving immigration policies rather than public health policies with immigration-related effects, the need for uniformity is but one factor among many that courts should consider in tailoring relief. While "[i]t is not beyond the power of a court, in appropriate circumstances, to issue a nationwide injunction," Texas, 809 F.3d at 188 (emphasis added), it hardly follows that virtually every case affecting immigration law requires nationwide relief. That is not how our system of distributed federal adjudicative power works. See DHS, 140 S. Ct. at 600 (Gorsuch, J., concurring) ("The traditional system of … courts issuing interlocutory relief limited to the parties at hand … encourages multiple judges and … circuits to weigh in only after careful deliberation, a process that permits the airing of competing views ….."). Here, the district court utterly failed to consider the strong factors counseling against nationwide relief—including, in particular, the dramatic harm to non-parties that the injunction imposed.

Finally, the district court's brief remark that a tailored injunction "would only further complicate DHS's operations," does not warrant the sweeping relief it issued. ROA.3804. Federal Defendants have not advanced that position. See ROA.3678-3689. Even if it had, that is "the National Government's problem, not [the court's]" to address. Arizona, 2022 WL 2437870, at *15. Moreover, even putting aside the existing piecemeal implementation of Title 42, splits in the lower courts routinely result in non-uniform immigration policies that the federal government nonetheless implements, despite some resulting increased complexity. For example, from January 2020 to July 2021, a class-wide preliminary injunction required Customs and Border Protection to provide access to counsel to people in Migrant Protection Protocol nonrefoulement interviews. That order was not binding, and the government did not implement it, outside California. See Doe v. Wolf, 432 F. Supp. 3d 1200 (S.D. Cal. 2020), remanded by Doe v. Mayorkas, 854 F. App'x 115 (9th Cir. 2021). Similarly, since 2018, another class-wide preliminary injunction has required arriving asylum seekers found to have a credible fear of persecution to be considered for parole under a previously-issued parole directive, and has prohibited ICE from detaining them absent an individualized determination on flight risk or danger. Damus v. Nielsen, 313 F. Supp. 3d 317, 323 (D.D.C. 2018). But it applies only to people in ICE custody in the jurisdiction of the Detroit, El Paso, Los Angeles, Newark, and Philadelphia field offices. Id. at 325. As in those cases, it remains practicable here to limit the scope of the injunction to only some geographic areas.

In prior briefing in this case, Plaintiff States have cited other cases Law Lab has been involved in to support their argument, but these arguments are unpersuasive. In Innovation Law Lab v. Wolf, a case about a different policy concerning asylum seekers at the border, the Ninth Circuit first affirmed the district court's nationwide injunction against implementation of that policy. 951 F.3d 1073, 1094 (9th Cir. 2020). The Court later stayed the injunction "insofar as it operate[d] outside of the geographical boundaries of the Ninth Circuit," recognizing that "the proper scope of injunctions against agency action is a matter of intense and active controversy." 951 F.3d 986, 990 (9th Cir. 2020). Law Lab had sought a broader injunction by demonstrating, with evidence, harm occurring in locations outside the Ninth Circuit—which the Plaintiff States have not done here. But the Ninth Circuit held, and Law Lab acceded to the view, that the injunction should not run nationwide.[9]

Thus, the alleged need for uniformity in immigration policy does not, without more, justify nationwide relief.

D. The APA does not require nationwide relief.

The district court rightly chose not to rely on Plaintiff States' assertion that the APA requires nationwide relief. To do so would have been inconsistent with the actual practice in many immigration cases (among others), and contrary to governing Supreme Court precedent concerning Congress's need to speak clearly when displacing courts' traditional equitable authority. See Monsanto Co. v. Geertson

---

[9] Plaintiff States have also referenced a declaration Law Lab submitted in a case challenging a different asylum policy, but it too does not support their position. In East Bay Sanctuary Covenant v. Barr, the Ninth Circuit first stayed the lower court injunction outside of the Ninth Circuit "because the nationwide scope of the injunction [was] not supported by the record as it [stood]," 934 F.3d 1027, 1028 (9th Cir. 2019), requiring the plaintiffs to return to court with evidence for why nationwide relief was warranted, see E. Bay Sanctuary Covenant v. Barr, 391 F. Supp. 3d 974 (N.D. Cal. 2019), aff'd sub nom. E. Bay Sanctuary Covenant v. Garland, 994 F.3d 962 (9th Cir. 2020). But even once the plaintiffs did that, and the district court reinstated the nationwide injunction, the Supreme Court stayed the preliminary injunction in full pending appeal at the Ninth Circuit and disposition of any petition for writ of certiorari. Barr v. E. Bay Sanctuary Covenant, 140 S. Ct. 3 (2019). The Ninth Circuit eventually affirmed the nationwide injunction nearly one year later, before its decision in Wolf casting doubt on the practice. 994 F.3d at 988. East Bay Sanctuary Covenant thus illustrates three points: that the Ninth Circuit required evidence to support a nationwide injunction (evidence that is absent here); that it stayed its nationwide scope in the absence of such evidence; and that its view on the appropriate scope of such injunctions has narrowed in the years since.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Seed Farms, 561 U.S. 139, 165-66 (2010); Miller v. French, 530 U.S. 327, 340 (2000). Neither the Supreme Court nor this Court has ever held that the phrase "shall . . . hold unlawful and set aside" in 5 U.S.C. § 706(a)(2) mandates district courts to issue nationwide injunctions against the federal government in every case.

This Court's recent decision in Texas v. United States, which affirmed nationwide relief in a case in which the district court set aside agency action pursuant to the APA, is not to the contrary. 2022 WL 2466786, at *1. There, after a full trial on the merits, a district court enjoined the federal government's prosecutorial discretion policy prioritizing certain individuals for deportation. The court was careful to make clear that it did not issue injunctive relief, and this Court's affirmance clearly distinguishes between vacatur under the APA and injunctive relief, expressly declining to consider whether nationwide injunctive relief would have been appropriate. Id. at *5. In contrast, here the district court issued a preliminary injunction, thus necessarily invoking its equitable authority. It did not purport to issue a preliminary injunction under the APA.

Indeed, the APA does not displace traditional principles of equitable remedial discretion to require nationwide injunctions whenever a court finds agency action unlawful. As Chief Judge Sutton noted,

> The Administrative Procedure Act, it is true, says that a reviewing court may "hold unlawful and set aside" agency actions that violate the law. But that raises a question; it does not answer it. The question is whether Congress meant to upset the bedrock practice of case-by-case judgments with respect to the parties in each case or create a new and far-reaching power through this unremarkable > language … it is far from clear that Congress intended to make such a sweeping change.

Arizona, 2022 WL 2437870, at *15 (Sutton, C.J., concurring) (citations omitted).

In Hecht Co. v. Bowles, the Supreme Court confronted an analogous situation in which a lower court interpreted the Emergency Price Control Act to require an injunction once a violation was found. 321 U.S. 321, 321-22, 326 (1944). Emphasizing that "equity practice with a background of several hundred years of history" was distinguished by "[f]lexibility rather than rigidity," the Court declined to adopt the view that under all circumstances in which a violation is found, the court must issue an injunction, holding that "if Congress had intended to make such a drastic departure from the traditions of equity practice, an unequivocal statement of its purpose would have been made." Id. at 329. More recently, the Supreme Court recognized it "should not construe a statute to displace courts' traditional equitable authority absent the 'clearest command,' or an 'inescapable inference' to the contrary." Miller v. French, 530 U.S. 327, 340 (2000) (citations omitted); see also Nken v. Holder, 556 U.S. 418, 433 (2009).

The plain text of Section 706's grant of authority to "set aside" an order says nothing about whether a court's ruling should govern the federal government's conduct as to nonparties. And nothing in the legislative background of the APA's enactment suggests the APA's "set aside" language requires mandatory nationwide injunctions in all APA cases. See Ronald M. Levin, "Vacation" at Sea: Judicial Remedies and Equitable Discretion in Administrative Law, 53 Duke L.J. 291, 313-14 (2003).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Without a clear command to the contrary, this Court retains equitable authority to order a remedy that is appropriately tailored to the needs of this case; it is not required to issue a nationwide injunction simply because Plaintiff States present a claim under the APA. Courts must still apply equitable principles to tailor the remedy to the case.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, this Court should reverse the district court order denying Law Lab's motion for limited intervention and vacate the order granting Plaintiff States' motion for a nationwide preliminary injunction.

[1] As noted in Defendants' prior report, given a significant increase in the number of individuals who have presented themselves with situations that warrant humanitarian exceptions pursuant to the terms of the CDC's Title 42 public health orders, DHS began on July 13, 2022 to gradually increase the number of humanitarian exceptions it applies, subject to operational constraints.

[2] Defendants note that on August 15, 2022, the plaintiffs in Huisha-Huisha v. Mayorkas, No. 21-cv-00100 (D.D.C.), a class action challenging the application of the Title 42 policy to family units, filed a motion for partial summary judgment on their claim that the Title 42 policy is arbitrary and capricious. The Huisha-Huisha plaintiffs seek entry of an order vacating and setting aside Defendants' "Title 42 policy," declaring that the Title 42 policy is arbitrary and capricious, and permanently enjoining Defendants from applying the Title 42 policy to class members. The court has set a hearing on plaintiffs' motion for October 11, 2022.

DEFENDANTS' MONTHLY REPORT FOR THE MONTH OF MAY PURSUANT TO THE COURT'S PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Pursuant to the Court's May 20, 2022 preliminary injunction order, ECF No. 91, Defendants herein provide, subject to the caveats discussed below, data showing, for the period of May 1-31, 2022,[1] (1) the number of single adults processed under Title 42 and Title 8 by country, (2) the number of recidivist border crossers for whom the U.S. Customs and Border Protection ("CBP"), Department of Homeland Security ("DHS") has applied expedited removal, (3) the number of migrants that have been excepted from Title 42 under the NGO-supported humanitarian exception process, and (4) any material changes to policy regarding DHS's application of the Title 42 process.

1. The number of single adults processed under Title 42 and Title 8 by country.

Below is the data for single adult encounters by CBP at the Southwest land border for the period of May 1-31, 2022.

1 The Court's preliminary injunction order stated that "DHS shall file monthly reports." ECF No. 91. As explained in Defendants' prior weekly reports required by the Court's temporary restraining order (TRO), final verification of DHS's border data takes place at the end of every month. Due to the TRO's weekly reporting requirement, Defendants have been providing preliminary data subject to change. See, e.g., ECF No. 89. In light of the preliminary injunction order's monthly reporting requirement, counsel for Defendants informed Plaintiffs on June 9, 2022, that starting on June 16, 2022, and each month thereafter, DHS would supply monthly reports on the prior month's final data as long as the preliminary injunction order remains in place. Plaintiffs did not object to Defendants' proposal.

4. Any material changes to policy regarding DHS's application of the Title 42 process.

DHS reports that it has made one material change to its policy on its application of the Title 42 process beyond compliance with the Court's preliminary injunction order. As explained in Defendants' opposition to Plaintiffs' motion for preliminary injunction, see ECF No. 40 at 7-8, on March 4, 2022, the D.C. Circuit affirmed in part a previously stayed preliminary injunction enjoining the application of Title 42 orders to family units. Huisha-Huisha v. Mayorkas, 27 F.4th 718 (D.C. Cir. 2022). The court found that although 42 U.S.C. § 265 likely authorizes the expulsion of covered noncitizens, pursuant to the Immigration and Naturalization Act, such expulsion may not be "to places where [the noncitizens] will be persecuted or tortured." Id. at 722. On May 23, 2022, the D.C. Circuit issued its mandate in Huisha-Huisha. In preparation for the mandate's issuance, DHS issued guidance to its field operators on May 21, 2022, attached hereto as Exhibits 1 & 2, specifying that "covered noncitizens who are part of a family unit and who have manifested a fear of returning or being sent to the country to which they would be expelled should not be expelled without an appropriate screening by United States Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS) to determine whether they are more likely than not to be persecuted or tortured." This guidance went into effect on May 23, 2022.

2. The number of recidivist border crossers for whom DHS has applied expedited removal.

From June 1 - 30, 2022, U.S. Border Patrol ("USBP") applied expedited removal, 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(1), to 1,427 single adults who attempted to unlawfully enter the United States between a port of entry and who had previously been encountered by USBP and processed under Title 42 or Title 8 at least one time since March 20, 2020.

3. The number of migrants that have been excepted from Title 42 under the NGO-supported humanitarian exception process.

From the month of June 2022, CBP's Office of Field Operations processed 8,792 Title 42 exceptions at the 6 ports of entry that utilize the above-referenced NGO-supported humanitarian exception process. The below shows the data broken down by port.[1]

- Hidalgo, TX: 3,781
- Laredo, TX: 773
- Eagle Pass, TX: 595
- Paso del Norte, El Paso, TX: 1,137

[1] Given a significant increase in the number of individuals who have presented themselves with situations that warrant humanitarian exceptions pursuant to the terms of the CDC's Title 42 public health orders, DHS has, beginning July 13, 2022, begun to gradually increase the number of humanitarian exceptions it applies, subject to operational constraints.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Electronically Filed - Cole Circuit - August 23, 2022 - 04:17 PM

INTRODUCTION

1. The Missouri Constitution guarantees that "all elections shall be free and open; and no power, civil or military, shall at any time interfere to prevent the free exercise of the right of suffrage." Mo. Const. Art. I, § 25.

2. The Missouri Constitution also clearly defines voter qualifications: "All citizens of the United States, including occupants of soldiers' and sailors' homes, over the age of eighteen who are residents of this state and of the political subdivision in which they offer to vote are entitled to vote at all elections by the people . . . ." Mo. Const. Art. VIII, § 2.

3. The Missouri Constitution further provides that: "[A]ll constitutional government is intended to promote the general welfare of the people; that all persons have a natural right to life, liberty, the pursuit of happiness and the enjoyment of the gains of their own industry; that all persons are created equal and are entitled to equal rights and opportunity under the law; that to give security to these things is the principal office of government, and that when government does not confer this security, it fails in its chief design." Mo. Const. Art. I, § 2.

4. The right to vote and the right to equal protection under the laws "are the core of Missouri's constitution and, hence, receive state constitutional protections even more extensive than those provided by the federal constitution." Weinschenk v. State, 203 S.W.3d 201, 204 (Mo. banc 2006).

5. In Weinschenk, 203 S.W.3d 201 and Priorities USA v. State, 591 S.W.3d 448 (Mo. banc 2020), reh'g denied (Jan. 30, 2020), the Missouri Supreme Court confirmed the fundamental right to vote and struck down laws requiring that only limited forms of photographic identification ("photo ID") must be presented to vote. The Missouri Supreme Court has "made clear that requiring individuals to present photo identification to vote is unconstitutional." Priorities, 591 S.W.3d at 459.

6. Following the Priorities decision, Missouri voters maintained multiple options for voting in person at the polling place: (1) providing a form of photo ID, (2) providing an alternative secondary form of ID (e.g., a voter registration or notification card from the election authority, a Missouri student ID, or a copy of a current utility bill or bank statement), or (3) casting a provisional ballot. § 115.427, RSMo (2016).

7. House Bill 1878, effective August 28, 2022 (HB 1878), impinges upon the fundamental right to vote by restricting the identification options that registered voters may present to vote both in person at the polls and in-person absentee. HB 1878, § A (to be codified at § 115.427, RSMo and § 115.277, RSMo) (the "Voter ID Restrictions").[1]

8. The Voter ID Restrictions eliminate the second option of providing a form of secondary ID (e.g., a voter registration card, a student ID, or a copy of a utility bill or bank statement), and instead, require all registered voters in Missouri to either: (1) provide a non-expired acceptable Missouri or federal photo ID, or (2) cast a provisional ballot, which requires the voter to either return the same day with a non-expired acceptable photo ID or rely upon an arbitrary, standardless, and unreliable signature-matching process in order to count.

9. The Voter ID Restrictions will require those who lack one of the specified forms of photo ID, including individual Plaintiffs and members of organizational Plaintiffs, to expend time, resources, and effort navigating bureaucracies to acquire the requisite underlying documentation and an acceptable form of photo ID to vote.

[1] Section 115.277 provides that a person may cast an in-person absentee ballot if they meet certain requirements. Section 115.277 further provides that "[a] registered voter casting a ballot under the provisions of this subsection shall provide a form of personal photo identification that is consistent with subsection 1 of section 115.427."

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

10. These burdens in obtaining the now required photo ID to vote will be faced by voters who have already overcome the bureaucratic hurdles necessary to register to vote and who have been deemed eligible to vote by the State.

11. Civic organizations that represent populations who disproportionately lack one of the acceptable forms of a non-expired photo ID to vote and face significant barriers to obtaining one (e.g., racial minorities, people living in poverty, rural Missourians, students, senior citizens, Missourians with disabilities, Missourians returning from incarceration, unhoused Missourians), including the Missouri State Conference of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People ("Missouri NAACP") and the League of Women Voters of Missouri ("LWVMO"), will now be required to expend and divert resources to ameliorate confusion among voters related to what identification will be needed to vote and to assist voters with understanding how to obtain acceptable forms of identification as well as documentation needed to acquire a non-expired acceptable photo ID.

12. The Voter ID Restrictions substantially and severely burden the fundamental right to vote by restricting the ability to cast a regular ballot to only those who possess certain limited, narrow forms of photo ID, by imposing unnecessary obstacles to voting for the population of Missourians who lack an acceptable form of photo ID, and by requiring civic organizations to expend and divert resources educating their members and the public about the new Voter ID Restrictions.

13. Because the Voter ID Restrictions impose a severe, substantial, and heavy burden on fundamental right to vote protected by the Missouri Constitution, they are subject to strict scrutiny. These onerous restrictions cannot satisfy any level of judicial scrutiny, however, as they are neither necessary nor narrowly tailored to advance any compelling state interest.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Electronically Filed - Cole Circuit - August 23, 2022 - 04:17 PM

14. The Voter ID Restrictions are unconstitutional both facially and as applied to all Missourians who lack the limited photo ID required by this law to cast a regular ballot, including Plaintiffs' members and Plaintiffs D. Rene Powell and Kimberly Morgan.

15. Plaintiffs request that this Court declare the Voter ID Restrictions unconstitutional and enjoin their application in all future elections.

JURISDICTION AND VENUE

16. This Court maintains original subject-matter jurisdiction over this action under §§ 526.030 and 527.010 of the Missouri Revised Statutes and Missouri Rule of Civil Procedure 87.01.

17. Venue is proper in this Court because Secretary of State John R. Ashcroft maintains an office in Cole County, Missouri.

PARTIES

A. Plaintiffs

18. The Missouri NAACP is a statewide membership organization.

19. In Missouri, the Missouri NAACP is the chief unit of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People ("NAACP"), whose mission is: (i) to ensure the political, education, and economic equality of rights of all persons; (ii) to achieve equality of rights and eliminate racial prejudice among the citizens of the United States; (iii) to remove all barriers of racial discrimination through democratic processes; (iv) to seek the enactment of federal, state, and local laws securing civil rights; to inform the public of the adverse effects of racial discrimination and to seek its elimination; (v) to educate persons as to their constitutional rights and to take all lawful action to secure the exercise thereof; and (vii) to take any other lawful action utilizing the tools available to a 501(c)(4) organization in furtherance of these objectives.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Electronically Filed - Cole Circuit - August 23, 2022 - 04:17 PM

20. The Missouri NAACP has thousands of members across the state, divided into more than twenty local units.

21. The mission of the Missouri NAACP, which aligns with the NAACP, is to ensure the political, educational, social, and economic equality of rights of all persons and to eliminate race-based discrimination. Its objectives include seeking enactment and enforcement of laws securing civil rights as well as educating people as to their rights.

22. The issues upon which the Missouri NAACP and the NAACP are largely focused, include: Race & Justice (fighting racial injustice by building Black political, social, and economic power), Education Innovation (a world-class education for all students), Environmental & Climate Justice (an environmental, social and economic revolution), Inclusive Economy (mobility and a thriving Black economy), Health & Well-being (an inclusive culture of health and equitable social health systems), Next Generation Leadership (support for young leaders and change agents), Advocacy & Litigation (fair and just representation for all by standing up for the rights of Black Americans in the courts and in Congress).

23. A key objective for the Missouri NAACP and NAACP is to make sure that Black voters and other underserved communities are engaged and encouraged to vote in every election.

24. Voting is a foundational value of the Missouri NAACP. The organization believes that enabling all Missourians to exercise their fundamental right to vote is vital to ensuring equal citizenship and achieving the organization's substantive policy goals.

25. The Missouri NAACP is an active member of the Missouri Voter Protection Coalition, which works to secure the rights of all voters in Missouri.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

26. The Missouri NAACP conducts substantial voter engagement and education work in furtherance of its mission, including outreach and activities that communicate and advance its views about the importance of voter registration and access to absentee voting.

27. The population that the Missouri NAACP strives to support and encourage to vote (marginalized and underserved populations) stand to be disproportionately impacted by the implementation of HB 1878 and, specifically, the Voter ID Restrictions.

28. The Missouri NAACP provides voting-related outreach to, and advocacy on behalf of, its members and community, including outreach and advocacy related to voting requirements under Missouri law.

29. In order to fulfill its mission and increase voter turnout among its members and the communities it serves, the Missouri NAACP is expending and diverting resources educating the public on the Voter ID Restrictions and assisting those who need support obtaining an acceptable form of identification or the underlying documents necessary to obtain that form of identification.

30. The LWVMO is a statewide membership organization.

31. The LWVMO is a state chapter of the League of Women Voters ("LWV").

32. Rooted in the suffrage movement that secured the right to vote for women, the LWVMO has worked to foster civic engagement and enhance access to the vote since the organization was founded in 1920.

33. The LWVMO works to ensure every citizen has the information and resources necessary to register and exercise their right to vote.

34. The LWV and the LWVMO seek to expand voter access and fight voter suppression.

35. For almost 100 years, the LWVMO has been dedicated to ensuring a free, fair, and accessible electoral system for all eligible citizens.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Electronically Filed - Cole Circuit - August 23, 2022 - 04:17 PM

36. The LWVMO's goal is to safeguard the rights of all qualified voters—specifically those from traditionally underrepresented or underserved communities, including first-time voters, youth (both college and non-college), people with disabilities, new citizens, minorities, seniors, those with low income, and women—populations who stand to be disproportionately impacted by the Voter ID Restrictions.

37. The LWVMO is an active member of the Missouri Voter Protection Coalition, which works to secure the rights of voters in Missouri.

38. As a membership organization, the LWVMO is the state chapter and has nine local league chapters throughout the state.

39. The LWVMO's more than 1,300 members reside throughout Missouri.

40. LWV members who reside in Missouri are members of the LWVMO as well as their local league chapter.

41. The LWVMO provides voting-related outreach to and advocacy on behalf of its members and community members, including outreach and advocacy related to voting requirements under Missouri law, including the Voter ID Restrictions.

42. The LWVMO has members and works with communities that include individuals who do not have a photo ID that satisfies the Voter ID Restrictions.

43. In order to fulfill its mission and increase voter turnout among its members and the communities it serves, the LWVMO is expending and diverting resources educating the public on the Voter ID Restrictions and assisting those who need support obtaining an acceptable form of identification or the underlying documents necessary to obtain that form of identification.

44. D. Rene Powell is a resident of Columbia, Boone County, Missouri.

45. Ms. Powell is an eligible Missouri voter and is registered to vote in Missouri.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

46. Ms. Powell fifty-two years old and is disabled due to epilepsy and mobility issues. Ms. Powell lives alone. Because of her disability, she is unable to drive and must rely upon public transportation, transportation services like Uber and Lyft, or the assistance of friends to get around.

49. Ms. Powell has never served in the Missouri National Guard or United States Armed Forces.

50. Ms. Powell has a Missouri state non-driver's ID that expired on December 29, 2021.

51. Ms. Powell also has alternative forms of non-photo ID that she could use to vote under current law (e.g., a voter registration card and current utility bills).

52. The only reason that Ms. Powell would need to get her expired photo ID renewed would be to vote.

53. Ms. Powell has voted regularly in all local, state, and national elections for the past 20 years.

54. Ms. Powell voted in the August 2022 Primary Election and plans to vote in the November 2022 General Election.

55. Upon information and belief, the Voter ID Restrictions will prevent Ms. Powell from relying upon her expired state-issued photo ID or alternative forms of identification to cast a regular ballot in elections after the November 2022 General Election.

56. To obtain a new form of ID that complies with HB 1878 and to cast a regular ballot in future elections, Ms. Powell will need to engage in significant time, effort, and planning, including arranging transportation, complying with bureaucratic requirements, and making physical efforts to visit and wait at the appropriate agencies.

63. Because of an error in 2003, Ms. Morgan's birth certificate incorrectly spells her first name as "Kimberley."

64. Ms. Morgan's current state issued non-driver's photo ID also spells her first name incorrectly as "Kimberley" as she had used her birth certificate to obtain her first state issued ID.

65. It was not until after Ms. Morgan had received her first state issued ID that she noticed the spelling error.

66. Ms. Morgan is married but did not change her name.

67. Ms. Morgan's marriage license also includes the incorrect spelling of her first name.

68. Ms. Morgan's social security card has the correct spelling of her name.

69. Ms. Morgan does not have a passport.

70. Ms. Morgan has never served in the Missouri National Guard or the United States Armed Forces.

71. Upon information and belief, the correct spelling of her first name was reflected on her original birth certificate, as it also appears on her social security card that was issued shortly after her birth, but despite her attempts, Ms. Morgan has been unable to locate the original birth certificate and the only copy the department of vital records provided to her upon request includes the incorrect spelling of her first name.

72. Ms. Morgan was born in the City of St. Louis.

73. Ms. Morgan is registered to vote using her legal first name spelled correctly as "Kimberly."

74. Ms. Morgan votes with her voter registration card.

75. Ms. Morgan has made attempts to correct the name spelling on her documents through administrative and bureaucratic means but has been unable to do so.

76. Ms. Morgan has voted regularly in local, state, and national elections for several years.

77. Ms. Morgan voted in the August 2022 Primary Election and wants to vote in the November 2022 General Election.

78. Upon information and belief, the Voter ID Restrictions will prevent Ms. Morgan from using her voter registration card and she cannot use her state-issued ID with the name misspelling or any other alternative forms of identification to vote with a regular ballot in future elections.

79. In order to obtain the necessary underlying documents for a photo ID acceptable for casting a regular ballot after August 28, 2022, Ms. Morgan will have to engage in significant time, effort, and planning, including determining as an initial matter whether she can obtain a corrected birth certificate, before identifying and complying with bureaucratic requirements to obtain a photo ID with the correct spelling of her name so that she can exercise her fundamental right to vote.

81. Defendant John R. Ashcroft is the Missouri Secretary of State, the state's chief elections official, and responsible for implementation of laws related to voting, including HB 1878, to be codified as § 115.427, across the State. He is sued in his official capacity.

GENERAL FACTUAL ALLEGATIONS

Missouri s Constitutional Provisions and Established Legal Prohibition upon ID Laws

82. Missouri's "constitutional provisions establish with unmistakable clarity that the right to vote is fundamental to Missouri citizens." Weinschenk, 203 S.W.3d at 211; accord Priorities, 591 S.W.3d at 452; see also Mo. Const. Art. I, § 25; Mo. Const. Art. I, § 2; Mo. Const. Art. I, § 10; Mo. Const. Art. VIII, § 2.

83. The Missouri Constitution enumerates an exclusive list of qualifications that a person must have in order to have the right to vote in Missouri elections, guaranteeing that right to: "All citizens of the United States ... over the age of eighteen who are residents of this state and of the political subdivision in which they offer to vote are entitled to vote at all elections by the people, if ... they are registered within the time prescribed by law." Mo. Const. Art. VIII, § 2. This exclusive list of qualifications establishes that individuals who are: (1) citizens of the United States; (2) over the age of eighteen; (3) residents of Missouri; (4) residents of the political subdivision in which they offer to vote; and (5) registered within the time prescribed by the law, "are entitled to vote at all elections by the people." Id.

84. The Missouri Constitution also provides the exclusive list of disqualifications to vote in Missouri: (1) a person who has a court-appointed guardian of his or her estate by reason of mental incapacity; and (2) a person who is involuntarily confined in a mental institution pursuant to a court adjudication. Mo. Const. Art. VIII, § 2.

85. Mo. Const. Art. VIII, § 2 grants the Missouri General Assembly the authority to make only one determination on qualifications to vote: the General Assembly may, if it chooses to do so, exclude by law from voting "persons convicted of a felony, or crime connected with the exercise of the right of suffrage." Id.

86. In Weinschenk, 203 S.W.3d 201, the Missouri Supreme Court invalidated strict voter identification provisions implemented by S.B. 1014, 93rd Gen. Assemb., 2d Reg. Sess. (2006), which required Missouri voters to present certain limited forms of government-issued photo ID, specifically a document issued by a state or federal government that contains the person's name as listed in the voter registration records, the person's photograph, and an expiration date showing that the ID is not expired. § 115.427.1 (2005) (the court noted that "[i]n practical effect, the only documents that most Missourians would have that could meet these requirements are a Missouri driver's or non-driver's license or a United States passport").

87. The Weinschenk court held that the ID requirements under SB 1014 violated fundamental voting rights and equal protection under the Missouri Constitution. Id. at 204.

88. The Weinschenk court emphasized the "practical costs" that would be incurred by Missouri voters seeking an acceptable form of photo ID, who would have to navigate complicated bureaucracies simply to exercise their constitutional right to vote, and the time it would take for a voter to receive the required documents—burdens that the individuals most likely to lack the required documentation were least likely to be able to surmount. Id. at 208–09, 214–15.

89. The Weinschenk court also found that the State's asserted interest in preventing voter fraud could not justify this burden for purposes of the strict scrutiny analysis because the photo ID requirement "could only prevent a particular type of voter fraud [(voter impersonation)] that the record d[id] not show [wa]s occurring in Missouri." Id. at 218.

90. Ten years after Weinschenk, Missouri legislators again attempted to implement strict photo identification requirements for voting by amending § 115.427, in H.B. 1631, 98th Gen. Assemb., 2d Reg. Sess. (2016).

91. HB 1631 maintained photo ID requirements, but also included an alternative option: otherwise-qualified voters who lacked one of the prescribed forms of ID could vote with a secondary form of ID, including: (1) any ID issued by the state of Missouri or the federal government, a state or federal agency, or a local election authority, (2) ID issued by a university, college, vocational, or technical school within the state of Missouri, or (3) a copy of a current utility bill, bank statement, government check, paycheck, or other government document showing the voter's name and current address. However, a voter using a secondary form of ID was required to sign an affidavit confirming their identity and averring that they "do not possess personal identification approved for voting, are eligible to receive a Missouri nondriver's license free of charge, and are required to present a form of personal identification to vote." § 115.427 (2016).

92. In Priorities, the Missouri Supreme Court struck down the affidavit requirement of HB 1631's photo ID scheme. The court held that the affidavit language was unconstitutional because it was "misleading and contradictory." 591 S.W.3d at 455. While the court invalidated the affidavit requirement, it maintained alternative secondary ID options, determining that voters could present any of the enumerated secondary forms of ID instead of limiting the statute to strict photo ID requirements (e.g., a voter registration card, a student ID, or a copy of a utility bill or bank statement). Id. at 458–59.

93. In preserving alternative secondary ID requirements, the Priorities court reaffirmed the fundamental voting rights established by Weinschenk.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

94. The Priorities court found that removing the option to vote with a secondary ID, which would leave only the narrower photo ID provision and the provisional ballot signature-matching alternative (which is what HB 1878 also does with the mostly recently enacted Voter ID Restrictions), posed the same problems as the scheme invalidated in Weinschenk and "could not have been adopted by this Court." Id. at 459.

95. The Priorities court noted substantial evidence that the inadequacy of signature-matching necessary to count a provisional ballot cast by a voter without a photo ID—lack of training or uniform standards, age, and illness—"could result in an over-rejection of legitimate signatures[,]" id. at 458, n.15, leaving voters who wanted to be certain their ballots were counted with the same, singular option they had under the statute challenged in Weinschenk: obtain a photo ID. Id. at 458.

96. The Priorities court reaffirmed that obtaining proper ID requires "appropriate documentation, time, and the ability to navigate bureaucracies." Id. at 359. These hurdles "require substantial planning in advance of an election to preserve the right to vote," burdening even those voters who successfully overcome them and disenfranchising those who cannot. Id. (quoting Weinschenk, 203 S.W.3d at 215).

97. The HB 1631 version of the statute also allowed an eligible voter to obtain one non-driver's license and a copy of each the requisite underlying documents at no cost. Id.

98. The Priorities court rejected the dissent's attempt to distinguish the two laws because HB 1631, unlike its predecessor, required the state to provide one non-driver's license without cost as well as free underlying documentation necessary to get a Missouri ID, such as a certified birth certificate. Id. at n.16. As there was record evidence of a plaintiff wrongly having to pay for a non-driver's license, and as only the first license was free, HB 1631 still unconstitutionally attached

direct financial cost to the fundamental right to vote (e.g., if someone possessed a non-expired ID but lost or could not locate it or had an expired ID on file with the state). Id. Moreover, the Court concluded that the severe practical burdens that accompany obtaining an ID were just as important to SB 1014's unconstitutionality as its financial burden was. Id. Because of these burdens, and because "[i]n Weinschenk [the] Court made clear that requiring individuals to present photo identification to vote is unconstitutional," the Court determined that HB 1631 could not have survived without the secondary ID alternative. Id. at 458-59.[2]

99. In effect, the Voter ID Restrictions imposed by HB 1878 implement a scheme that Missouri Supreme Court refused to accept in Weinschenk and Priorities: requiring a photo ID for in-person voting; eliminating all previously permissible secondary forms of ID; and offering as the only alternative casting a provisional ballot, which will only be counted if the voter returns to their polling place the same day with a photo ID or can have their signature accepted via the arbitrary signature-matching process. Id.

The Voter ID Restrictions

100. On May 12, 2022, the Missouri General Assembly truly agreed to and passed House Bill 1878, 101st Gen. Assemb., 2d Reg. Sess. (2022).

[2] Specifically, the Priorities court wrote:

> "In effect, the dissenting opinion's proposal to sever option two in its entirety would result in individuals having to present government-issued photo identification to ensure their votes are counted. In Weinschenk, this Court made clear that requiring individuals to present photo identification to vote is unconstitutional. 203 S.W.3d at 219. Weinschenk emphasized that some individuals, due to their personal circumstances, experience hurdles when attempting to obtain photo identification, id. at 215, a concern that remains relevant in the instant case. Obtaining photo identification requires appropriate documentation, time, and the ability to navigate bureaucracies. Id. "Those things that require substantial planning in advance of an election to preserve the right to vote can tend to 'eliminate from the franchise a substantial number of voters who did not plan so far ahead.'" Id. (quoting Harman v. Forssenius, 380 U.S. 528, 539-40 (1965)). For these reasons, the dissenting opinion's first proposed remedy poses constitutional concerns and could not have been adopted by this Court."

101. Governor Michael Parson signed HB 1878 into law on June 29, 2022.

102. The provisions of HB 1878 will go into effect on August 28, 2022.

103. HB 1878 introduces sweeping restrictions on voting rights, including new limitations upon voter identification, voter registration efforts, and absentee voting.

104. Plaintiffs challenge the provisions of HB 1878 that effectively require a specific form of photo ID for all in-person voting at the polling place on election day under amended § 115.427 and for in-person absentee voting under amended § 115.277 (the "Voter ID Restrictions").

105. HB 1878 repeals and amends certain voting identification provisions of § 115.427. The newly effective provisions of 115.427.1 will establish the following photo ID requirements:

> Persons seeking to vote in a public election shall establish their identity and eligibility to vote at the polling place or, if voting absentee in person under section 115.277, at the office of the election authority or other authorized location designated by the election authority by presenting a form of personal photo identification to election officials. No form of personal photo identification other than the forms listed in this section shall be accepted to establish a voter's qualifications to vote. Forms of personal photo identification that satisfy the requirements of this section are any one of the following:
> (1) Nonexpired Missouri driver's license;
> (2) Nonexpired or nonexpiring Missouri nondriver's license;
> (3) A document that satisfies all of the following requirements:
> (a) The document contains the name of the individual to whom the document was issued, and the name substantially conforms to the most recent signature in the individual's voter registration record;
> (b) The document shows a photograph of the individual;
> (c) The document includes an expiration date, and the document is not expired, or, if expired, the document expired after the date of the most recent general election; and > (d) The document was issued by the United States or the state of Missouri; or
> (4) Any identification containing a photograph of the individual which is issued by the Missouri National Guard, the United States Armed Forces, including the Space Force, or the United States Department of Veteran Affairs to a member or > former member of the Missouri National Guard or the United States Armed Forces, including the Space Force, and that is not expired or does not have an expiration date.

106. HB 1878 establishes a new requirement that persons voting absentee in person under § 115.277, at the office of the election authority or other authorized location designated by the election authority, must also show an acceptable form of personal photo ID.[3]

107. HB 1878 also repeals the previously available alternative secondary ID options under § 115.427 (2016) that were preserved by the Priorities court, which allowed a voter to cast a regular, non-provisional ballot if they signed an affidavit and could present certain specified secondary forms of ID (e.g., a voter registration card, a Missouri student ID, or a copy of a utility bill or bank statement).

108. Sections 115.427.2–4 and 115.427.3, as amended, provide the provisional ballot process for a voter who does not present the required photo ID at the polling place. To be counted, the affidavit on the provisional ballot envelope must be complete, must be signed by the voter, must be signed by a poll worker from each political party. Id.

109. A provisional ballot cast under this section shall not be counted unless the voter returns during polling hours with a valid and acceptable form of personal photo ID, or "[t]he election authority verifies the identity of the individual by comparing that individual's signature to the signature on file with the election authority and determines that the individual was eligible to cast a ballot at the polling place where the ballot was cast." § 115.427.2–.4.

110. A voter who casts a provisional ballot must incur the additional burden of retrieving their acceptable form of photo ID, assuming they have one, and making another trip to the polling place before the polls close on election day or subject their fundamental right to vote to the vagaries of an entirely subjective, standardless, unreliable, and arbitrary signature-matching process and ensure the affidavit on the provisional ballot envelope is complete and signed by multiple individuals.

111. HB 1878 requires all in-person voters to provide an acceptable form of photo ID to cast a regular, non-provisional ballot.

112. The Voter ID Restrictions do not provide any exceptions for voters who face barriers to obtaining a current Missouri or federal photo ID for various reasons, such as voters who are disabled, ill, elderly, hold religious objections, lack the underlying documentation necessary to get a state ID, or lack transportation or ability to get to a motor vehicle office.

113. By imposing a substantial and severe burden on the fundamental right to vote under the Missouri Constitution, the Voter ID Restrictions suffer from the same infirmities that the Missouri Supreme Court addressed in Weinschenk and Priorities and are therefore unconstitutional.

114. HB 1878 also amends current § 115.417.5 to eliminate existing requirements that the Secretary of State provide "advance notice" of personal identification requirements, including "at a minimum, the use of advertisements and public service announcements in print, broadcast television, radio, and cable television media, as well as the posting of information on the opening pages of the official state internet websites of the secretary of state and governor."

115. Amended § 115.417.5 merely requires that "[t]he secretary of state shall provide notice of the personal photo identification requirements described in subsection 1 of this section on the official state internet website of the secretary of state."

116. HB 1878 repeals current § 115.417.3, removing language providing for appropriation of implementation costs from the general revenue of state funds.

117. As a result of the elimination of State outreach and funding requirements under HB 1878, the Missouri NAACP and the LWVMO have been and will continue to shift their resources to provide education and assistance to their members and the public regarding the Voter ID Restrictions.

118. The Voter ID Restrictions will cause confusion to voters leading up to and during the upcoming November 2022 Missouri statewide General Election and future elections, particularly as they are being enacted mid-way through the 2022 election cycle.

119. The Voter ID Restrictions will result in disenfranchisement of eligible voters during the upcoming November 2022 Missouri statewide General Election and future elections.

120. The November 2022 Missouri statewide General Election ballot will include elections for the offices of U.S. Senator, U.S. Representative, State Senator, State Representative, State Auditor, Justices of the Missouri Supreme Court, and intermediate appellate court judges, along with local office and ballot measures.

The Voter ID Restrictions Impose a Severe and Substantial Burden Upon the Fundamental Right to Vote

121. An individual seeking to obtain personal photo ID in order to vote will need to obtain underlying documentation, which may include: (a) a birth certificate; (b) a marriage license or certificate; (c) a divorce decree; (d) a certificate of decree of adoption; (e) a court order changing the person's name; (f) a social security card reflecting an updated name; and/or (g) naturalization papers or other documents from the United States Department of State proving citizenship.

122. Obtaining underlying documentation needed to apply for personal photo ID acceptable for voting may require the voter to identify, determine the requirements of, communicate with, and visit various federal, state, and local agencies, such as the local health or vital records departments, the Missouri Department of Health and Senior Services, the Recorder of Deeds for the applicable county, the Circuit Court for the applicable county, the Social Security Administration, and the United States Department of State.

123. The Voter ID Restrictions do not provide any exception or alternative for eligible voters who are unable to obtain the underlying documentation or undertake the process to get an ID at a Missouri motor vehicle office to cast a regular, non-provisional ballot in person.

124. Although amended § 115.427.6 provides generally that an individual may obtain one free copy of a nondriver's license and of certain specific underlying documents for voting purposes and "may request the secretary of state to facilitate the acquisition of such documents," the statute does not provide specific guidance on how an individual may make or the Secretary of State may fulfill such a request nor would this cover someone who possesses such identification but lost or misplaced it or cannot locate it because it has been destroyed (e.g., in a fire or flood).

125. Amended § 115.427.6 does not provide for a free copy of a driver's license for voting purposes.

126. Hundreds of thousands of Missouri voters are likely to be impacted by the Voter ID Restrictions.

127. A February 2017 No-Match Analysis conducted at the request of Secretary of State Ashcroft comparing the voter rolls against those with state IDs on file with the Missouri Department of Revenue found: 137,723 registered voters in Missouri did not have a Department of Revenue ID (i.e., a driver's license, non-driver's license, or instruction permit); 140,073 registered voters had an expired Department of Revenue ID (i.e., a driver's or non-driver's license); and 2,040 registered voters had forfeited their driver's licenses.

128. The Voter ID Restrictions will likely increase the number of provisional ballots cast and lead to voter confusion. See L.R. No. 4557S.05T, Comm. on Leg. Research, Oversight Division, Fiscal Note (HB 1878), at 14 (June 3, 2002) ("Requiring photo ID for voters would likely increase the amount of provisional votes cast which would need to be processed by election board staff within the certification period…This provisions also eliminates the duty of the SOS to inform the public of the new ID requirement; lack of information would likely lead to confusion on the part of the voter; and lead to casting of more provisional ballots.").

129. The Secretary of State previously noted that provisional ballots are not an acceptable substitute for voters lacking appropriate ID because they are so rarely counted. For example, "[i]n the 2012 Presidential Election, fewer than 3 in 10 provisional ballots were counted." Office of the Missouri Secretary of State, House Bill 1073 Impact Report: The Effect on Missouri Voters, at 4 (Feb. 2014), https://www.sos.mo.gov/CMSImages/NewsReleases/2014ImpactReport.pdf.

130. A study of votes in recent elections "shows that strict photo identification laws have a differentially negative impact on the turnout of Hispanics, Blacks, and mixed-race Americans in primaries and general elections. Voter ID laws skew democracy in favor of whites and those on the political right." Zoltan Hajnal, et al., Voter Identification Laws and the Suppression of Minority Votes, 79 J. OF POLITICS 2 (2017).

131. The Voter ID Restrictions will require Plaintiff Ms. Powell to expend substantial time, effort, and planning to obtain a new photo ID in compliance with the Voter ID Restrictions, including arranging transportation, determining and complying with bureaucratic requirements, and making physical efforts to visit and wait at the appropriate agencies. If she does not engage in efforts to navigate bureaucracies and undertake the processes of acquiring the proper documentation and applying for a photo ID, Ms. Powell will be prevented from exercising her fundamental right to vote.

132. The Voter ID Restrictions will require Plaintiff Ms. Morgan to expend substantial time, effort, and planning in order to obtain underlying documentation and a photo ID that reflects her correct legal name and complies with the new law. If she does not engage in efforts to navigate bureaucracies and undertake the same time-consuming and confusing processes of acquiring the proper underlying documentation and applying for a photo ID, Ms. Morgan will be prevented from exercising her fundamental right to vote.

133. Upon information and belief, members of the Missouri NAACP and the LWVMO do not have acceptable photo ID that complies with the Voter ID Restrictions and will be prohibited from voting in future elections.

134. Upon information and belief, members of the Missouri NAACP and the LWVMO face uncertainty and confusion about the scope and requirements of the Voter ID Restrictions and will be dissuaded from exercising their right to vote.

135. Plaintiffs the Missouri NAACP and the LWVMO and other civic organizations are diverting resources, and will continue to do so, to educate and assist their members and eligible voters throughout Missouri to address confusion, uncertainty, and compliance with the Voter ID Restrictions.

136. The Missouri NAACP will be preparing public service announcements to air on local radio stations to educate their members and others in the community about the Voter ID Restrictions.

137. The Missouri NAACP is involved in the creation of ID assistance clinics that will help those who need acceptable forms of ID for voting obtain them.

138. The Missouri NAACP will develop educational materials to distribute to members and the public related to the Voter ID Restrictions. These materials would typically focus on increasing voter turnout and educating members on substantive issues in upcoming elections, but resources will now have to be shifted from those efforts to inform the public about the Voter ID Restrictions.

139. The LWVMO is preparing to participate in education, outreach, and other trainings to inform its members and the community about the Voter ID Restrictions.

140. The first page of the LWVMO's current website has a prominent message about HB 1878 and the Voter ID Restrictions.

141. The LWVMO plans to create additional paid media communications to notify members and other voters about the Voter ID Restrictions.

142. The LWVMO will train interested members on the availability of resources to help registered voters who lack the necessary underlying documents to obtain an acceptable photo ID for voting.

The Voter ID Restrictions Cannot Satisfy Any Level of Scrutiny

143. The Voter ID Restrictions impose severe and substantial burdens on the fundamental right to vote which are not justified by a sufficient state interest.

144. No change in any purported state interest has occurred since the Missouri Supreme Court held in Weinschenk that "the Photo–ID Requirement could only prevent a particular type of voter fraud that the record does not show is occurring in Missouri, yet it would place a heavy burden on the free exercise of the franchise for many citizens of this State." Weinschenk, 203 S.W.3d at 218 (finding that photo ID requirement was not narrowly tailored to accomplish purpose of preventing voter impersonation fraud); see also Priorities, 591 S.W.3d at 455 (finding affidavit requirement scheme did "not pass muster under any level of scrutiny").

145. While legislative proponents have cited the prevention of voter fraud as the purported justification for the Voter ID Restrictions, there has been no evidence of voter impersonation fraud at the polls in the past twenty years since Missouri introduced its first voter ID law in 2002.

146. To the contrary, Secretary of State Ashcroft repeatedly confirmed that the most recent General Election in 2020 was "secure[]"[4] and "successful"[5] despite the many challenges to voting presented by the COVID-19 pandemic. Two rare cases of alleged voter fraud in Missouri in the 2020 election involved allegedly double voting rather than voter impersonation fraud, the only irregularity potentially addressed by the Voter ID Restrictions, and "Secretary Ashcroft is confident these isolated issues are not indicative of problems with Missouri elections."[6]

147. The Voter ID Restrictions are not narrowly tailored to combating voter impersonation fraud, which is virtually non-existent in Missouri.

148. Additionally, HB 1878 eliminates the requirement under the pre-amended version of § 115.427.8, RSMo (2016), that voters sign a precinct register. This existing signature requirement already provided a safeguard for confirming a voter's identity and qualification to vote. Priorities, 591 S.W.3d at 457 (finding that precinct register requirement made affidavit for voters presenting alternate forms of non-photo ID futile).

COUNT I

The Voter ID Restrictions Violate Fundamental Right to Vote under the Missouri Constitution

149. Plaintiffs reallege and incorporate by reference the allegations of the preceding paragraphs.

150. The Missouri Constitution expressly guarantees that "all elections shall be free and open; and no power, civil or military, shall at any time interfere to prevent the free exercise of the right of suffrage." Mo. Const. Art. I, § 25.

151. The Missouri Constitution provides an exclusive list of qualifications necessary to vote in Missouri. Mo. Const. Art. VIII, § 2 ("All citizens of the United States ... over the age of eighteen who are residents of this state and of the political subdivision in which they offer to vote are entitled to vote at all elections by the people, if ... they are registered within the time prescribed by law").

152. The Voter ID Restrictions burden fundamental voting rights in violation of Article I, § 25 of the Missouri Constitution by eliminating the option to provide certain alternative non-photographic forms of ID to vote, and requiring qualified Missouri voters, including Plaintiffs Ms. Powell and Ms. Morgan and members of the Missouri NAACP and the LWVMO, to either: (i) present a limited form of photo ID, which requires significant time, effort, and advance planning to obtain; or (ii) cast a provisional ballot, which will be subject to an arbitrary review process and the risk of rejection. Weinschenk, 203 S.W.3d 201; Priorities, 591 S.W.3d 448.

153. There is no compelling state interest that justifies the burdens upon the fundamental right to vote imposed by the Voter ID Restrictions.

154. The Voter ID Restrictions constitute an unconstitutional scheme that cannot withstand judicial scrutiny, as confirmed in Weinschenk, 203 S.W.3d 201 and Priorities, 591 S.W.3d 448.

155. Plaintiffs expressly state that they are not asserting or attempting to assert any claim under the United States Constitution or any federal statute.

156. Plaintiffs face irreparable injury to their—and, for Plaintiffs the Missouri NAACP and the LWVMO, their members'—fundamental right to vote absent an injunction of the Voter ID Restrictions.

COUNT II

The Voter ID Restrictions Unduly Burden the Fundamental Right to Vote in Violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Missouri Constitution

157. Plaintiffs reallege and incorporate by reference the allegations of the preceding paragraphs.

158. Article I, Section 2 of the Missouri Constitution provides that "all persons are created equal and are entitled to equal rights and opportunity under the law."

159. The Voter ID Restrictions impose severe and substantial burdens on the fundamental right to vote of a significant number of eligible voters that are neither justified by, nor necessary to promote any substantial or compelling state interest that is not already being adequately protected by existing election laws and procedures, or which could not have been advanced using other, less restrictive and less burdensome alternatives.

160. Defendants have not advanced any substantial or compelling state interest that justifies the severe burdens imposed by the Voter ID Restrictions upon Missouri voters, including Plaintiffs Ms. Powell and Ms. Morgan and members of Plaintiffs the Missouri NAACP and the LWVMO, who do not possess an acceptable form of photo ID.

161. The Voter ID Restrictions are not strictly necessary nor narrowly tailored to any State interest.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

162. The Voter ID Restrictions will disproportionately impact protected classes of people, particularly voters who are people of color and voters with disabilities.

163. The Voter ID Restrictions have deprived and will continue to deprive Missouri voters of fundamental rights secured to them by the Missouri Constitution. Plaintiffs expressly state that they are not asserting or attempting to assert any claim under the United States Constitution or any federal statute.

164. The Missouri NAACP and the LWVMO are membership organizations and protecting voting rights and increasing voter participation is germane to their purpose.

165. The Missouri NAACP and the LWVMO have already and will continue to divert resources to educate and assist their members and eligible voters throughout Missouri to address confusion, uncertainty, and compliance with the Voter ID Restrictions.

WHEREFORE, Plaintiffs pray this Court:

A. Enter a declaratory judgment that the Voter ID Restrictions imposed by HB 1878, to be codified at § 115.427, RSMo and § 115.277, RSMo, violate the Missouri Constitution both facially and as applied and may not be enforced;

B. Issue a permanent injunction prohibiting Defendants and anyone acting in concert with them from enforcing the Voter ID Restrictions imposed by HB 1878, to be codified at § 115.427, RSMo and § 115.277, RSMo; and

C. Allow such other and further relief as is proper under the circumstances.

Prisoner case - Habeas - Death Penalty. For the court's prior opinion vacating dismissal of two of Dansby's claims and remanding the matter for further consideration, see Dansby v. Hobbs, 766 F.3d 809 (8th Cir. 2014). On remand, the district court denied relief with respect to Dansby's murder convictions, but granted relief from the death sentence and ordered the state to stipulate to a sentence of life imprisonment. Both sides appeal. The Arkansas Supreme Court's decision concerning the scope of cross-examination of a government witness did not contravene or unreasonably apply Supreme Court precedent by concluding that the balance struck by the trial court was permissible under the Sixth Amendment, and Dansby's Confrontation Clause claim did not merit relief; with respect to Dansby's Brady claim, the claim is procedurally defaulted, and Dansby showed neither cause nor prejudice to overcome the default; the grant of relief with respect to the sentence of death is reversed, and the case is remanded with directions to dismiss Dansby's second amended petition for a writ of habeas corpus.

In this class action, participants in a drug and alcohol recovery program alleged the program assigned them to work for defendant Hendren, a private company which paid the program for their services; plaintiffs alleged the defendants failed to pay them the required minimum wage; the district court concluded the plaintiffs were employees and granted them relief. Held: the state drug court judgments assigning the plaintiffs to the program did not present a Rooker-Feldman issue, and the district court had jurisdiction over the suit under the Class Action Fairness Act; the plaintiffs in the suit were the primary benefits of the unusual work and payment arrangements between the program and Hendren in that it allowed them to avoid adjudication in the criminal justice system, and the fact that the work they performed as participants in a court-ordered recovery program also benefited Hendren did not make the program participants employees of either the program or Hendren; as the plaintiffs were not employees, the district court judgment is reversed.

Civil case - Civil rights. Plaintiffs, a transgender youth, their parents, and two healthcare professionals, sought to enjoin Arkansas Act 626, which prohibits healthcare professionals from providing gender transition procedures to any individual under the age of 18 or from referring any such individual to any healthcare professional for gender transition procedures; the district court enjoined the Act, and the State appeals. Held: plaintiffs had standing to bring the suit; because a minor's sex at birth determines whether or not the minor can receive certain types of medical care under the law, Act 626 discriminates on the basis of sex and, as such, the statute must be supported by an exceedingly persuasive justification; the record at this stage of the proceedings provides substantial evidence to support the district court's factual findings that the Act prohibits medical treatment that conforms with the recognized standard of care for adolescent gender dysphoria, that such treatment is supported by medical evidence that has been subjected to rigorous study, and that the purpose of the Act is not to ban a treatment but to ban an outcome the State deems undesirable; as a result, the district court did not err in concluding the Act is not substantially related to the State's interest in protecting children from experimental treatment and regulating medical ethics, and plaintiffs have demonstrated a likelihood of success on their equal protection claim; the balance of the equities also favored plaintiffs; the district court did not abuse its discretion in granting a facial injunction.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms, and Explosives

27 CFR Parts 447, 478, and 479

RIN 1140–AA54

Definition of "Frame or Receiver" and Identification of Firearms

AGENCY: Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms, and Explosives, Department of Justice.

ACTION: Notice of proposed rulemaking; request for comment.

SUMMARY: The Department of Justice ("Department") proposes amending Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms, and Explosives ("ATF") regulations to provide new regulatory definitions of "firearm frame or receiver" and "frame or receiver" because the current regulations fail to capture the full meaning of those terms. The Department also proposes amending ATF's definitions of "firearm" and "gunsmith" to clarify the meaning of those terms, and to provide definitions of terms such as "complete weapon," "complete muffler or silencer device," "privately made firearm," and "readily" for purposes of clarity given advancements in firearms technology. Further, the Department proposes amendments to ATF's regulations on marking and recordkeeping that are necessary to implement these new or amended definitions.

DATES: Written comments must be postmarked and electronic comments must be submitted on or before August 19, 2021. Commenters should be aware that the electronic Federal Docket Management System will not accept comments after Midnight Eastern Time on the last day of the comment period.

ADDRESSES: You may submit comments, identified by docket number ATF 2021R–05, by any of the following methods—

SUPPLEMENTARY INFORMATION:

I. Background

The Attorney General is responsible for enforcing the Gun Control Act of 1968 ("GCA"), as amended, and the National Firearms Act of 1934 ("NFA"), as amended.[1] This responsibility includes the authority to promulgate regulations necessary to enforce the provisions of the GCA and NFA. See 18 U.S.C. 926(a); 26 U.S.C. 7801(a)(2)(A), 7805(a). Congress and the Attorney General have delegated the responsibility for administering and enforcing the GCA and NFA to the Director of ATF, subject to the direction of the Attorney General and the Deputy Attorney General. See 28 U.S.C. 599A(b)(1); 28 CFR 0.130(a)(1)–(2). Accordingly, the Department and ATF have promulgated regulations implementing the GCA and NFA. See 27 CFR parts 478, 479.

Prior to passage of the GCA, the Federal Firearms Act of 1938 ("FFA") regulated all firearm parts. The FFA and implementing regulations defined the term "firearm" to mean "any weapon, by whatever name known, which is designed to expel a projectile or projectiles by the action of an explosive and a firearm muffler or firearm silencer, or any part or parts of such weapon." Public Law 75–785, 52 Stat. 1250 (1938); 26 CFR 177.10 (repealed) (emphasis added). The Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 repealed the FFA, replacing it with the GCA. Public Law 90–351, section 907, 82 Stat. 197 (1968). During debate on the GCA and related bills introduced to address firearms trafficking, Congress recognized that regulation of all firearm parts was impractical. Senator Dodd explained that "[t]he present definition of this term includes 'any part or parts' of a firearm. It has been impractical to treat each small part of a firearm as if it were a weapon. The revised definition substitutes the words 'frame or receiver' for the words 'any part or parts.'" See 111 Cong. Rec. 5527 (March 22, 1965).[2]

A "firearm" is defined by 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(3) to include not only a weapon that will, is designed to, or may readily be converted to expel a projectile, but also the "frame or receiver" of any such weapon. Because "frames" or "receivers" are included in the definition of "firearm," any person who engages in the business of manufacturing, importing, or dealing in frames or receivers must obtain a license from ATF. 18 U.S.C. 922(a)(1)(A); id. at 923(a). Each licensed manufacturer or importer must "identify by means of a serial number engraved or cast on the receiver or frame of the weapon, in such manner as the Attorney General shall by regulations prescribe, each firearm imported or manufactured by such importer or manufacturer."[3] 18 U.S.C. 923(i); see 27 CFR 478.92, 479.102. Licensed manufacturers and importers must also maintain permanent records of production or importation, as well as their receipt, sale, or other disposition of firearms, including frames or receivers. 18 U.S.C. 923(g)(1)(A); 27 CFR 478.122, 478.123.

A "frame or receiver" is the primary structural component of a firearm to which fire control components are attached.[4] While the GCA does not define the term ''frame or receiver,'' to implement the statute, the terms ''firearm frame or receiver'' and ''frame or receiver'' were defined in regulations several decades ago as that part of a firearm that provides housing for the hammer, bolt or breechblock, and firing mechanism, and which is usually threaded at its forward portion to receive the barrel. 27 CFR 478.11 (implementing GCA, Title I); 27 CFR 479.11 [5] (implementing GCA, Title II). The intent in promulgating these definitions was to provide guidance as to which portion of a firearm was the frame or receiver for purposes of licensing, serialization, and recordkeeping, thereby ensuring that a necessary component of the weapon could be traced if later involved in a crime.

[1] NFA provisions still refer to the "Secretary of the Treasury." 26 U.S.C. ch. 53. However, the Homeland Security Act of 2002, Public Law 107–296, 116 Stat. 2135 (2002), transferred the functions of ATF from the Department of the Treasury to the Department of Justice, under the general authority of the Attorney General. 26 U.S.C. 7801(a)(2); 28 U.S.C. 599A(c)(1). Thus, for ease of reference, this notice of proposed rulemaking refers to the Attorney General throughout.

It was found impractical to have controls over each small part of a firearm. Thus, this definition includes only the major parts of the firearm, that is, the frame or receiver."); S. Rep. No. 90–1097, at 2200 (April 29, 1968) (same).

At the time these definitions were published around 50 years ago, single-framed firearms such as revolvers and break-open shotguns were far more prevalent for civilian use than split/multi-piece receiver weapons, such as semiautomatic rifles and pistols with detachable magazines. Single-framed firearms incorporate the hammer, bolt or breechblock, and firing mechanism within the same housing. Years after these definitions were published, split/multi-piece receiver firearms, such as the AR–15 semiautomatic rifle (upper receiver and lower receiver), Glock semiautomatic pistols (upper slide assembly and lower grip module), and Sig Sauer P320 (M17/18 as adopted by the U.S. military) (upper slide assembly, chassis, and lower grip module), became popular.[6] Additionally, more firearm manufacturers began incorporating a striker-fired mechanism rather than a ''hammer'' in the firing design. With the rise in popularity of striker-fired Glock semiautomatic pistols in the mid-1980s, other manufacturers began incorporating a striker-fired mechanism, rather than a hammer, in semiautomatic handguns.[7]

A. ATF's Application of the Definitions To Split Frames or Receivers

Although ATF's regulatory definitions of ''frame or receiver'' do not expressly capture these types of firearms (i.e., split/multi-piece receivers) that now constitute the majority of firearms in the United States,[8] ATF's position has long been that the weapon ''should be examined with a view toward determining if [either] the upper or lower half of the receiver more nearly fits the legal definition of 'receiver,' '' and more specifically, for machineguns, whether the upper or lower portion has the ability to accept machinegun parts.[9] [10]

Since it began issuing firearm classifications under the GCA and NFA in private letter rulings and for criminal investigations, ATF has considered a variety of factors when examining firearms, including: (a) Which component the manufacturer intended to be the frame or receiver; (b) which component the firearms industry commonly considers to be the frame or receiver with respect to the same or similar firearms; (c) how the component fits within the overall design of the firearm when assembled; (d) the design and function of the fire control components to be housed, such as the hammer, bolt or breechblock, and firing mechanism; (e) whether the component could permanently, conspicuously, and legibly be identified with a serial number and other markings in a manner not susceptible of being readily obliterated, altered, or removed, in accordance with regulations; (f) whether classifying the particular component is consistent with the legislative intent of the GCA and implementing regulations; and (g) whether classifying the component as the frame or receiver is consistent with ATF's prior classifications.

Even though neither the upper nor the lower portion of a split/multi-piece receiver firearm alone falls within the precise wording of the regulatory definition, ATF has for many years interpreted the regulatory definition using these factors as a guide in determining which portion of a weapon model is a firearm frame or receiver. Indeed, the current definitions were never intended to be, or understood to be, exhaustive; at the time the current definitions were adopted there were numerous models of firearms that did not contain a part that fully met the regulatory definition of ''frame or receiver,'' such as the Colt 1911, FN–FAL, and the AR–15/M–16, all of which were originally manufactured almost exclusively for military use, and ATF has long applied these factors in determining which component of those weapons qualifies as the frame or receiver.[11]

Existing law recognizes that the definition of ''frame or receiver'' need not be limited to a strict application of the regulation. The prefatory paragraph to the definitional section of 27 CFR 478.11 (Meaning of Terms) states: ''[w]hen used in this part and in forms

''frame'' means ''the basic structure and principal component of a firearm''); Steindler's New Firearms Dictionary p. 209 (1985) (''receiver'' means ''that part of a rifle or shotgun (excepting hinged frame guns) that houses the bolt, firing pin, mainspring, trigger group, and magazine or ammunition feed system. The barrel is threaded into the somewhat enlarged forward part of the receiver, called the receiver ring. At the rear of the receiver, the butt or stock is fastened. In semiautomatic pistols, the frame or housing is sometimes referred to as the receiver.'').

[5] The definition of ''frame or receiver'' in § 479.11 differs slightly from the definition in § 478.11 in that it omits an Oxford comma between ''bolt or breechblock'' and ''firing mechanism.''

Northrop, Feb. 2, 1973, p.2 (noting that there were 2,752,812 military versus 25,774 civilian (''Sporters'') serialization of AR–15/M–16 rifles then manufactured).

As Glock became popular, other manufacturers started using striker fire as well, proliferating it across the firearms manufacturing community on a grand scale.'').

No. 60, Hrg. Tr. Page ID 482 (''90 some percent of [semiautomatic pistols] do not have a part which has more than one of these four elements in it and, therefore, don't qualify, according to the definition in the CFR.'').

[9] ATF Internal Revenue Service Memoranda #21208 (Mar. 1, 1971) (lower portion of the M–16 is the frame or receiver because it comes closest to meeting the definition of frame or receiver in 26 CFR 178.11 (now 27 CFR 478.11), and is the receiver of a machinegun as defined in the NFA); ATF Memorandum #22334 (Jan. 24, 1977) (upper half of the FN FAL rifle is the frame or receiver because it was designed to accept the components that allow fully automatic fire). The ability to accept machinegun parts is considered because both the GCA and the NFA regulate machinegun receivers as ''machineguns.'' See 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(23); 26 U.S.C. 5845(b) (''The term ['machinegun''] shall also include the frame or receiver of any such weapon [which shoots is designed to shoot, or can be readily restored to shoot, automatically more than one shot, without manual reloading, by a single function of the trigger].'').

prescribed under this part, where not otherwise distinctly expressed or manifestly incompatible with the intent thereof, terms shall have the meanings ascribed in this section." [12] The intent of Congress, as indicated by the plain language and the statutory scheme of the GCA, is to regulate—as a firearm—the frame or receiver of a firearm. See 111 Cong. Rec. 5527 (March 22, 1965). As stated above, Congress replaced the term "part or parts" in the FFA definition of "firearm" with "frame or receiver," the major parts of a weapon regulated under the GCA. This includes marking these parts with serial numbers for tracing purposes, recording these parts as "firearms" in required records, and running a National Instant Criminal Background Check System ("NICS") background check when individuals purchase or acquire them.

In the past few years, however, some courts have treated the regulatory definition as exhaustive when applied to the lower portion of the AR–15-type rifle, which is the semiautomatic version of the M–16-type machinegun originally designed for the U.S. military. While ATF for decades has classified the lower receiver of the AR–15 rifle as a "frame or receiver," courts recently have read the regulatory definition to mean that the lower portion of the AR–15 is not a "frame or receiver" because it only provides housing for the hammer and firing mechanism, but not the bolt or breechblock. See United States v. Rowold, 429 F. Supp. 3d 469, 475–77 (N.D. Ohio 2019) ("The language of the regulatory definition in § 478.11 lends itself to only one interpretation: namely, that under the GCA, the receiver of a firearm must be a single unit that holds three, not two components: 1) the hammer, 2) the bolt or breechblock, and 3) the firing mechanism."); United States v. Jimenez, 191 F. Supp. 3d 1038, 1041 (N.D. Cal. 2016) ("[A] receiver must have the housing for three elements: hammer, bolt or breechblock, and firing mechanism."); United States v. Joseph Roh, SACR 14–167–JV, Minute Order p. 6 (C.D. Cal. July 27, 2020) (granting defendant's post-trial motion for acquittal for manufacturing AR–15 lower receivers without a license because "[n]o reasonable person would understand that a part constitutes a receiver where it lacks the components specified in regulation").

These courts' interpretation of ATF's regulations, if broadly followed, could mean that as many as 90 percent of all firearms now in the United States would not have any frame or receiver subject to regulation.[13] Those firearms would include numerous widely available models, such as Glock-type and Sig Sauer P320 [14] pistols, that do not utilize a hammer—a named component—in the firing sequence. Such a narrow interpretation of what constitutes a frame or receiver would allow persons to avoid: (a) Obtaining a license to engage in the business of manufacturing or importing upper or lower frames or receivers; (b) identifying upper or lower frames or receivers with a serial number and other traceable markings; (c) maintaining records of upper or lower frames or receivers produced or imported through which they can be traced; and (d) running NICS checks on potential transferees to determine if they are legally prohibited from receiving or possessing firearms when they acquire upper or lower frames or receivers. In turn, this would allow prohibited persons to acquire upper and lower receivers that can quickly be assembled into semiautomatic weapons more easily and without a background check.[15] If no portion of split/multi-piece frames or receivers were subject to any existing regulations, such as marking, recordkeeping, or background checks, law enforcement's ability to trace semiautomatic firearms later used in crime would be severely impeded. This result would thereby undermine the intent of Congress in requiring the frame or receiver of every firearm to be identified, see 18 U.S.C. 923(i), and regulated as a firearm, see 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(3)(B).[16]

B. Privately Made Firearms or "Ghost Guns"

Technological advances have also made it easier for unlicensed persons to make firearms at home from standalone parts or weapon parts kits, or by using 3D printers or personally owned or leased equipment, without any records or a background check. Commonly referred to as "ghost guns," these privately made firearms ("PMFs"), when made for personal use, are not required by the GCA to have a serial number placed on the frame or receiver, making it difficult for law enforcement to determine where, by whom, or when they were manufactured, and to whom they were sold or otherwise disposed.

In recent years, the number of PMFs recovered from crime scenes throughout the country has increased.[17] From January 1, 2016, through December 31, 2020, there were approximately 23,906 suspected PMFs reported to ATF as having been recovered by law enforcement from potential crime scenes, including 325 homicides or attempted homicides, and that were attempted to be traced by ATF, broken down by year as follows: [18]

[12] ATF's predecessor agency, the Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms Division within the Internal Revenue Service, derived this limitation on the application of definitions from the Internal Revenue Code ("IRC"), 26 U.S.C. 7701(a). Courts interpreting definitions in the IRC have not strictly applied those definitions where they would be manifestly incompatible with the intent of the applicable statute. See, e.g., Pierre v. Commissioner, 133 T.C. 24, 35 (2009) (even though a Limited Liability Company was not among any of the named entities defined in section 7701, it would be manifestly incompatible with the Federal estate and gift tax statutes to exclude them); Bunnel v. Commissioner, 50 T.C. 837, 841 (1968) (literal application of the definition of "taxpayer" in section 7701(a)(14) was avoided where it was manifestly incompatible with the intent of other sections of the IRC); Davis v. Commissioner, 30 T.C. 462, 466–67 (1958) (strict geographical application of the term "United States" in 26 U.S.C. 3797(a)(9) (now 7701(a)(9)) to the territory of American Samoa, rather than in a political sense, would be manifestly incompatible with the intent and purpose of the income tax exemption for persons earning income outside the United States).

It is, therefore, not unexpected that numerous Federal criminal cases have been brought by the Department to counter illegal trafficking in unserialized home-completed and assembled weapons, and possession of such weapons by prohibited persons.[19]

The problem of untraceable firearms being acquired and used by violent criminals and terrorists is international in scope. On May 28, 2019, citing intelligence reports by the Department of Homeland Security ("DHS"), the Federal Bureau of Investigation ("FBI"), and the National Counterterrorism Center ("NCTC"), the House Committee on Homeland Security issued a report concluding that "[g]host guns not only pose a challenge on the front end, enabling prohibited buyers to purchase deadly weapons with just a few clicks online, but also on the back end, hamstringing law enforcement's ability to investigate crimes committed with untraceable weapons" and that the "wide availability of ghost guns and the emergence of functional 3D-printed guns are a homeland security threat. Terrorists and other bad actors may seek to exploit the availability of these weapons for dangerous ends." H.R. Rep. No. 116–88, at 2 (May 28, 2019).[20] Criminal investigations and studies highlight this concern.[21]

are likely far lower than the actual number of PMFs recovered from crime scenes because some law enforcement departments incorrectly trace some PMFs as commercially manufactured firearms, or may not see a need to use their resources to attempt to trace firearms with no serial number or other identifiable markings. The term "suspected PMF" is used because of the difficulty of getting law enforcement officials to uniformly enter PMF trace information into ATF's electronic tracing system ("eTrace"), resulting in reporting inconsistencies of PMFs involved in crime. For example, often PMFs resemble commercially manufactured firearms, or incorporate parts from commercially manufactured firearms bearing that manufacturer's name, so some firearms suspected of being PMFs were entered into eTrace using a commercial manufacturer's name rather than as one privately made by an individual. The term "potential crime scenes" is used because ATF does not know if the firearm being traced by the law enforcement agency was found at a crime scene as opposed to one recovered by them that was stolen or otherwise not from at the scene of a crime. This is because the recovery location or correlated crime is not always communicated by the agency to ATF in the tracing process.

any investigation involving the criminal use of firearms.''); Blaustein & Reich, Inc. v. Buckles, 220 F. Supp. 2d 535, 537 (E.D. Va. 2002) (ATF has a statutory duty pursuant to the GCA to trace firearms to keep them out of the hands of criminals).[22] An accurate firearm description is necessary to trace a firearm and is required to be recorded by a person licensed to engage in the business of manufacturing, importing, or dealing in firearms, or by a licensed collector of curio or relic firearms, regardless of whether it is a business or personal firearm.[23]

ATF traces firearms found by law enforcement at a crime scene by first contacting the licensed manufacturer or importer marked on the frame or receiver who maintains permanent records of their manufacture or importation and disposition. Using the information obtained from those required records, ATF then contacts each licensed dealer or other licensee who recorded their receipt and disposition to locate the first unlicensed purchaser to help find the perpetrator or otherwise solve the crime.[24] However, because PMFs do not bear a serial number or other markings of a licensed manufacturer or importer, ATF has found it extremely difficult to complete such traces on behalf of law enforcement to individual unlicensed purchasers. From January 1, 2016, through March 4, 2021, ATF could only complete traces of suspected PMFs recovered by law enforcement to an individual purchaser in approximately 151 out of 23,946 attempts, generally by tracing a serial number engraved on a handgun slide, barrel, or other firearm part not currently defined as a frame or receiver, but recorded by licensees in the absence of other markings.[25]

With the proliferation of PMFs, ATF has also received numerous requests from licensees seeking clarity on how they may be accepted and recorded so that they can track their inventories, process warranty claims, reconcile any missing inventory, respond to trace requests, and report lost or stolen PMFs to police and insurance companies. Federal law and regulations require licensees, before conducting business, to inventory the firearms possessed for such business and record it in a Firearms Acquisition and Disposition Record (''A&D Record'').[26] After commencing business, licensees must record all firearms received and disposed of by the business in the A&D Record to include the following information separated into columns: Manufacturer and/or importer, model, serial no., type, and caliber or gauge.[27] When a firearm is disposed to an unlicensed person, licensees are required to complete a Firearms Transaction Record, ATF Form 4473 (''Form 4473'').[28] Like the A&D Record, this form requires licensees to record the manufacturer and importer, model (if designated), serial number, type, and caliber or gauge of the firearm. Licensees are also required by law to report the theft or loss of firearms on a Federal Firearms Licensee Theft/Loss Report, ATF Form 3310.11, which includes a description of the manufacturer, importer, model, serial number, type, and caliber/gauge of each firearm stolen or lost.[29] And when licensees sell or otherwise dispose of multiple pistols or revolvers within five consecutive business days to the same person, they must report to ATF the type, serial number, manufacturer, model, importer, and caliber on a Report of Multiple Sale or Other Disposition of Pistols and Revolvers, ATF Form 3310.4.[30]

However, because PMFs do not have markings identifying the name of a licensed manufacturer or importer, model, serial number, or caliber/gauge, licensees might only record a ''type'' of firearm (e.g., pistol, revolver, rifle, or shotgun) in their A&D Records and on ATF Forms 4473. Over time, as more PMFs are accepted into inventory, it will become increasingly difficult, if not impossible, for licensees and ATF (during inspections) to distinguish between those PMFs physically in the firearms inventory and those recorded in required A&D Records, as well as determine which PMFs recorded as disposed on ATF Form 4473, were those recorded as disposed in the A&D Record.[31] Likewise, it will be difficult for licensees and ATF to accurately determine which PMFs were stolen or lost from inventory, and for police to locate stolen PMFs in the business inventories of pawnbrokers,[32] or to return any recovered stolen or lost PMFs to their rightful owners.

Not only does the inability to distinguish between unmarked firearms

First, the marks are used by Federal firearms licensees to effectively track their firearms inventories and maintain all required records. Second, the marks enable law enforcement officers to trace specific firearms used in crimes from the manufacturer or importer to individual purchasers, and to identify particular firearms that have been lost or stolen. Further, marks help prove in certain criminal prosecutions that firearms used in a crime have travelled in interstate or foreign commerce.'').

[31] In United States v. Biswell, 406 U.S. 311, 315–16 (1972), the Supreme Court explained that ''close scrutiny of [firearms] traffic is undeniably of central importance to federal efforts to prevent violent crime and to assist the States in regulating the firearms traffic within their borders. Large interests are at stake, and inspection is a crucial part of the regulatory scheme, since it assures that weapons are distributed through regular channels and in a traceable manner and makes possible the prevention of sales to undesirable customers and the detection of the origin of particular firearms.'' AMERICAN OVERSIGHT make it extremely difficult for law enforcement to trace PMFs involved in crime, it also makes it more difficult for Federal, State, and local law enforcement to identify and prosecute illegal firearms traffickers who are often tied to violent criminals and armed narcotics traffickers.[33] The ATF Form 4473 is the primary evidence used to prosecute straw purchasers who buy firearms from a Federal firearms licensee on behalf of prohibited persons, such as felons, and other persons who could use them to commit a violent crime. The form is typically the key evidence that the straw purchaser who bought the firearm (and who can pass a background check) made a false statement to the Federal firearms licensee concerning the identity of the actual purchaser when acquiring that firearm, in violation of 18 U.S.C. 922(a)(6) and 924(a)(1)(A), or State law.[34] But as unmarked and difficult-to-trace PMFs proliferate throughout the marketplace, it is likely to become increasingly difficult to prove that firearms acquired under false pretenses on a Form 4473 were the ones found in the hands of the true purchaser—and thus more difficult to prosecute straw purchasers for making false statements.[35] This assumes, of course, that the PMF involved in the crime could even be traced to the Federal firearms licensee, or that the correct Form 4473 could be located. Likewise, the absence of identifying firearm information on multiple sales forms and theft/loss reports makes it more difficult for ATF to identify firearms traffickers and thieves.[36]

Although clarifying the definition of ''frame or receiver'' in this rule would help the firearms industry and the public understand which part of a complete weapon is the regulated ''frame or receiver,'' and more commercially manufactured frames or receivers are likely to be marked by licensed manufacturers as a result, PMFs are increasingly being made or 3D printed at home without any identifying marks, recordkeeping, or background checks. In turn, these firearms are progressively finding their way to licensees who may wish to acquire them so they can advertise and market them broadly, or who may repair, customize, or accept them as security in pawn for a loan. Rulemaking is therefore necessary to ensure that PMFs are not unlawfully manufactured for sale to licensees who may wish to acquire them for resale, or accept them as security in pawn for a loan, as this would undermine the important public safety goals of the GCA to reduce violent crime, which includes assisting State and local law enforcement in their efforts to control the traffic of firearms within their borders.[37] Indeed, several States and municipalities have banned or severely restricted unserialized or 3D printed firearms.[38]

II. Proposed Rule

Due to judicial developments as well as continued technological advancements in firearms manufacturing, maintaining the current definitions negatively affects both public safety and the regulated firearms industry. For these reasons, the Department proposes amending ATF's regulations to clarify the definition of ''firearm'' and to provide a more comprehensive definition of ''frame or receiver'' so that those definitions more accurately reflect firearm configurations not explicitly captured under the existing definitions in 27 CFR 478.11 and 479.11. Further, this NPRM proposes new terms and definitions to take into account technological developments and modern terminology in the firearms industry, as well as amendments to the marking and recordkeeping requirements that would be necessary to implement these definitions. However, nothing in this rule would restrict persons not otherwise prohibited from possessing firearms from making their own firearms at home without markings solely for personal use (not for sale or distribution) in accordance with Federal, State, and local law. Also, while licensed manufacturers who sell or distribute firearms to law enforcement agencies would be subject to this rule, law enforcement agencies (not engaged in the business of manufacturing firearms for sale or distribution) would be excluded from this rule, including associated amendments to the marking and recordkeeping requirements necessary to implement its definitions.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

A. Definition of "Firearm"

Under the GCA and implementing regulations, the term "firearm" includes:

"(A) any weapon (including a starter gun) which will or is designed to or may readily be converted to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive." 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(3); 27 CFR 478.11 (emphasis added). Although weapon parts kits in their unassembled, incomplete, and/or unfinished state or configuration generally will not expel a projectile by the action of an explosive at the time of sale or distribution, weapon parts kits that are "designed to" [39] or "may readily be converted" [40] to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive are "firearms" under the GCA.[41]

In recent years, individuals have been purchasing firearm parts kits with incomplete frames or receivers, commonly called "80% receivers," [42] either directly from manufacturers of the kits or retailers, without background checks or recordkeeping. Some of these parts kits contain most or all of the components (finished or unfinished) necessary to complete a functional weapon within a short period of time. Some of them include jigs, templates, instructions, drill bits, and tools that allow the purchaser to complete the weapon to a functional state with minimal effort, expertise, or equipment. Weapon parts kits such as these are "firearms" under the GCA because they are designed to or may readily be converted to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive.[43] Manufacturers of such parts kits must be licensed, abide by the marking and recordkeeping requirements, and pay Federal Firearms Excise Tax on their sales price.[44] Any Federal firearms licensee that sells such kits to unlicensed individuals would need to complete ATF Forms 4473, conduct NICS background checks, and abide by the recordkeeping requirements applicable to fully completed and assembled firearms.[45] Therefore, to reflect existing case law, this proposed rule would add a sentence at the end of the definition of "firearm" in 27 CFR 478.11 providing that "[t]he term shall include a weapon parts kit that is designed to or may readily be assembled, completed, converted, or restored to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive."

Nonetheless, this amendment is not intended to affect the classification of a weapon, including a weapon parts kit, in which each frame or receiver (as defined in this proposed rule) of such weapon is properly destroyed in accordance with ATF standards. Because such weapons have been completely destroyed or permanently redesigned not to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive, and cannot readily be converted to do so, ATF would not consider them as either "designed to" or "readily assembled, completed, converted, or restored to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive." To make this clear, this proposed rule would add another sentence to the end of the definition of "firearm" in 27 CFR 478.11 to provide that "[t]he term shall not include a weapon, including a weapon parts kit, in which each part defined as a frame or receiver of such weapon is destroyed." (see Section II.B.5 of the preamble)

B. Definition of "Frame or Receiver"

The proposed new regulatory definition of "frame or receiver" would be a multi-part definition added to 27

[39] See H.R. Rep. 90–1577, at 4416 (June 21, 1968) ("This provision makes it clear that so-called unserviceable firearms come within the definition."); S. Rep. No. 90–1097, at 2200 (April 29, 1968) (same). Numerous courts have held that weapons designed to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive are "firearms" under 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(3)(A) even if they cannot expel a projectile in their present form or configuration. See, e.g., United States v. Hardin, 889 F.3d 945, 946 (8th Cir. 2017) (pistol with broken trigger and numerous missing internal parts was a weapon designed to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive); United States v. Dotson, 712 F.3d 369 (7th Cir. 2013) (damaged pistol with corroded, missing and broken components); United States v. Rivera, 415 F.3d 284, 285–87 (2nd Cir. 2005) (pistol with a broken firing pin and flattened firing-pin channel); United States. v. Brown, 117 F.3d 353 (7th Cir. 1997) (no firing pin); United States v. Reed, 114 F.3d 1053 (10th Cir. 1997) (shotgun with broken breech bolt); United States v. Hunter, 101 F.3d 82 (9th Cir. 1996) (pistol with broken firing pin); United States v. Yannott, 42 F.3d 999, 1005 (6th Cir. 1994) (shotgun with broken firing pin); United States v. Ruiz, 986 F.2d 905, 910 (5th Cir. 1993) (revolver with hammer filed down); United States. v. York, 830 F.2d 885, 891 (8th Cir. 1987) (revolver with no firing pin and cylinder did not line up with barrel). But see United States v. Wada, 323 F. Supp. 2d 1079 (D. Or. 2004) (firearms redesigned as ornaments that "would take a great deal of time, expertise, equipment, and materials to attempt to reactivate" were no longer designed to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive and could not readily be converted to do so).

[40] See, e.g., United States v. Wick, 697 F. App'x 507, 508 (9th Cir. 2017) (complete UZI parts kits "could 'readily be converted to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive,' meeting the statute's definition of firearm under section 921(a)(3)(A)" because the "kits contained all of the necessary components to assemble a fully functioning firearm with relative ease"); United States v. Stewart, 451 F.3d 1071, 1073 n.2 (9th Cir. 2006) (upholding district court's finding that .50 caliber rifle kits with incomplete receivers were "firearms" under 921(a)(3)(A) because they could easily be converted to expel a projectile); United States v. Morales, 280 F. Supp. 2d 262, 272–73 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) (partially disassembled Tec-9 pistol that could be assembled within short period of time could readily be converted to expel a projectile).

[41] The plain language of the definition of "firearm" in 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(3)(A) states that a weapon need not function so long as it is designed to, or may readily be converted to, expel a projectile. Even though they generally cannot function to expel a projectile when sold, weapon parts kits are still "weapons"—real combat instruments, such as pistols, revolvers, rifles, or shotguns—in an unassembled, unfinished, and/or incomplete state or configuration. There is no minimum utility or lethality requirement in the GCA or NFA for an item to be considered a "weapon." Cf. United States v. Thompson/Center Arms, 504 U.S. 505, 513, n.6 (1992) (a rifle was "made" under the NFA when a pistol was packaged together with a disassembled rifle parts kit); United States v. Hunter, 843 F. Supp. 235, 256 (E.D. Mich. 1994) ("If Defendants believe that machinegun conversion kits are not in and of themselves 'weapons' under § 921(a)(3), they forget that that section clearly envisions machineguns as weapons."); United States v. Drasen, 845 F.2d 731, 736–37 (7th Cir. 1988) (rejecting argument that a collection of rifle parts cannot be a "weapon").

[42] The term "80% receiver" is a term used by some industry members, the public, and the media to describe a frame or receiver that has not yet reached a stage in manufacture to be classified as a "frame or receiver" under Federal law. However, that term is neither found in Federal law nor accepted by ATF.

[44] The Internal Revenue Code of 1954, 26 U.S.C. 4181, imposes on the manufacturer, producer, or importer an excise tax of 10% (pistols and revolver) or 11% (other firearms) on the sales price of firearms manufactured, produced, or imported, including complete, but unfinished, weapon parts kits. See Rev. Rul. 62–169 (IRS RRU), 1962–2 C.B. 245 (kits which contain all of the necessary component parts for the assembly of shotguns are complete firearms in knockdown condition even though, in assembling the shotguns the purchaser must 'final-shape,' sand, and finish the fore-arm and the stock); cf. Rev. Rul. 61–189 (IRS RRU), 1961–2 C.B. 185 (kits containing unassembled components and tools to complete artificial flies for fisherman were sporting goods subject to excise tax); Hine v. United States, 113 F. Supp. 340, 343 (Ct. Cl. 1953) ("True enough, [these fishing rod kits] might be called 'blanks' by those engaged in the trade, but what could they be called or to what practical use could they be put other than 'fishing rods?' Plaintiff says that it would be extremely difficult if not impossible to case with a 'blank' rod and this is true, but we can conceive of no other practical use for them except as fishing rods. . . . Having reached the stage of manufacture or development where they became recognizable as one of the sporting goods described in Section 3406(a)(1) the rods upon being sold were subject to tax even though there remained one or more finishing operations to be performed.") (citations omitted).

[45] Additionally, persons who engage in the business of selling or distributing such weapon parts kits cannot avoid licensing, marking, recordkeeping, or excise taxation by selling or shipping the parts in more than one box or shipment to the same person, or by conspiring with another person to do so. See, e.g., United States v. Evans, 928 F.2d 858 (9th Cir. 1991) (conspiracy to cause and aid and abet the possession of unregistered machineguns where one defendant sold parts kits containing all component parts of Sten machineguns except receiver tubes, and the other sold customers blank receiver tubes along with detailed instructions on how to complete them); Internal Revenue Service Technical Advice Memorandum 8709002, 1986 WL 372494, at 4 (Nov. 13, 1986) (for purposes of imposing Firearms Excise Tax it is irrelevant whether the components of a revolver in an unassembled knockdown condition are sold separately to the same purchaser in various related transactions, rather than sold as a complete kit in a single transaction).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

CFR 478.11 and 479.11 (referencing section 478.11). First, there would be a general definition of ''frame or receiver'' with non-exclusive examples that illustrate the definition. This would be followed by supplements that further explain the meaning of the term ''frame or receiver'' for certain firearm designs and configurations, as follows: (a) Firearm muffler or silencer frame or receiver; (b) split or modular frame or receiver, also followed by examples of the frames or receivers for common firearm designs that are distinguishable because of differences in firing cycle, method of operation, or physical design characteristics; (c) partially complete, disassembled, or inoperable frame or receiver; and (d) destroyed frame or receiver. Although the new definition would more broadly define the term ''frame or receiver'' than the current definition, it is not intended to alter any prior determinations by ATF of what it considers the frame or receiver of a particular split/modular weapon. ATF would also continue to consider the same factors when classifying firearms (see Section I.A of the preamble).

1. General Definition of ''Frame or Receiver''

ATF proposes to replace the respective regulatory definitions of ''firearm frame or receiver'' and ''frame or receiver'' in 27 CFR 478.11 and 479.11 because they too narrowly limit the definition of receiver with respect to most current firearms and have led to erroneous district court decisions. Indeed, most firearms currently in circulation in the United States do not have a specific part that expressly falls within the current ''frame or receiver'' regulatory definitions. Most concerning is that the interpretation of these definitions by some courts, relying on the current regulations, would make it easier to obtain the majority of existing firearms, including some of the most advanced semiautomatic weapons, without complying with the requirements of the GCA, and make it far more difficult to trace those firearms after a crime. Should the current definition remain in place and courts continue to interpret it such that no part or parts of most firearms are defined as the frame or receiver, these unserialized parts, easily purchased and assembled to create functioning firearms, would be untraceable, thereby putting the public at risk. While a ''frame or receiver'' is clearly within the statutory definition of what constitutes a ''firearm'' under the GCA, 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(3)(B), clarifying that this term includes how most modern-day firearms operate would help ensure that the regulatory definition of ''frame or receiver'' will not be misinterpreted by the courts, the firearms industry, or the public at large to mean that most firearms in circulation have no part identifiable as a frame or receiver.

As a threshold matter, the new definition makes clear that a ''frame or receiver'' must be visible to the exterior when the complete weapon is assembled so that licensees can quickly record the identifying markings, and law enforcement officers who recover the weapon can easily see the identifying markings for tracing purposes. Nonetheless, as explained in Section II.B.3 of the preamble, an internal frame or chassis at least partially exposed to the exterior to allow identification may be determined by ATF to be the frame or receiver of a split or modular frame or receiver.

Next, the new definition more broadly describes a ''frame or receiver'' as one that provides housing or a structure designed to hold or integrate any fire control component. Unlike the prior definitions of ''frame or receiver'' that were rigidly tied to three specific fire control components (i.e., those necessary for the firearm to initiate or complete the firing sequence), the new regulatory definition is intended to be general enough to encompass changes in technology and parts terminology. With respect to the fire control components housed by the frame or receiver, the definition would include, at a minimum, any housing or holding structure for a hammer, bolt, bolt carrier, breechblock, cylinder, trigger mechanism, firing pin, striker, or slide rails. However, the definition is not limited to those particular fire control components.[46] There may be future changes in firearms technology or terminology resulting in housings or holding structures for new or different components that initiate, complete, or continue the firing sequence of weapons that expel a projectile by the action of an explosive. For further clarity, the definition would then give four nonexclusive examples with illustrations of common single-framed firearms: (1) Hinged or single frame revolver (structure to hold the trigger, hammer, and cylinder); (2) bolt-action rifle (structure to hold the bolt and firing pin, and attach the trigger mechanism); (3) break action, lever action, or pump action rifle or shotgun (housing for the bolt and firing pin, or a structure designed to integrate the breechblock); and (4) semiautomatic firearm or machinegun with a single receiver housing all fire control components (housing for the hammer, bolt, trigger mechanism, and firing pin, e.g., AK-type firearms).

Finally, the definition would make clear to persons who may acquire or possess a part now defined as a ''frame or receiver'' that is identified with a serial number that they must presume, absent an official determination by ATF or other reliable evidence to the contrary, that the part is a firearm ''frame or receiver'' without further guidance.

2. Firearm Muffler or Silencer Frame or Receiver

Under the GCA, licensed manufacturers and importers must identify the frame or receiver of each firearm, including a firearm muffler or silencer, with a serial number in accordance with regulations. 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(3)(C), 923(i). The NFA requires firearm manufacturers, importers, and makers to identify each firearm, including a firearm muffler or silencer, with a serial number and such other identification as may be prescribed by regulations. 26 U.S.C. 5842(a); id. at 5845(a)(7). Because under the NFA each individual part of a firearm muffler or silencer is a ''firearm'' [47] that must be registered in the National Firearms Registration and Transfer Record (''NFRTR''), the regulations currently assume that every part defined as a silencer must be marked in order to be registered, and expressly require that they be marked whenever sold, shipped, or otherwise disposed even though they may be installed by a qualified licensee within a complete muffler or silencer device.[48]

However, this result has caused confusion and concern among many silencer manufacturers because some silencer parts defined as ''silencers,'' such as baffles, are difficult to mark, and make little sense to mark for tracing purposes when the outer tube or

[46] The prefatory paragraph to the definitional sections in the GCA and NFA regulations explain that ''[t]he terms 'includes' and 'including' do not exclude other things not enumerated which are in the same general class or are otherwise within the scope thereof.'' 27 CFR 478.11, 479.11.

[47] A firearm ''muffler or silencer'' is defined to include ''any combination of parts'' designed and intended for the use in assembling or fabricating a firearm silencer or muffler and ''any part intended only for use in such assembly or fabrication.'' 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(24); 26 U.S.C. 5845(a)(7); 27 CFR 478.11; id. at 479.11. This rule defines the term ''complete muffler or silencer device'' not to say that individual silencer parts are not considered a firearm ''muffler or silencer'' subject to the requirements of the NFA, but to advise industry members when those individual silencer parts must be marked and registered in the NFRTR when they are used in assembling or fabricating a muffler or silencer device.

housing of the complete device is marked and registered. Not only is it difficult for manufacturers to apply identifying markings, there is also the administrative difficulty in timely filing and processing numerous ATF Forms 2, Notice of Firearms Manufactured or Imported upon manufacture of each part, and ATF Forms 3, Application for Tax-Exempt Transfer of Firearm and Registration to Special Occupational Taxpayer upon sale or other disposition of each part to another qualified licensee.

For these reasons, ATF is proposing a number of amendments to clarify how and when firearm muffler or silencer parts must be marked and registered in the NFRTR. Among other changes (see Section II.H.9 of the preamble, below), this rule defines the term ''frame or receiver'' as it applies to a ''firearm muffler or silencer frame or receiver'' and adds the term ''complete muffler or silencer device'' (see Section II.D of the preamble). Under the NPRM, the term ''frame or receiver'' means, ''in the case of a firearm muffler or firearm silencer, a part of the firearm that, when the complete device is assembled, is visible from the exterior and provides housing or a structure, such as an outer tube or modular piece, designed to hold or integrate one or more essential internal components of the device, including any of the following: baffles, baffling material, or expansion chamber.'' These new definitions would clarify for manufacturers and makers of complete muffler or silencer devices that they need only mark each part (or specific part(s) previously determined by the Director) of the device defined as a ''frame or receiver'' under this rule. However, individual muffler or silencer parts must be marked if they are disposed of separately from a complete device unless transferred by qualified manufacturers to other qualified licensees for the manufacture or repair of complete devices (see Section II.H.9 of the preamble).[49]

ATF anticipates that, under this supplemental definition, the outer tube of a complete muffler or silencer device would be considered the frame or receiver with respect to most commercial silencer designs currently on the market. This is because the outer tube would be the only housing for essential internal components (e.g., baffles or baffling material) of the complete device. Marking the outer tube, as distinguished from a smaller non-housing component like an end cap that can be damaged upon expulsion of projectiles, best preserves the ability of law enforcement to trace the silencer device if used in crime, and is consistent with recommendations ATF has received from the firearms industry.[50]

Nonetheless, like the definition of ''frame or receiver'' for projectile weapons, this sub-definition would be flexible enough to encompass changes in technology and parts terminology. This is because any housing or structure designed to hold or integrate an essential internal component of the muffler or silencer device would meet the definition. While the proposed definition gives examples of internal components that manufacturers must consider as essential, e.g., baffles, baffling material, or expansion chamber, it is not limited to those particular components.[51]

3. Split or Modular Frame or Receiver

This second supplement explains that ATF may determine ''in the case of a firearm with more than one part that provides housing or a structure designed to hold or integrate one or more fire control or essential components'' whether one or more specific part(s) of a weapon is the frame or receiver, which may include an internal frame or chassis at least partially exposed to the exterior to allow identification. It then sets forth the factors ATF considers in making this determination: ''(a) Which component the manufacturer intended to be the frame or receiver; (b) which component the firearms industry commonly considers to be the frame or receiver with respect to the same or similar firearms; (c) how the component fits within the overall design of the firearm when assembled; (d) the design and function of the fire control components to be housed or integrated; (e) whether the component may permanently, conspicuously, and legibly be identified with a serial number and other markings in a manner not susceptible of being readily obliterated, altered, or removed; (f) whether classifying the particular component is consistent with the legislative intent of the Act and this part; and (g) whether classifying the component as the frame or receiver is consistent with the Director's prior classifications.'' No single factor is controlling. It would further make clear that ''[f]rames or receivers of different weapons that are combined to create a similar weapon each retain their respective classifications as frames or receivers provided they retain their original design and configuration.''

This supplement to the general definition addresses one of the core problems of the current definition of ''firearm frame or receiver;'' namely, that a majority of firearms now use a split or modular design in which more than one part houses a different fire control component and/or incorporates a striker instead of a hammer. It would make clear that even though a firearm, including a silencer, may have more than one part that falls within the definition of ''frame or receiver,'' ATF may classify a specific part or parts to be the ''frame or receiver'' of a particular weapon. For this reason, manufacturers may wish to submit samples to ATF for classification of one or more particular components as the frame or receiver so that they need only mark a specific part or parts of a weapon, rather than all qualifying parts (see Section II.H.10 of the preamble) or obtain a marking variance (see Section II.H.6 of the preamble). However, this supplemental definition would also make clear that ATF would not classify an internal frame or chassis as a ''frame or receiver'' unless it is at least partially exposed to the exterior to allow identification so that licensees accepting them into inventory can quickly record the identifying markings, and law enforcement officers who recover the weapon can easily see the identifying markings for tracing purposes.[52]

One important goal of this rule is to ensure that it does not affect existing ATF classifications of firearms that specify a single component as the frame or receiver. Application of the rule, as proposed, would not alter these prior

[50] In 2016, ATF issued an Advance Notice of Proposed Rulemaking in response to a petition for rulemaking from a firearms industry trade association recommending that regulations be amended to require that a silencer be marked on the outer tube (as opposed to other locations), unless a variance is granted by the Director on a case-by-case basis for good cause. See 81 FR 26764 (May 4, 2016).

[52] Markings must also be clearly visible from the exterior because they may be needed to prove that a criminal defendant had knowledge that the serial number was obliterated or altered. See, e.g., Lewis v. United States, No. 3:12–0522, 2012 WL 5198090, at *4 (M.D. Tenn. Oct. 19, 2012) (serial number obliterated on the ''visible exterior'' of a revolver); State v. Shirley, No. 107449, 2019 WL 2156402 (Ct. App. Ohio May 16, 2019) (same); cf. United States v. Sands, 948 F.3d 709, 719 (6th Cir. 2020) (serial number is not altered or obliterated so long as it is ''visible to the naked eye''); United States v. St. Hilaire, 960 F.3d 61, 66 (2d Cir. 2020) (''This 'naked eye test' best comports with the ordinary meaning of 'altered'; it is readily applied in the field and in the courtroom; it facilitates identification of a particular weapon; it makes more efficient the larger project of removing stolen guns from circulation; it operates against mutilation that impedes identification as well as mutilation that frustrates it; and it discourages the use of untraceable weapons without penalizing accidental damage or half-hearted efforts.'').

ATF classifications. To provide more clarity, this supplement to the definition would include a nonexclusive list of common weapons with a split/multi-piece frame or receiver configuration for which ATF has previously determined a specific part to be the frame or receiver. If a manufacturer produces or an importer imports a firearm falling within one of these designs as they exist as of the date of publication of a final rule, it can refer to this list to know which part is the frame or receiver. The manufacturer or importer can then mark without needing to ask ATF for a classification. The nonexclusive list identifies the frame or receiver for the following firearms: (i) Colt 1911-type, Beretta/Browning/FN Herstal/Heckler & Koch/Ruger/Sig Sauer/Smith & Wesson/Taurus hammer fired semiautomatic pistols; (ii) Glock-type striker fired semiautomatic pistols; (iii) Sig Sauer P320-type semiautomatic pistols; (iv) certain locking block rail system semiautomatic pistols; (v) AR–15-type and Beretta AR–70-type firearms; (vi) Steyr AUG-type firearms; (vii) Thompson M1A1-type machineguns and semiautomatic variants, and L1A1, FN FAL, FN FNC, MP 38, MP 40, and SIG 550 type firearms, and HK-type machineguns and semiautomatic variants; (viii) Vickers/Maxim, Browning 1919, and M2-type machineguns, and box-type machineguns and semiautomatic variants thereof; and (ix) Sten, Sterling, and Kel-tec Sub-2000-type firearms. However, if there is a present or future split or modular design for a firearm that is not comparable to an existing classification, then the definition of ''frame or receiver'' would advise that more than one part is the frame or receiver subject to marking and other requirements, unless a specific classification or marking variance is obtained from ATF, as described above.

4. Partially Complete, Disassembled, or Inoperable Frame or Receiver

This third supplement would define ''frame or receiver'' to include ''in the case of a frame or receiver that is partially complete, disassembled, or inoperable, a frame or receiver that has reached a stage in manufacture where it may readily be completed, assembled, converted, or restored to a functional state.'' To determine this status, ''the Director may consider any available instructions, guides, templates, jigs, equipment, tools, or marketing materials.'' For clarification, ''partially complete'' for purposes of this definition ''means a forging, casting, printing, extrusion, machined body, or similar article that has reached a stage in manufacture where it is clearly identifiable as an unfinished component part of a weapon.''

This supplement addresses another core challenge of the existing, definition of firearm ''frame or receiver;'' namely, that it does not address the question when an object becomes a frame or receiver. While the GCA and implementing regulations define a ''firearm'' to include the ''frame or receiver,'' neither delineates when a frame or receiver is created. The crucial inquiry, then, is the point at which an unregulated piece of metal, plastic, or other material becomes a regulated item under Federal law. ATF has long held that a piece of metal, plastic, or other material becomes a frame or receiver when it has reached a critical stage of manufacture. This is the point at which a substantial step has been taken, or a critical line crossed, so that the item in question may be so classified under the law. This ''critical stage of manufacture'' is when the article becomes sufficiently complete to function as a frame or receiver, or may readily be completed, assembled, converted, or restored to accept the parts it is intended to house or hold.[53]

Clarifying this issue is needed to deter the increased sale or distribution of unlicensed and unregulated partially complete or unassembled frames or receivers often sold within parts kits that can readily be completed or assembled to a functional state.[54] Many kits that include unfinished frame or receivers have been sold by nonlicensees who were not required to run a background check or maintain transaction records. Accordingly, prohibited persons have easily obtained them.[55] Moreover, without any markings, they are nearly impossible to trace. Although this addition is intended to capture when an item becomes a frame or receiver that is regulated irrespective of the type of technology used to complete the assembly, frame or receiver molds that can accept metal or polymer, unformed blocks of metal, and other articles only in a primordial state would not—without more—be considered a ''partially complete'' frame or receiver. However, when a frame or receiver is broken or has been disassembled into pieces that can readily be made into a frame or receiver, or is a partially complete frame or receiver forging, casting, or additive printing[56] that has reached a stage in manufacture where it can readily be made into a functional frame or receiver, that article would be a ''frame or receiver'' under the GCA.

5. Destroyed Frame or Receiver

This fourth supplement would exclude from the definition of ''frame or receiver'' any frame or receiver that is destroyed. The supplement describes what it means to be a ''destroyed'' frame or receiver: One permanently altered not to provide housing or a structure that may hold or integrate any fire control or essential internal component, and that may not readily be assembled, completed, converted, or restored to a functional state. This new definition then would set forth nonexclusive acceptable methods of destruction, which have been provided by ATF in past guidance.[57]

[56] ATF does not believe the production of 3D printed frames or receivers is substantial at this time when compared with commercially produced firearms. For the most part, individuals currently make PMFs from parts kits produced commercially, not by using 3D printers. However, the cost, capabilities, and availability of 3D printers are quickly improving.

C. Definition of "Readily"

To provide guidance on how the term "readily" is used to classify firearms, including frame or receiver parts kits or weapon parts kits sold with incomplete or unassembled frames or receivers, the NPRM adds this term to 27 CFR 478.11 and 479.11 and defined as "a process that is fairly or reasonably efficient, quick, and easy, but not necessarily the most efficient, speedy, or easy process." It would further list factors relevant in making this determining to include: (a) Time, i.e., how long it takes to finish the process; (b) ease, i.e., how difficult it is to do so; (c) expertise, i.e., what knowledge and skills are required; (d) equipment, i.e., what tools are required; (e) availability, i.e., whether additional parts are required, and how easily they can be obtained; (f) expense, i.e., how much it costs; (g) scope, i.e., the extent to which the subject of the process must be changed to finish it; and (h) feasibility, i.e., whether the process would damage or destroy the subject of the process, or cause it to malfunction. This definition and factors considered in determining whether a weapon, including a weapon parts kit, or unfinished or damaged frame or receiver may readily be assembled, completed, converted, or restored to function are based on case law interpreting the terms "may readily be converted to expel a projectile" in 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(3)(A) and "can be readily restored to shoot" in 26 U.S.C. 5845(b).[58] Thus, defining the term "readily" is necessary to provide further clarity in determining when incomplete weapons or configurations of parts become a "firearm" regulated under the GCA and NFA.

D. Definitions of "Complete Weapon" and "Complete Muffler or Silencer Device"

This proposed rule would add definitions for "complete weapon" and "complete muffler or silencer device" to 27 CFR 478.11 and 479.11. A "complete weapon" would be defined as "a firearm other than a firearm muffler or firearm silencer that contains all component parts necessary to function as designed whether or not assembled or operable." Likewise, a "complete muffler or silencer device" would be defined as "a firearm muffler or firearm silencer that contains all of the component parts necessary to function as designed whether or not assembled or operable." These definitions are needed to explain when a frame or receiver of a firearm, including a firearm muffler or silencer, as the case may be, must be marked.

E. Definition of "Privately Made Firearm"

The NPRM proposes adding a definition of "privately made firearm" to 27 CFR 478.11 to mean "[a] firearm, including a frame or receiver, assembled or otherwise produced by a person other than a licensed manufacturer, and without a serial number or other identifying markings placed by a licensed manufacturer at the time the firearm was produced." The term would not include a firearm identified and registered in the NFRTR pursuant to chapter 53, title 26, United States Code, or any firearm made before October 22, 1968 (unless remanufactured after that date). This proposed definition explains that PMFs are those firearms that were made by nonlicensees without the markings required by this part, and excludes those already marked and registered in the NFRTR, and any firearm made before enactment of the GCA which, unlike the repealed law it replaced, required all firearms to be marked under federal law.[59] The term "made" is incorporated within the term "privately made firearm" rather than "manufacture" to distinguish between firearms manufactured (or "made") by private individuals without a license and those manufactured by persons licensed to engage in the business of manufacturing firearms.[60]

F. Definition of "Importer's or Manufacturer's Serial Number"

The proposed rule would define the term "importer's or manufacturer's serial number" in 27 CFR 478.11 as: "[t]he identification number, licensee name, licensee city or state, or license number placed by a licensee on a firearm frame or receiver in accordance with this part. The term shall include any such identification on a privately made firearm, or an ATF issued serial number." Because "privately made firearms" are manufactured by someone other than a licensed manufacturer, the serial number that incorporates the abbreviated Federal firearms license ("FFL") number placed by a licensee on a PMF under this rule is the "importer's or manufacturer's serial number." This definition would help ensure that the serial numbers and other markings necessary to ensure tracing, including those placed by a licensee on a "privately made firearm" or marked with an ATF-issued serial number,[61] to include imported firearms, are considered the "importer's or manufacturer's serial number" protected by 18 U.S.C. 922(k), which prohibits their removal, obliteration, or alteration.[62]

Supp. 2d 262, 272–73 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) (partially disassembled Tec-9 pistol that could be assembled within a short period of time could readily be converted to expel a projectile); United States v. Catanzaro, 368 F. Supp. 450, 453 (D. Conn. 1973) (a sawed-off shotgun was "readily restorable to fire" where it could be reassembled in one hour and the necessary missing parts could be obtained at a Smith & Wesson plant); compare with United States v. Seven Miscellaneous Firearms, 503 F. Supp. 565, 574–75 (D.D.C. 1980) (weapons could not be "readily restored to fire" when restoration required master gunsmith in a gun shop and $65,000 worth of equipment and tools).

[59] The Federal Firearms Act of 1938 (repealed), the predecessor to the GCA, made it unlawful for a person to receive a firearm that had the manufacturer's serial number removed, obliterated or altered. 15 U.S.C. 902(i). Regulations promulgated to implement this law required each firearm manufactured after July 1, 1958, to be identified with the name of the manufacturer or importer, a serial number, caliber, and model. However, there was an exception from the serial number and model requirements for any shotgun or .22 caliber rifle unless that firearm was also subject to the NFA. 26 CFR 177.50 (rescinded).

[60] Both the GCA and NFA define the term "manufacturer" as any person "engaged in the business of manufacturing firearms," and the GCA further defines the term "licensed manufacturer" as "any such person licensed under the provisions of this chapter." 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(10); 26 U.S.C. 5845(m). The NFA further defines the term "make," and the various derivatives of that word, to include "manufacturing (other than by one qualified to engage in the business under this chapter), putting together, altering, any combination of these, or otherwise producing a firearm." 26 U.S.C. 5845(i).

[61] ATF occasionally issues serial numbers for placement on firearms in which the serial numbers were not originally placed, see 26 U.S.C. 5842(b), or were accidentally removed, damaged, or worn due to routine use or other innocent reason.

[62] In addition to Federal law, 18 U.S.C. 922(k) and 26 U.S.C. 5861(g), (h), (i), almost every state prohibits the removal, alteration, or obliteration of a firearm's serial number or possession of a firearm with a serial number that has been removed,

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

G. Definition of "Gunsmith" [63]

To provide greater access to professional marking, this proposed rule would clarify that the meaning of the term "gunsmith" includes persons who engage in the business of identifying firearms for nonlicensees so that gunsmiths may become licensed as dealer-gunsmiths solely to provide professional PMF marking services. Specifically, this proposed rule would amend the definition of "engaged in the business" as it applies to a "gunsmith" in 27 CFR 478.11 to clarify the meaning of that term as someone "who, as a service performed on existing firearms not for sale or distribution by a licensee, devotes time, attention, and labor to repairing or customizing firearms, making or fitting special barrels, stocks, or trigger mechanisms to firearms, or identifying firearms in accordance with this chapter, as a regular course of trade or business with the principal objective of livelihood or profit, but such term shall not include a person who occasionally repairs or customizes firearms, or occasionally makes or fits special barrels, stocks, or trigger mechanisms to firearms."

This amendment would make clear that businesses that routinely repair or customize existing firearms, make or fit special barrels, stocks, or trigger mechanisms, or mark firearms as a service performed on firearms not for sale or distribution by a licensee, may be licensed as dealer-gunsmiths rather than as manufacturers.[64] Under this rule, PMFs would first need to be recorded by the dealer-gunsmith as an acquisition in the licensee's A&D Records upon receipt from the private owner (whether or not the licensee keeps the PMF overnight), and once marked, the licensee would update the acquisition entry with the identifying information, and then record its return as a disposition to the private owner. This would ensure that the PMF, if ever found by police at a crime scene, can be traced. However, no ATF Form 4473 or NICS background check would be required upon return of the marked firearm to the person from whom it was received, pursuant to 27 CFR 478.124(a).

H. Marking Requirements for Firearms

1. Information Required To Be Marked on the Frame(s) or Receiver(s)

To properly implement the new definitions, this proposed rule would amend 27 CFR 478.92(a) and 479.102 to explain how and when markings must be applied on each part defined as a frame or receiver, particularly since there could be more than one part of a complete weapon, or complete muffler or silencer device, that is the frame or receiver (i.e., when ATF has not identified specific part(s) as the frame or receiver). After publication of a final rule, each frame or receiver of a new firearm design or configuration manufactured or imported after the date of publication of the final rule would need to be marked with a serial number, and either: (a) The manufacturer's or importer's name (or recognized abbreviation), and city and State (or recognized abbreviation) where the manufacturer or importer maintains their place of business, or in the case of a maker of an NFA firearm, where the firearm was made; or (b) the manufacturer's or importer's name (or recognized abbreviation), and the serial number beginning with the licensee's abbreviated FFL number as a prefix, which is the first three and last five digits followed by a hyphen, and then followed by a number (which may incorporate letters and a hyphen) as a suffix, e.g., "12345678–[number]." The serial number (with or without the FFL prefix) identified on each part of a weapon defined as a frame or receiver must be the same number, but must not duplicate any serial number(s) placed by the licensee on any other firearm.

The additional information required to be marked on each frame or receiver (i.e., name, city and state, or name and abbreviated serial number) would only apply to new designs or configurations of firearms manufactured or imported after publication of the rule. Licensed manufacturers and importers may continue to identify the additional information on firearms (other than PMFs) of the same design and configuration as they existed before [effective date of the rule] under the prior content rules, and any rules necessary to ensure such identification will remain effective for that purpose. This provision is intended to reduce production costs incurred by licensees.

Requiring Federal firearms licensees to mark in this manner on each part defined as a frame or receiver would make it possible for ATF to trace the firearm if the manufacturer's or importer's name, city, or state is marked on the slide or barrel, and the original components are later separated. At the same time, it would give an option for manufacturers and importers to avoid marking their city and state as currently required at §§ 478.92(a)(1)(ii)(D), (E) and 479.102(a)(1)(iv) and (v), or obtain a marking variance from this requirement, by allowing them to mark their abbreviated license number as a prefix to the serial number as an alternative because this information can be obtained by looking up the licensee's information. Except for silencer parts transferred by manufacturers to other qualified manufacturers and dealers for completion or repair of devices (see Section II.H.9 of the preamble), there would be no change to the existing requirement that each part defined as a machinegun or silencer that is disposed of separately and not part of a complete weapon or device be marked with all required information because individual machinegun conversion and silencer parts are "firearms" under the NFA that must be registered in the NFRTR. 26 U.S.C. 5841(a)(1); id. at 5845(a), (b). However, for frames or receivers, and individual machinegun conversion or silencer parts defined as "firearms" that are disposed of separately, the model designation and caliber or gauge may be omitted if it is unknown at the time the part is identified.

Va. Code section 18.2–311.1; Wis. Stat. section 943.37(3).

[63] The term "gunsmith" is not used in the GCA; however, the Firearm Owners' Protection Act, Public Law 99–308, amended the GCA to define "engaged in the business" as applied to dealers to clarify when gunsmiths must have a license. See 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(11)(B); id. at (a)(21)(D); 132 Cong. Rec. 9603–04 (May 6, 1986) (statement of Sen. McClure).

[64] By clarifying the definition of gunsmith to mean a service routinely performed on existing firearms that are not for sale or distribution by a licensee, this rule would supersede ATF Ruling 2010–10, which allows gunsmiths under specified conditions to engage in certain manufacturing activities for licensed manufacturers. This would eliminate a significant source of confusion among regulated industry members and the public as to who needs a license to manufacture firearms. See Broughman v. Carver, 624 F.3d 670 (4th Cir. 2010) (distinguishing dealer-gunsmiths from manufacturers).

2. Size and Depth of Markings

This proposed rule would not change the existing requirements for size and depth of markings in 27 CFR 478.92(a)(1) and 479.102(a), but for sake of clarity, consolidates them into a standalone paragraph along with the existing method of measuring the size and depth of markings set forth in 27 CFR 478.92(a)(5) and 479.102(b).

3. Period of Time To Identify Firearms

Neither the GCA nor the NFA explain at what point in the manufacturing process the required markings must be placed. In this regard, the proposed rule would make a distinction between the manufacture or making of a complete weapon or complete muffler or silencer device, and each part, including a replacement part, defined as a frame or receiver, machinegun, or firearm muffler or firearm silencer that is not a component part of a complete weapon or device at the time it is sold, shipped, or otherwise disposed. Complete weapons or complete muffler or silencer devices, as defined in this rule, would be allowed to be marked up to seven days from completion of the active manufacturing process for the weapon or device, or prior to disposition, whichever is sooner. Except for silencer parts produced by qualified manufacturers for transfer to other licensees to complete or repair silencer devices (see Section II.H.9 of the preamble), parts defined as a frame or receiver, machinegun, or firearm muffler or firearm silencer that are not component parts of a complete weapon or device when disposed of would be allowed to be marked up to seven days following the date of completion of the active manufacturing process for the part, or prior to disposition, whichever is sooner. Adding this language would codify ATF Ruling 2012–1, and this ruling would become obsolete upon publication of the rule. As explained in that ruling, whether the end product is to become a complete weapon or device, or a frame or receiver to be disposed of separately, firearms that are actively awaiting materials, parts, or equipment repair to be completed are still considered to be actively in the manufacturing process.

4. Marking of Privately Made Firearms

Because privately made firearms do not have the identifying markings required of commercially manufactured firearms, this rule proposes to amend 27 CFR 478.92 to require FFLs to mark, or supervise the marking of, the same serial number on each frame or receiver (as defined in this rule) of a weapon that begins with the FFL's abbreviated license number (first three and last five digits) as a prefix followed by a hyphen on any "privately made firearm" (as defined) that the licensee acquired (e.g., "12345678–[number]"). Unless previously identified by another licensee, PMFs acquired by licensees on or after the effective date of the rule would need to be marked in this manner within seven days of receipt or other acquisition (including from a personal collection), or before the date of disposition (including to a personal collection), whichever is sooner.[65] For PMFs acquired by licensees before the effective date of the rule, licensees would be required to mark or cause them to be marked by another licensee either within 60 days from that date, or before the date of final disposition (including to a personal collection), whichever is sooner. With respect to polymer firearms, including those that are produced using additive manufacturing (also known as "3D printing"), the method of marking would typically require the licensee to embed (or use pre-existing) metal serial number plates within the plastic to ensure they cannot be worn away during normal use.[66] Incorporation of this metal plate along with other metal components would also help ensure that the polymer firearm does not violate the Undetectable Firearms Act, 18 U.S.C. 922(p), which prohibits the manufacture and possession of firearms that are not as detectable as the "Security Exemplar" that contains 3.7 ounces of material type 17–4 PH stainless steel.[67]

PMFs currently in inventory that a licensee chooses not to mark may also be destroyed or voluntarily turned in to law enforcement within the 60-day period. Also, this proposed rule would not require Federal firearms licensees to accept any PMFs, or to mark them themselves. Licensees would be able to refuse to accept PMFs, or arrange for private individuals to have them marked by another licensee before accepting them, provided they are properly marked in accordance with this proposed rule. To provide greater access to professional marking, as stated previously, this rule would clarify that the meaning of the term "gunsmith" includes persons who engage in the business of identifying firearms for nonlicensees so that gunsmiths may become licensed as dealer-gunsmiths solely to provide professional PMF marking services.

Consistent with the language and purpose of the GCA, this proposed provision is necessary to allow ATF to trace all firearms acquired and disposed of by licensees, prevent illicit firearms trafficking, and provide guidance to FFLs and the public with respect to PMF transactions with the licensed community. This provision is crucial in light of advances in technology that allow unlicensed persons easily to produce firearms at home from parts ordered online, or by using 3D printers or personally owned or leased equipment. Such privately made firearms have and will continue to make their way to the primary market in firearms throughout the licensed community.[68] At the same time, consistent with the intent of the GCA,[69] nothing in this rule would restrict persons not otherwise prohibited from possessing firearms from making their own firearms at home without markings solely for personal use (not for sale or distribution) in accordance with Federal, State, and local law.[70] Persons should consult the laws and officials in their own States and localities to determine the lawfulness of PMFs.

[65] Under this rule, licensed collectors would only need to mark PMFs they receive or otherwise acquire that are defined as "curios or relics." See 27 CFR 478.11 (definitions of "firearm" and "curios or relics").

[66] When the size and depth of markings regulations were first promulgated, ATF recognized that "all markings can be removed by someone who wishes to make a deliberate effort to remove the markings. Realistically, we need to be concerned about markings that could be worn away during normal use or markings that could survive normal refinishing processes, e.g., blueing, plating, etc. . . . As such, ATF has required manufacturers and importers who use polymer plastic frames to mark serial numbers in a steel plate embedded within the plastic." 66 FR 40599 (Aug. 3, 2001).

[67] Handguns that are 3D printed are also subject to the registration and taxation requirements of the NFA if they have a smooth bore and are capable of being concealed on the person, thereby falling within the definition of "any other weapon." See 26 U.S.C. 5845(e).

[68] Under Federal law, for example, certain firearm transactions must be conducted through Federal firearms licensees. See 18 U.S.C. 922(a)(5) (prohibiting any person other than a licensee, subject to certain limited exceptions, from selling or delivering a firearm to an unlicensed out of state resident).

[69] See Public Law 90–351, sec. 901(b), 82 Stat. 227.

[70] This rule is also consistent with the Second Amendment. As the Supreme Court stated in District of Columbia v. Heller, 554 U.S. 570, 626–27 & n.26 (2008), "presumptively lawful regulatory measures" include those "imposing conditions and qualifications on the commercial sale of arms." See also United States v. Marzzarella, 614 F.3d 85, 99 (3d Cir. 2010) (concluding that even if strict scrutiny were to apply, 18 U.S.C. 922(k) (prohibiting possession of firearms with obliterated serial numbers) would be upheld under the Second Amendment because "serial number tracing serves a governmental interest in enabling law enforcement to gather vital information from recovered firearms. Because it assists law enforcement in this manner, we find its preservation is not only a substantial but a compelling interest.").

5. Meaning of Marking Terms

An additional amendment to 27 CFR 478.92 and 478.102 would clarify the meaning of the terms ''legible'' and ''legibly'' to ensure that ''the identification markings use exclusively Roman letters (e.g., A, a, B, b, C, c) and Arabic numerals (e.g., 1, 2, 3), or solely Arabic numerals, and may include a hyphen,'' and that the terms ''conspicuous'' and ''conspicuously'' are understood to mean that ''the identification markings are capable of being easily seen with normal handling of the firearm and unobstructed by other markings when the complete weapon is assembled.'' This would codify the meaning of those terms as explained in ATF Ruling 2002–6 (''legible''), and ATF's final rule at 66 FR 40599 (Aug. 3, 2001) (referencing U.S. Customs Service regulations on the definition of ''conspicuous'').

6. Alternate Means or Period of Identification

This proposed rule would not alter the Director's ability to authorize other means of identification, or a ''marking variance,'' for any part defined as a firearm (including a machinegun or silencer) upon receipt of a letter application or an Application for Alternate Means of Identification of Firearms (Marking Variance), ATF Form 3311.4, showing that such other identification is reasonable and does not hinder the effective administration of the regulations. The amendment would also allow ATF to grant a variance from the period in which to mark firearms.

7. Destructive Device Period of Identification

Similar to other firearms, because the proposed rule would now specify the seven-day grace period in which to mark all completed firearms, including destructive devices, this rule would also allow ATF to grant a variance from this period. The marking requirements for destructive devices are otherwise unchanged.

8. Adoption of Identifying Markings

This rule proposes to authorize licensed manufacturers and importers to adopt an existing serial number, caliber/gauge, model, or other markings already identified on a firearm provided they legibly and conspicuously place, or cause to be placed, on each part (or part(s) previously determined by the Director) defined as a frame or receiver either: Their name (or recognized abbreviation), and city and State (or recognized abbreviation) where they maintain their place of business; or their name (or recognized abbreviation) and their abbreviated FFL number, which is the first three and last five digits followed by a hyphen, and then followed by the existing serial number (including any other abbreviated FFL prefix) as a suffix, e.g., ''12345678–[serial number],'' to ensure the traceability of the firearm. This language would supersede ATF Ruling 2013–3 as it applies to licensed manufacturers and importers, but the ruling would remain effective for makers of NFA firearms. This change would help avoid multiple markings on firearms that could be confusing to law enforcement and alleviate concerns of some manufacturers and importers regarding serial number duplication when firearms are remanufactured or reimported.

9. Firearm Muffler or Silencer Parts Transferred Between Qualified Licensees

Licensed and qualified firearm muffler or silencer manufacturers routinely transfer small internal muffler or silencer components to each other to produce complete devices, and between qualified licensees when repairing existing devices. Because of the difficulties and expense of marking and registering small individual components used to commercially manufacture a complete muffler or silencer device with little law enforcement benefit, this proposed rule would allow qualified manufacturers to transfer parts defined as a firearm muffler or silencer to other qualified manufacturers without immediately identifying or registering them. Once the new device is complete with the part, the manufacturer would be required to identify and register the device in the manner and within the period specified in this rule for a complete device. Likewise, the proposed rule would allow qualified manufacturers to transfer muffler or silencer replacement parts to qualified manufacturers and dealers to repair existing devices already identified and registered in the NFRTR. Further, this rule would amend the definition of ''transfer'' to clarify that the temporary conveyance of a lawfully possessed NFA firearm, including a silencer, to a qualified manufacturer or dealer for the sole purpose of repair, identification, evaluation, research, testing, or calibration, and return to the same lawful possessor is not a ''transfer'' requiring additional identification or registration in the NFRTR. This change would be consistent with the definition of ''transfer'' in 26 U.S.C. 5845(j) because a temporary conveyance for these purposes is not a sale or other disposition.[71] These proposed rules are intended to reduce the practical and administrative problems of marking and registering silencer parts by the regulated industry, and avoid a potential resource burden on ATF to process numerous tax-exempt registration applications with little public safety benefit.[72]

10. Voluntary Classification of Firearms and Armor Piercing Ammunition

For many years, ATF has acted on voluntarily requests from persons, particularly manufacturers who are developing new products, by issuing determinations or ''classifications'' whether an item is a ''firearm'' or ''armor piercing ammunition'' as defined in the GCA or NFA. This helps regulated industry members and the public determine what laws and regulations may be applicable to the product, and any steps that they may need to take to be compliant with those laws and regulations. To clarify this process, this proposed rule would set forth the procedure and conditions by which persons may voluntarily submit such requests to ATF. Each request would be submitted in writing or on an ATF form executed under the penalties of perjury with a complete and accurate description of the item, the name and address of the manufacturer or importer thereof, and a sample of such item for examination along with any instructions, guides, templates, jigs, equipment, tools, or marketing materials that are made available to the purchaser or recipient of the item. Upon completion of the examination, ATF may return the sample to the person who made the request unless a determination is made that return of the

[71] The definition of ''transfer'' in the NFA only includes ''selling, assigning, pledging, leasing, loaning, giving away, or otherwise disposing of'' a firearm. See United States v. Smith, 642 F.2d 1179, 1182 (9th Cir. 1981) (''We cannot agree that Congress intended to impose a transfer tax and require registration whenever mere physical possession of a firearm is surrendered for a brief period.'').

[72] These changes are consistent with ATF enforcement policy. See NFA Handbook, ATF E-Publication 5320.8 (April 2009), pp. 46, 60 sections 7.4.6; 9.5.1. With regard to silencer repairs, in order to avoid any appearance that an unlawful ''transfer'' has taken place, ATF recommends that an Application for Tax Exempt Transfer and Registration of Firearm, ATF Form 5, be submitted for approval prior to conveying the firearm for repair or identifying the firearm. The conveyance may also be accomplished by submission of a letter from the registrant to the qualified FFL advising the FFL that the registrant is shipping or delivering the firearm for repair/identification and describing the repair or identification. Return of the registered silencer to the registrant may likewise be accomplished by submission of an ATF Form 5 or by a letter from the FFL to the registrant that accompanies the silencer.

sample would be or place the person in violation of law.

ATF's decision whether to classify an item voluntarily submitted is entirely discretionary. The proposed procedure would assist ATF more efficiently to determine the design and intent of the manufacturer of the item through its written statements, and by examining the objective design features of an actual sample along with any instructions, guides, templates, jigs, equipment, tools, or marketing materials that are made available to the purchaser or recipient of the item (though ATF is not limited to examining the items submitted to make its determination). The proposed rule would further codify ATF's policy not to evaluate a firearm accessory or attachment "unless it is installed on the firearm(s) in the configuration for which it is designed and intended to be used," and would further explain that "[a] determination made by the Director under this paragraph shall not be deemed by any person to be applicable to or authoritative with respect to any other sample, design, model, or configuration."

I. Recordkeeping

1. Acquisition and Disposition Records

This proposed rule would make minor amendments to 27 CFR 478.122, 478.123, 478.125, and 478.125a, pertaining to the acquisition and disposition records maintained by importers, manufacturers, and dealers. Due to the possibility that a firearm may have more than one frame or receiver as defined in this rule, and the changes to marking regulations, this rule would make technical amendments to these recordkeeping regulations to make certain words plural, (e.g., manufacturer(s), importer(s), and serial number(s)) in the regulations and for the formatting of their records as applicable. Although under §§ 478.11 and 479.11 singular terms in the regulations must always be read to include the plural form, and vice versa, these changes are necessary to ensure that Federal firearms licensees record more than one manufacturer, importer, or serial number, if appropriate, when acquiring or disposing of firearms with multiple components marked as the frame or receiver, or that have been remanufactured or reimported by another licensee. This is consistent with prior ATF guidance to the firearms industry.[73] However, to reduce costs incurred by licensees, ATF anticipates that it would exercise its discretion not to enforce these format changes to the A&D Record until an existing paper record book is completed (i.e., "closed out") or electronic record version updated in the normal course of business, provided the information is accurately recorded as required in the existing record.

Over the years, licensed importers and manufacturers have asked ATF to allow them to consolidate their records of importation or manufacture and acquisition and disposition of firearms, rather than maintaining separate records as required by 27 CFR 478.122(d) and 478.123(d). Because separate records are also difficult for ATF to inspect, this rule would amend §§ 478.122 and 478.123 to require licensed importers and manufacturers to consolidate their records of importation, manufacture, or other acquisition, and their sale or other disposition in a format containing the applicable columns specified in a table included in § 478.122(b). The columns may be in a different order than the specified format provided they contain all required information. These changes would supersede ATF Rulings 2011–1 and 2016–3, and those rulings would become obsolete upon publication of a final rule.

This rule would also make minor clarifying edits to the format of the Firearms Acquisition and Disposition Record in § 478.125(e). The column titled "Name and address or name and license No." would be retitled as "Name and address of nonlicensee; or if licensee, name and License No." In addition, the column titled "Address or License No. if licensee, or Form 4473 Serial No. if Forms 4473 filed numerically" would be retitled "Address of nonlicensee; License No. of licensee; or Form 4473 Serial No. if such forms filed numerically." This change would make clear that both the name and license number (not the address) of a licensee from whom firearms are received and to whom they are disposed are recorded in the A&D Record. However, to reduce costs incurred by licensees, ATF anticipates that it would exercise its discretion not to enforce these format changes to the A&D Record until an existing paper record book is completed (i.e., "closed out") or electronic record version updated in the normal course of business, provided the information is accurately recorded as required in the existing record.

The proposed changes to § 478.125 would also include a minor amendment to paragraph (f) to make it clear that in the event the licensee records a duplicate entry with the same firearm and acquisition information, whether to close out an old record book or for any other reason, the licensee must record a reference to the date and location of the subsequent entry (e.g., date of new entry, book name/number, page number, and line number) as the disposition. This change is needed to ensure that acquisition records are closed out when firearms are no longer in inventory.[74] This would resolve a significant problem that ATF Industry Operations Investigators have when trying to reconcile the inventory of a Federal firearms licensee, and that Federal firearms licensees have when timely responding to trace requests, particularly when old A&D Records are "closed out" and stored, which, under this proposed rule, could be in a separate warehouse depending on their age (see Section II.J of the preamble).

2. Firearms Transaction Records

Some technical amendments would be needed at 27 CFR 478.124 pertaining to information recorded on the ATF Form 4473. Like changes to the recordkeeping regulations, these amendments would make certain words plural, (e.g., manufacturer(s), importer(s), and serial number(s)) to ensure that the Federal firearms licensee is recording more than one manufacturer, importer, and serial number, if appropriate, on Forms 4473. In addition, the proposed changes to § 478.124 would include a minor technical amendment to paragraph (f) by removing a phrase that indicates that a Federal firearms licensee must fill out the firearm description information only after filling out the information about the transferee. Making this deletion would codify ATF Procedure 2020–1, which sets forth an alternative method of complying with § 478.124(f) for non-over-the-counter firearm transactions. ATF recently issued that procedure in light of changes to ATF Form 4473 (May 2020), which now requires completion of the form in an order different from that provided in § 478.124(f).

3. Recordkeeping for Privately Made Firearms

Minor changes to the above regulations regarding recordkeeping by licensees would also be needed to account for any voluntary receipts or other acquisitions (including from a personal collection) of privately made firearms, and corresponding dispositions (including to a personal collection). Since PMFs are not [73] See FFL Newsletter, May 2012, p.5 ("If a firearm is marked with two manufacturer's names, or multiple manufacturer and importer names, FFLs should record each manufacturers' and importers' name in the A&D record.").

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

commercially manufactured, if a PMF were received or otherwise acquired by a licensee or disposed of, or imported, the abbreviation ''PMF'' would be recorded as the manufacturer in the appropriate column on a licensee's acquisition and disposition record, ATF Form 4473, or import application, as well as the PMF serial number beginning with the abbreviated FFL number in the serial number column. For PMFs received prior to the effective date of a final rule that are to be identified by the licensee in accordance with § 478.92, or by another licensee at the licensee's request, the licensee would be required to first record the firearm as an acquisition in the licensee's A&D Records upon receipt from the private owner (whether or not the licensee keeps the PMF overnight). Once marked, the licensee would update the acquisition entry with the identifying information, and then record its return as a disposition to the private owner. However, to reduce costs incurred by licensees, ATF anticipates that it would exercise its discretion not to enforce a title format change to the A&D Record to add ''and/or PMF'' in the manufacturer column until an existing paper record book is completed (i.e., ''closed out'') or electronic record version updated in the normal course of business, provided each PMF received is accurately recorded as a ''PMF'' in the manufacturer column.

4. NFA Forms Update

Minor technical amendments would also be needed in 27 CFR 479.62, 479.84, 479.88, 479.90, and 479.141, pertaining to NFA Form 1 (Application to Make), NFA Form 4 (Application to Transfer), NFA Form 3 (Tax Exempt Transfers—SOTs), NFA Form 5 (Tax Exempt Transfers—Governmental Entities), and the Stolen or Lost Firearms report, respectively. Due to the new definitions and changes to marking regulations, the technical amendments here would make certain words plural (e.g., manufacturer(s), importer(s), serial number(s)) in the regulations as applicable. Although under §§ 478.11 and 479.11 singular terms in the regulations must always be read to include the plural form, and vice versa, these changes are necessary to ensure that more than one name, manufacturer, importer, or serial number, if appropriate, is recorded when completing the NFA forms.

5. Importation Forms Update

Minor technical amendments would also be needed in 27 CFR 447.42, 447.45, 478.112, 478.113, 478.114, and 479.112, pertaining to the importation of firearms. Again, due to the new definition and changes to marking regulations, the technical amendments here would make certain words plural (e.g., manufacturer(s), country or countries of manufacture, and serial number(s)) in the regulations as applicable. Although under §§ 478.11 and 479.11 singular terms in the regulations must always be read to include the plural form, and vice versa, these changes are necessary to ensure that more than one name, manufacturer, country, importer, or serial number, if appropriate, is recorded when completing importation forms.

J. Record Retention

This rule also proposes to amend 27 CFR 478.129 to remove language stating that FFL dealers and collectors need only keep A&D Records and ATF Forms 4473 for up to 20 years following the date of sale or disposition of the firearm. The proposed changes would require Federal firearms licensees to retain all records until business or licensed activity is discontinued, either on paper or in an electronic format approved by the Director,[75] at the business or collection premises readily accessible for inspection. There would also be an amendment to 27 CFR 478.50(a) to allow all licensees, including manufacturers and importers, to store paper records and forms with no open disposition entries and with no dispositions recorded within 20 years at a separate warehouse, which would be considered part of the business premises for this purpose and subject to inspection.

In view of advancements in electronic scanning and storage technology, and ATF's acceptance of electronic recordkeeping, these amendments would reverse a 1985 rulemaking allowing non-manufacturer/importer Federal firearms licensees to destroy their records after 20 years.[76] The durability and longevity of firearms means that they are often in circulation for more than 20 years, while the cost of storing firearm transaction records has decreased dramatically through electronic recordkeeping. The proposed amendments would enhance public safety by ensuring that records of active licensees will be available for tracing purposes. ATF has encountered some firearms retailers who have destroyed large numbers of records more than 20 years old so that they would no longer need to be stored physically. This resulted in some traces of firearms involved in crimes to be returned incomplete for lack of records. This provision is also essential if PMFs involved in crime are marked and traced directly to licensed dealers who, unlike licensed manufacturers and importers, are not presently required to maintain permanent records.

III. Statutory and Executive Order Review

A. Executive Orders 12866 and 13563

Executive Order 12866 (Regulatory Planning and Review) directs agencies to assess the costs and benefits of available regulatory alternatives and, if regulation is necessary, to select regulatory approaches that maximize net benefits (including potential economic benefits, environmental benefits, public health and safety effects, distributive impacts, and equity). Executive Order 13563 (Improving Regulation and Regulatory Review) emphasizes the importance of quantifying both costs and benefits, of reducing costs, of harmonizing rules, and of promoting flexibility.

The Office of Management and Budget (OMB) has determined that while this proposed rule is not economically significant, it is a ''significant regulatory action'' under section 3(f)(4) of Executive Order 12866 because this proposed rule raises novel legal or policy issues arising out of legal mandates. Accordingly, the rule has been reviewed by OMB.

This proposed rule would update the new definition of ''frame or receiver,'' among other items. Table 1 provides a summary of the provisions of this proposed rule, along with the estimated affected population, costs, and benefits.

1. New Definition of Firearm Frame or Receiver

The proposed definition of this term would maintain current classifications and current marking requirements of firearm frames or receivers, except that the licensed manufacturer or importer must mark on new designs or configurations either: Their name (or recognized abbreviation), and city and State (or recognized abbreviation) where they maintain their place of business; or their name (or recognized abbreviation) and their abbreviated FFL number, on each part defined as a frame or receiver, along with the serial number. To ensure traceability if the parts are separated, there would no longer be an option only to mark the FFL's name, city, and state on the slide or barrel. More specifically—

- The proposed definitions would take into account the fact that modern firearms do not house all the components as defined in the current definition. These definitions account for firearms such as split frames or multi-piece firearms;
- The proposed definition would recognize the current classifications of a firearm "frame or receiver." It is intended to encompass the majority, if not all, of existing regulated firearms, and no new marking requirements would be required for these existing designs and configurations;
- After this proposed rule is finalized, markings on new designs or configurations of firearms manufactured or imported may be accomplished by marking each frame or receiver with the licensee's name, city, and state, and serial number, or with the licensee's name and abbreviated license number prefix and number (serial number) in the manner prescribed by existing marking requirements;
- Markings would need to be accomplished within 7 days of completion of the active manufacturing process for the complete weapon (or frame or receiver of such weapon if not being sold as a complete weapon); and
- The proposed rule would require acquisition and disposition record changes to accommodate recording multiple frames or receivers that have different serial numbers if the original frames or receivers (with the same serial number) become separated and are reassembled with frames or receivers bearing different serial numbers.

ATF believes that the majority of the industry currently complies with these requirements, so the cost would be minimal. While the new definitions would mostly affect new designs or configurations of firearms, manufacturers would still be able to receive a determination or a variance on the design from ATF; therefore, they may not experience an additional cost or burden. For more details, please refer to Chapter 2 of the Regulatory Impact Analysis.[77]

2. Partially Complete, Disassembled, or Inoperable Firearm Kits

This section addresses non-FFL manufacturers who manufacture partially complete, disassembled, or inoperable frame or receiver kits, to include both firearm parts kits that allow a person to make only a frame or receiver, and those kits that allow a person to make a complete weapon. When a partially complete frame or receiver parts kit reaches a stage in manufacture where it may readily be completed, assembled, converted, or restored to a functional state, it would be considered a firearm "frame or receiver" that must be marked. Further, under the proposed rule, weapon parts kits with partially complete frames or receivers containing the necessary parts such that they may readily be completed, assembled, converted, or restored to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive would be "firearms" for which each frame or receiver of the weapon, as defined under this rule, would need to be marked.

For non-FFL manufacturers of firearm parts kits containing a part defined as a firearm frame or receiver, ATF anticipates there would be a significant impact on these individual companies, but notes that the overall industry impact would also be minimal. Based on current marketing related to the unregulated sale of certain firearm parts kits, ATF anticipates that these non-FFLs would either become FFLs to sell regulated frames or receivers or complete weapons (either as kits or fully assembled), or would take a loss in revenue to sell unregulated items or parts kits that do not contain a frame or receiver (i.e., unregulated raw materials or molds, fire control components, barrels, accessories, tools, jigs, or instructions), but not both. For more details, please refer to Chapter 3 of the Regulatory Impact Analysis.

3. Gunsmithing

The proposed rule would result in a one-time cost for contract gunsmithing, estimated to be $180,849. For more details, please refer to Chapter 4 of the Regulatory Impact Analysis.

4. Silencers

The proposed rule would require silencers to be marked on any housing or structure, such as an outer tube or modular piece, designed to hold or integrate one or more essential internal components of the device. Currently, the regulations assume that each part defined as a muffler or silencer must be marked and registered.[78] While this proposed change would increase the number of certain parts—firearm muffler or silencer frames or receivers—that need to be marked for modular silencers, this proposed change is not intended to require marking of all silencer parts so long as they are incorporated into a complete device by the original manufacturer or maker that is marked and registered. More specifically, none of the internal nonstructural parts of a complete muffler or silencer device would need to be marked so long as each frame or receiver as defined in this rule is marked. However, as with current regulations, silencer parts sold, shipped, or otherwise disposed of separately would still be considered ''silencers'' that require all markings prior to disposition except when transferred between qualified manufacturers for the production of new devices, and to qualified manufacturers and dealers for the repair of existing devices (see Section II.H.9 of the preamble).

However, the proposed rule would now require some manufacturers of silencers to mark the outer tube rather than the endcap. ATF anticipates only minimal costs associated with moving the serial number and other identifying information from the end cap or adding the same information to the outer tube on certain silencers. Furthermore, there may be a savings for individual owners of silencers. This proposed rule would expressly allow for repairs on silencer devices without having to undergo the additional NFA transfer and registration process, so long as the device is returned to the sender. For more details, please refer to Chapter 5 of the Regulatory Impact Analysis.

5. Privately Made Firearms

A firearm, including a frame or receiver, assembled or otherwise produced by a non-licensee without any markings by a licensee at the time of production or importation is defined as a ''privately made firearm (PMF)'' in the proposed rule. This does not include a firearm identified and registered in the NFRTR pursuant to chapter 53, title 26, United States Code, or any firearm made before October 22, 1968 (unless remanufactured after that date). Under the proposed rule, FFLs would be required to mark PMFs within 7 days of the firearm being received by a licensee, or before disposition, whichever first occurs. Licensees would have 60 days to mark PMFs already in inventory after a final rule becomes effective. FFLs would have the option to mark their existing PMFs themselves. Both FFLs and non-FFLs would have the option to contract with an FFL, such as a gunsmith, for this purpose, dispose of them, or send them to ATF or another law enforcement agency for disposal. The industry cost for this section is $563,340. For more details, please refer to Chapter 6 of the Regulatory Impact Analysis.

6. Record Retention

Currently, licensees other than manufacturers and importers do not have to store their ATF Forms 4473 or A&D records beyond 20 years. This proposed rule would require licensed dealers and collectors to store their Forms 4473 or A&D records indefinitely. The industry cost for this section would be minimal because FFLs could drop off their overflow records to ATF or have ATF ship them directly. The government cost for this provision is $68,939 annually. For more details, please refer to Chapter 7 of the Regulatory Impact Analysis.

7. ATF Form Updates

This proposed rule would modify existing forms and records, such as ATF Forms 4473, NFA forms, importation forms, the Stolen or Lost Firearms Reports, and A&D Records, to help ensure that if more than one manufacturer or serial number is identified on any firearm, those names or serial numbers are recorded. As paper forms run out, FFLs would be able to order forms as part of their normal operations. In other words, FFLs using paper forms requested from ATF are not anticipated to incur any additional cost. For FFLs maintaining transaction records electronically, these FFLs would also only be required to update their software during their next regularly scheduled update. Because software updates occur regularly, and costs are already incorporated for those, ATF does not anticipate any additional costs would be incurred for these changes. There is no cost associated with this section. For more details, please refer to Chapter 8 of the Regulatory Impact Analysis.

8. Total Cost of the Proposed Rule

The total 10-year undiscounted cost of this proposed rule is estimated to be $1.3 million. The total 10-year discounted cost of the rule is $1.0 million and $1.2 million at 7 percent and 3 percent respectively. The annualized cost of this proposed rule would be $147,048 and $135,750, also at 7 percent and 3 percent, respectively.

9. Alternatives

ATF considered various alternatives when preparing this proposed rule. For a more detailed analysis, please refer to Chapters 1 and 10 of the Regulatory Impact Analysis.

a. This Proposed Rule

ATF chose to propose promulgating new definitions of ''frame or receiver,'' ''privately made firearm,'' ''gunsmithing,'' and an update to records retention and new requirements for marking silencers, because they would maximize benefits.

b. Other Considered Alternatives

Alternative 1—No change. While this alternative minimizes cost, it does not meet any of the objectives outlined in this proposed rule.

Alternative 2—Everytown for Gun Safety petition. ATF received a petition for rulemaking from Everytown for Gun Safety, a non-profit organization, proposing to define ''firearm frame or receiver'' in 27 CFR 478.11. That proposed definition focused on housing the ''trigger group''; however, it did not define ''trigger group'' and even if it did, it would not address firearms that do not house trigger components within a single housing, or which have a remote trigger outside the weapon. In other words, this alternative would fall short of addressing all technologies or designs of firearms that are currently available, or may become available in the future. It also does not address potential changes in firearms terminology. Thus, while the alternative requested by that petition would reduce the cost by reducing the number of entities affected, it does not fully address the objectives of this proposed rule.

Alternative 3—Grandfather all existing firearms and receivers. This alternative would grandfather in all existing firearms that would not meet the serialization standard for partially complete and split frames or receivers. This was considered and incorporated into the proposed alternative, where feasible. However, in order to enforce the regulation, a complete grandfathering of existing firearms and silencers is problematic in that manufacturers could continue to produce non-compliant firearm frames or receivers and falsely market them as grandfathered firearms. This could potentially pose an enforcement issue that may not be resolved for years if not decades.

Alternative 4—Require serialization of all partially complete firearms or split receivers. This would require all firearms purchased by individuals to be retroactively serialized. However, the cost would increase considerably and the GCA only regulates the manufacture of firearms by Federal firearm licensees, not the making of firearms for personal use by private unlicensed individuals.

B. Executive Order 13132

This proposed rule will not have substantial direct effects on the States, the relationship between the Federal Government and the States, or the distribution of power and responsibilities among the various levels of government. This rule is not intended to supersede State requirements unless there is a direct and positive conflict between them such that they cannot be reconciled or consistently stand together.[79] States can require markings on firearms for individuals. This rule does not require individuals to mark their personal firearms. Therefore, in accordance with section 6 of Executive Order 13132 (Federalism), the Attorney General has determined that this proposed rule does not have sufficient federalism implications to warrant the preparation of a federalism summary impact statement.

C. Executive Order 12988

This regulation meets the applicable standards set forth in sections 3(a) and 3(b)(2) of Executive Order 12988 (Civil Justice Reform).

D. Regulatory Flexibility Act

In accordance with the Regulatory Flexibility Act (''RFA''), ATF prepared an Initial Regulatory Flexibility Analysis (''IRFA'') that examines the impacts of the proposed rule on small entities (5 U.S.C. 601 et seq.). The IRFA is included here and as part of the RFA. The term ''small entities'' comprises small businesses, not-for-profit organizations that are independently owned and operated and are not dominant in their fields, and governmental jurisdictions with populations of fewer than 50,000 people. 5 U.S.C. 601(6).

Because this proposed rule affects different populations in different ways, the analysis for the IRFA has been broken up by provision. Certain provisions may have a significant impact on certain small entities, such as non-FFL manufactures of firearm parts kits with incomplete firearm frames or receivers. Based on the information from this analysis:

- ATF estimates that this proposed rule could potentially affect 132,023 entities, including all FFLs and non-FFL manufacturers and retailers of firearm parts kits with incomplete firearm frames or receivers, but anticipates that the majority of entities affected by this rule would experience minimal or no additional costs.
- Non-FFL manufacturers are anticipated to be small and would potentially have a significant impact on their individual revenue.
- The second largest impact would be $12,828 if a manufacturer had to retool their existing production equipment, but ATF anticipates this is unlikely because this proposed rule encompasses the majority of existing technology. This would not affect future production because this work would be part of their normal operations in creating new firearms.
- ATF estimates the majority of affected entities are small entities that would experience a range of costs; therefore, this rule may have a significant impact on small entities.

Under the RFA, we are required to consider what, if any, impact this rule would have on small entities. Agencies must perform a review to determine whether a rule will have such an impact. Because the agency has determined that it will, the agency has prepared an initial regulatory flexibility analysis as described in the RFA. Under Section 603(b) of the RFA, the regulatory flexibility analysis must provide or address:

- A description of the reasons why action by the agency is being considered;
- A succinct statement of the objectives of, and legal basis for, the proposed rule;
- A description of, and where feasible, an estimate of the number of small entities to which the proposed rule will apply;
- A description of the projected reporting, recordkeeping and other compliance requirements of the proposed rule, including an estimate of the classes of small entities which will be subject to the requirement and the type of professional skills necessary for preparation of the report or record;
- An identification, to the extent practicable, of all relevant Federal rules which may duplicate, overlap or conflict with the proposed rule; and
- Descriptions of any significant alternatives to the proposed rule which accomplish the stated objectives of applicable statutes and which minimize any significant economic impact of the proposed rule on small entities.

1. A Description of the Reasons Why Action by the Agency Is Being Considered

One of the reasons ATF is considering this proposed regulation is the failure of the market to compensate for negative externalities caused by commercial activity. A negative externality can be the by-product of a transaction between two parties that is not accounted for in the transaction.

This proposed rule would update the existing definition of frame or receiver to account for the majority of technological advances in the industry and ensure that these firearms continue to remain under the regulatory regime as intended by the enactment of the GCA, including accounting for manufacturing of firearms using multiple manufacturers. In light of recent court cases, the majority of regulated firearms may not meet the existing definition of firearm frame or receiver. This may result in no part of a firearm being regulated as a ''frame or receiver'' contrary to the requirements in the GCA that ensure tracing to solve crime and help prevent prohibited persons from coming into possession of weapons. Furthermore, finding information in support of criminal cases may be hindered because records are destroyed after 20 years despite the fact that firearms may last longer than 20 years and be used in criminal activities.

This proposed rule would also account for advances in technology in performing transactions such as electronic storage. For more specific details regarding the need for regulation, please refer to the specific chapters pertaining to each provision of this proposed rule.

2. A Succinct Statement of the Objectives of, and Legal Basis for, the Proposed Rule

The Attorney General is responsible for enforcing the GCA, as amended, and the NFA, as amended. This responsibility includes the authority to promulgate regulations necessary to enforce the provisions of the GCA and NFA. See 18 U.S.C. 926(a); 26 U.S.C. 7801(a)(2)(A); id. at 7805(a). Congress and the Attorney General have delegated the responsibility for administering and enforcing the GCA and NFA to the Director of ATF, subject to the direction of the Attorney General and the Deputy Attorney General. See

[79] See 18 U.S.C. 927.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

28 U.S.C. 599A(b)(1); 28 CFR 0.130(a)(1)–(2). Accordingly, the Department and ATF have promulgated regulations implementing both the GCA and the NFA. See 27 CFR parts 478, 479.

The proposed rule provides new regulatory definitions of ''firearm frame or receiver'' and ''frame or receiver'' because they are outdated. The proposed rule would also amend ATF's definitions of ''firearm'' and ''gunsmith'' to clarify the meaning of those terms, and to add new regulatory terms such as ''complete weapon,'' ''complete muffler or silencer device,'' ''privately made firearm,'' and ''readily'' for purposes of clarity given advancements in firearms technology. Further, the proposed rule would amend ATF's regulations on marking and recordkeeping that are necessary to implement these new or amended definitions.

3. A Description of, and Where Feasible, an Estimate of the Number of Small Entities to Which the Proposed Rule Will Apply

- ATF estimates that this rule could potentially affect 132,023 entities, including all FFLs and non-FFL manufactures and retailers of firearm kits, but anticipates that the majority of entities affected by this rule would experience minimal or no additional costs.
- ATF anticipates the majority of affected entities are small entities and would experience any range of costs; therefore this rule would have a significant impact on a substantial number of small entities.

4. An Identification, to the Extent Practicable, of All Relevant Federal Rules Which May Duplicate, Overlap or Conflict With the Proposed Rule

This proposed rule does not duplicate or conflict with other Federal rules.

5. Descriptions of any Significant Alternatives to the Proposed Rule Which Accomplish the Stated Objectives of Applicable Statutes and Which Minimize any Significant Economic Impact of the Proposed Rule on Small Entities

The significant alternatives considered are set forth in Section IV(A)(9) of this preamble. For more details, please refer to Chapters 1 and 10 of the Regulatory Impact Analysis.

E. Small Business Regulatory Enforcement Fairness Act of 1996

This proposed rule is not a major rule as defined by section 251 of the Small Business Regulatory Enforcement Fairness Act of 1996, 5 U.S.C. 804.

F. Unfunded Mandate Reform Act of 1995

This proposed rule will not result in the expenditure by State, local, and Tribal governments, in the aggregate, or by the private sector of $100 million or more in any one year and it will not significantly or uniquely affect small governments. Therefore, no actions were deemed necessary under the provisions of the Unfunded Mandates Reform Act of 1995, Public Law 104–4, 109 Stat. 48.

G. Paperwork Reduction Act of 1995

This proposed rule would call for collections of information under the Paperwork Reduction Act of 1995 (44 U.S.C. 3501–20). As defined in 5 CFR 1320.3(c), ''collection of information'' comprises reporting, recordkeeping, monitoring, posting, labeling, and other similar actions. The title and description of the information collection, a description of those who must collect the information, and an estimate of the total annual burden follow. The estimate covers the time for reviewing instructions, searching existing sources of data, gathering and maintaining the data needed, and completing and reviewing the collection.

Under the provisions of this proposed rule, there would be a one-time increase in paperwork burdens of identification markings placed on firearms as well as additional transaction records. This requirement would be added to an existing approved collection covered by OMB control number 1140–0050 and 1140–0067.

Title: Identification Markings Placed on Firearms.

OMB Control Number: OMB 1140–0050.

Proposed Use of Information: The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms, and Explosives would use this information in fighting crime by facilitating the tracing of firearms used in criminal activities. The systematic tracking of firearms from the manufacturer or U.S. importer to the retail purchaser also enables law enforcement agencies to identify suspects involved in criminal violations, determine if a firearm is stolen, and provide other information relevant to a criminal investigation.

Description and Number of Respondents: Currently there are 12,252 licensed manufacturers of firearms and 1,343 licensed importers. Of the potential number of licensed dealers and licensed pawnbrokers, ATF estimates that those directly affected would be a one-time surge of 5,298 licensed dealers, 710 licensed pawnbrokers, and 36 non-licensed dealers that would be affected. This proposed rule would affect a one-time surge of 6,044 respondents.

Frequency of Response: There will be a recurring response for all currently existing 13,595 licensed manufactures and licensed importers. This proposed rule would affect a one-time number of responses of 12,088 responses (6,044 respondents * 2 responses).

Burden of Response: This includes recurring time burden of 1 minute. ATF anticipates a one-time hourly burden of 0.25 hours per respondent.

Estimate of Total Annual Burden: The current burden listed in this collection of information is 85,630 hours. The new burden, as a result of this proposed rulemaking, is a one-time hourly burden of 3,022 (6,044 respondents * 2 responses * 0.25 hourly burden per respondent).

OMB Control Number: OMB 1140–0067.

Proposed Use of Information: The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms, and Explosives would use this information for criminal investigation or regulatory compliance with the Gun Control Act of 1968. The Attorney General may inspect or examine the inventory and records of a licensed importer, licensed manufacturer, or licensed dealer, without such reasonable cause or warrant, and during the course of a criminal investigation of a person or persons other than the licensee in order to ensure compliance with the recordkeeping requirements of 18 U.S.C. 923(g)(1)(A) and (B). The Attorney General may also inspect or examine any records relating to firearms involved in a criminal investigation that is traced to the licensee, or firearms that may have been disposed of during the course of a bona fide criminal investigation.

Description and Number of Respondents: The current number of respondents is 9,056 firearm manufacturers, but this proposed rule would have a one-time surge for an unknown select few licensed manufacturers.

Frequency of Response: There will be a recurring response for all 9,056 licensed manufacturers, but only a one-time surge of 6,790 responses ((2,649 licensed dealer submissions + 710 license pawnbroker submissions + 36 non-licensed dealers) * 2 firearms or firearm kits) to licensed manufactures.

Burden of Response: This includes recurring time burden of 1.05 minutes. The burden resulting from this proposed rule is 0.25 hours per set of submittals by licensed dealers and licensed pawnbrokers to licensed manufacturers.

Estimate of Total Annual Burden: The current burden listed in this collection of information is 201,205 hours. The new burden, as a result of this proposed rulemaking, is 1,698 hours (6,790 responses * 0.25 hours).

As required by the Paperwork Reduction Act of 1995 (44 U.S.C. 3507(d)), a copy of this proposed rule will be submitted to OMB for its review of the collections of information.

We ask for public comment on the proposed collection of information to help us determine how useful the information is; whether it can help us perform our functions better; whether it is readily available elsewhere; how accurate our estimate of the burden of collection is; how valid our methods for determining burden are; how we can improve the quality, usefulness, and clarity of the information; and how we can minimize the burden of collection.

You need not respond to a collection of information unless it displays a currently valid control number from OMB. Before the requirements for this collection of information becomes effective, we will publish a notice in the Federal Register and request additional comments regarding the collection of information prior to OMB's decision to approve, modify, or disapprove the proposed collection.

IV. Public Participation

A. Comments Sought

ATF requests comments on the proposed rule from all interested persons. ATF specifically requests comments on the feasibility of implementing the new definition of firearm ''frame or receiver'' in 27 CFR 478.11 and 27 CFR 479.11, and related definitions and amendments that ensure the proper marking, recordkeeping, and traceability of all firearms manufactured, imported, acquired and disposed by Federal firearms licensees. ATF also requests comments on the costs or benefits of the proposed rule and on the appropriate methodology and data for calculating those costs and benefits.

All comments must reference this document's docket number ATF 2021R–05, be legible, and include the commenter's complete first and last name and full mailing address. ATF may not consider, or respond to, comments that do not meet these requirements or comments containing profanity. ATF will retain all comments as part of this rulemakings administrative record. ATF will treat all comments as originals and will not acknowledge receipt of comments. In addition, if ATF cannot read your comment due to technical difficulties and cannot contact you for clarification, ATF may not be able to consider your comment.

ATF will carefully consider all comments, as appropriate, received on or before the closing date, and will give comments after that date the same consideration if practical to do so, but assurance of consideration cannot be given except as to comments received on or before the closing date.

B. Confidentiality

ATF will make all comments meeting the requirements of this section, whether submitted electronically or on paper, available for public viewing at ATF and on the internet through the Federal eRulemaking Portal, and subject to the Freedom of Information Act (5 U.S.C. 552). Commenters who do not want their name or other personal identifying information posted on the internet should submit comments by mail or facsimile, along with a separate cover sheet containing their personal identifying information. Both the cover sheet and comment must reference this docket number (2021R–05). For comments submitted by mail or facsimile, information contained on the cover sheet will not appear when posted on the internet but any personal identifying information that appears within a comment will not be redacted by ATF and it will appear on the internet.

A commenter may submit to ATF information identified as proprietary or confidential business information. The commenter shall place any portion of a comment that is proprietary or confidential business information under law on pages separate from the balance of the comment with each page prominently marked ''PROPRIETARY OR CONFIDENTIAL BUSINESS INFORMATION'' at the top of the page.

ATF will not make proprietary or confidential business information submitted in compliance with these instructions available when disclosing the comments that it received, but will disclose that the commenter provided proprietary or confidential business information that ATF is holding in a separate file to which the public does not have access. If ATF receives a request to examine or copy this information, it will treat it as any other request under the Freedom of Information Act (5 U.S.C. 552). In addition, ATF will disclose such proprietary or confidential business information to the extent required by other legal process.

C. Submitting Comments

Submit comments in any of three ways (but do not submit the same comment multiple times or by more than one method). Hand-delivered comments will not be accepted.

4. Be no more than five pages long.

D. Request for Hearing

Any interested person who desires an opportunity to comment orally at a public hearing should submit his or her request, in writing, to the Director of ATF within the 90-day comment period. The Director, however, reserves the right to determine, in light of all circumstances, whether a public hearing is necessary.

The additions and revisions read as follows:

§ 478.11 Meaning of terms.

* * * * *

Complete muffler or silencer device. A firearm muffler or firearm silencer that contains all component parts necessary to function as designed whether or not assembled or operable.

Complete weapon. A firearm other than a firearm muffler or firearm silencer that contains all component parts necessary to function as designed whether or not assembled or operable.

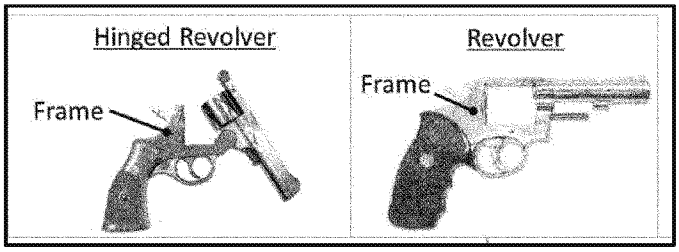
* * * * *

Engaged in the business— * * *

(d) Gunsmith. A person who, as a service performed on existing firearms not for sale or distribution by a licensee, devotes time, attention, and labor to repairing or customizing firearms, making or fitting special barrels, stocks, or trigger mechanisms to firearms, or identifying firearms in accordance with this chapter, as a regular course of trade or business with the principal objective of livelihood or profit, but such term shall not include a person who occasionally repairs or customizes firearms, or occasionally makes or fits special barrels, stocks, or trigger mechanisms to firearms;

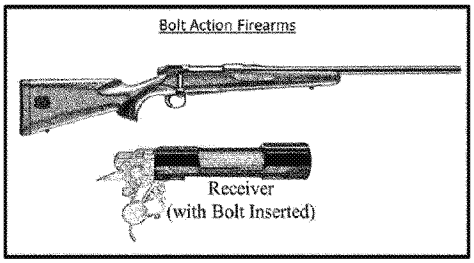
* * * * *

Firearm. Any weapon, including a starter gun, which will or is designed to or may readily be converted to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive; the frame or receiver of any such weapon; any firearm muffler or firearm silencer; or any destructive device; but the term shall not include an antique firearm. In the case of a licensed collector, the term shall mean only curios and relics. The term shall include a weapon parts kit that is designed to or may readily be assembled, completed, converted, or restored to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive. The term shall not include a weapon, including a weapon parts kit, in which each part defined as a frame or receiver of such weapon is destroyed.



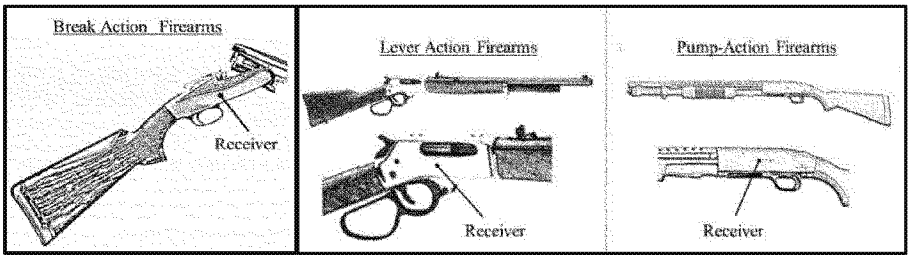
* * * * *

Frame or receiver. A part of a firearm that, when the complete weapon is assembled, is visible from the exterior and provides housing or a structure designed to hold or integrate one or more fire control components, even if pins or other attachments are required to connect those components to the housing or structure. Any such part identified with a serial number shall be presumed, absent an official determination by the Director or other reliable evidence to the contrary, to be a frame or receiver. For purposes of this definition, the term "fire control component" means a component necessary for the firearm to initiate, complete, or continue the firing sequence, including any of the following: Hammer, bolt, bolt carrier, breechblock, cylinder, trigger mechanism, firing pin, striker, or slide rails. The following are nonexclusive examples that illustrate this definition:

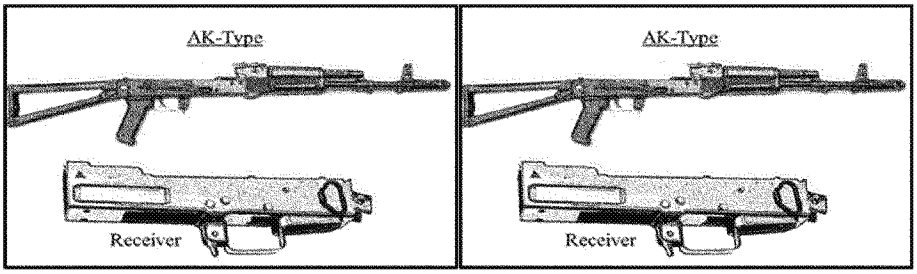


BILLING CODE 4410–FY–P

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT



Example 1 – Hinged or single framed revolver: The frame or receiver is the part of the revolver that provides a structure designed to hold the trigger, hammer, and cylinder.



Example 2 – Bolt action rifle: The frame or receiver is the part of the rifle that provides a structure designed to hold the bolt, firing pin, and trigger mechanism.

Example 3 – Break action, lever action, or pump action rifle or shotgun: The frame or receiver is the part of the rifle or shotgun that provides housing for the bolt and firing pin, or a structure designed to integrate the breechblock.

Example 4 - Semiautomatic firearm or machinegun with a single receiver housing all fire control components: The frame or receiver is the part of the firearm that provides housing for the hammer, bolt, trigger mechanism, and firing pin (e.g., AK-type firearms).

BILLING CODE 4410–FY–C

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

(a) Firearm muffler or silencer frame or receiver. The term ''frame or receiver'' shall mean, in the case of a firearm muffler or firearm silencer, a part of the firearm that, when the complete device is assembled, is visible from the exterior and provides housing or a structure, such as an outer tube or modular piece, designed to hold or integrate one or more essential internal components of the device, including any of the following: Baffles, baffling material, or expansion chamber.

(b) Split or modular frame or receiver. (1) In the case of a firearm with more than one part that provides housing or a structure designed to hold or integrate one or more fire control or essential internal components (e.g., a split frame with upper assembly and lower assembly as in many semiautomatic rifles, upper slide assembly and lower grip module as in many semiautomatic handguns, or multiple silencer modular pieces), the Director may determine whether a specific part or parts of a weapon is the frame or receiver, which may include an internal frame or chassis at least partially exposed to the exterior to allow identification. In making this determination, the Director will consider the following factors, with no single factor being controlling:

(i) Which component the manufacturer intended to be the frame or receiver;

(ii) Which component the firearms industry commonly considers to be the frame or receiver with respect to the same or similar firearms;

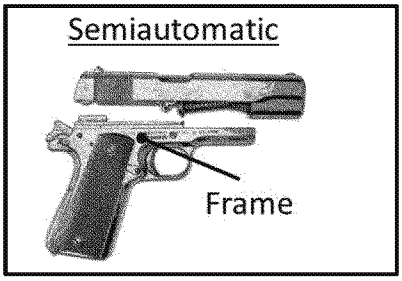
(iii) How the component fits within the overall design of the firearm when assembled;

(iv) The design and function of the fire control components to be housed or integrated;

(v) Whether the component may permanently, conspicuously, and legibly be identified with a serial number and other markings in a manner not susceptible of being readily obliterated, altered, or removed;

(vi) Whether classifying the particular component is consistent with the legislative intent of the Act and this part; and

(vii) Whether classifying the component as the frame or receiver is consistent with ATF's prior classifications.



(2) Frames or receivers of different weapons that are combined to create a similar weapon each retain their respective classifications as frames or receivers provided they retain their original design and configuration.

(3) The Director has previously determined that a specific part is the frame or receiver with respect to certain weapons with split or modular frames or receivers. The following is a nonexclusive list of such weapons and the specific part identified as the frame or receiver as they existed on [date of publication of the final rule]:

(i) Colt 1911-type, Beretta/Browning/FN Herstal/Heckler & Koch/Ruger/Sig Sauer/Smith & Wesson/Taurus hammer fired semiautomatic pistols: The lower portion of the pistol, or grip, that provides housing for the trigger mechanism and hammer, and a structure designed to integrate the slide rails.

(ii) Glock-type striker-fired semiautomatic pistols: the lower portion of the pistol, or grip, that provides housing for the trigger mechanism, and a structure designed to integrate the slide rails.

(iii) Sig Sauer P320-type semiautomatic pistols: the internal removable chassis of the pistol, partially exposed to the exterior to allow identification, that provides housing for the trigger mechanism, and a structure designed to integrate the slide rails.

(iv) Certain locking block rail system semiautomatic pistols: the internal removable frame of the pistol that provides housing for the trigger mechanism, and a structure designed to integrate the slide rails, provided a portion is partially exposed to the exterior to allow identification.

(v) AR-15-type, and Beretta AR-70-type firearms: the lower part of the weapon that provides housing for the trigger mechanism and hammer.

(vi) Steyr AUG-type firearms: the central part of the weapon that provides housing for the rods in the bolt carrier sub-assembly and a structure designed to attach the barrel.

(vii) Thompson M1A1-type machineguns and semiautomatic variants, and L1A1, FN FAL, FN FNC, MP38, MP 40, and SIG 550-type firearms, and HK-type machineguns and semiautomatic variants: the upper part of the weapon that provides housing for the bolt and firing pin.

(viii) Vickers/Maxim, Browning 1919, and M2-type machineguns, and box-type machineguns and semiautomatic variants thereof: the side plate of the weapon that provides a structure designed to hold the charging handle.

(ix) Sten, Sterling, and Kel-Tec SUB-2000-type firearms: the central part of the weapon, or tube, that provides housing for the bolt and firing pin.

BILLING CODE 4410–FY–C

(c) Partially complete, disassembled, or inoperable frame or receiver. The term ''frame or receiver'' shall include, in the case of a frame or receiver that is partially complete, disassembled, or inoperable, a frame or receiver that has reached a stage in manufacture where it may readily be completed, assembled, converted, or restored to a functional state. In determining whether a partially complete, disassembled, or inoperable frame or receiver may readily be assembled, completed, converted, or restored to a functional state, the Director may consider any available instructions, guides, templates, jigs, equipment, tools, or marketing materials. For purposes of this definition, the term ''partially complete,'' as it modifies ''frame or receiver,'' means a forging, casting, printing, extrusion, machined body or similar article that has reached a stage in manufacture where it is clearly identifiable as an unfinished component part of a weapon.

(d) Destroyed frame or receiver. The term ''frame or receiver'' shall not include a frame or receiver that is destroyed. For purposes of this definition, the term ''destroyed'' means that the frame or receiver has been permanently altered not to provide housing or a structure that may hold or integrate any fire control or essential internal component, and may not readily be assembled, completed, converted, or restored to a functional state. Acceptable methods of destruction include completely melting, crushing, or shredding the frame or receiver, or by completely severing at least three critical areas of the frame or receiver using a cutting torch having a tip of sufficient size to displace at least ¼ inch of material at each location.

Importer's or manufacturer's serial number. The identification number, licensee name, licensee city or state, or license number placed by a licensee on a firearm frame or receiver in accordance with this part. The term shall include any such identification on a privately made firearm, or an ATF issued serial number. When used in this part, the term ''serial number'' shall mean the ''importer's or manufacturer's serial number.''

* * * * *

Privately made firearm (PMF). A firearm, including a frame or receiver, assembled or otherwise produced by a person other than a licensed manufacturer, and without a serial number or other identifying markings placed by a licensed manufacturer at the time the firearm was produced. The term shall not include a firearm identified and registered in the National Firearms Registration and Transfer Record pursuant to chapter 53, title 26, United States Code, or any firearm made before October 22, 1968 (unless remanufactured after that date).

* * * * *

Readily. A process that is fairly or reasonably efficient, quick, and easy, but not necessarily the most efficient, speedy, or easy process. Factors relevant in making this determination, with no single one controlling, include the following:

(a) Time, i.e., how long it takes to finish the process;

(b) Ease, i.e., how difficult it is to do so;

(c) Expertise, i.e., what knowledge and skills are required;

(d) Equipment, i.e., what tools are required;

(e) Availability, i.e., whether additional parts are required, and how easily they can be obtained;

(f) Expense, i.e., how much it costs;

(g) Scope, i.e., the extent to which the subject of the process must be changed to finish it; and

(h) Feasibility, i.e., whether the process would damage or destroy the subject of the process, or cause it to malfunction.

§ 478.50 [Amended]

■ 6. In § 478.50(a), add the phrase "or as otherwise provided in § 478.129" after "at the licensed premises served by such warehouse".

■ 7. Revise § 478.92 to read as follows:

§ 478.92 Identification of firearms and armor piercing ammunition.

(a)(1) Firearms manufactured or imported by licensees. Licensed manufacturers and licensed importers of firearms must legibly identify each firearm they manufacture or import as follows:

(i) Serial number, name, place of business. By engraving, casting, stamping (impressing), or otherwise conspicuously placing or causing to be engraved, cast, stamped (impressed) or otherwise placed on each part (or specific part(s) previously determined by the Director) defined as a frame or receiver thereof, a serial number, in a manner not susceptible of being readily obliterated, altered, or removed. The serial number identified on each part of a weapon defined as a frame or receiver must be the same number, but must not duplicate any serial number(s) placed by the licensee on any other firearm. Except as provided in paragraph (a)(4)(v) of this section, each frame or receiver thereof must also be marked with either: Their name (or recognized abbreviation), and city and State (or recognized abbreviation) where they maintain their place of business; or their name (or recognized abbreviation) and abbreviated Federal firearms license number as a prefix, which is the first three and last five digits, followed by a hyphen, and then followed by a number as a suffix, e.g., "12345678–[number]"; and

(ii) Model, caliber or gauge, foreign manufacturer, country of manufacture. By engraving, casting, stamping (impressing), or otherwise conspicuously placing or causing to be engraved, cast, stamped (impressed) or placed on each part (or specific part(s) previously determined by the Director) defined as a frame or receiver, or barrel or pistol slide (if applicable) thereof certain additional information. This information must be placed in a manner not susceptible of being readily obliterated, altered, or removed. Except as provided in paragraph (a)(4)(v) of this section, the additional information shall include:

(A) The model, if such designation has been made;

(B) The caliber or gauge;

(C) When applicable, the name of the foreign manufacturer; and

(D) In the case of an imported firearm, the name of the country in which it was manufactured. For additional requirements relating to imported firearms, see Customs regulations at 19 CFR part 134.

(iii) Frame or receiver, machinegun conversion part, or muffler or silencer part disposed of separately. Except as provided in paragraph (a)(4)(iv) of this section, each part defined as a frame or receiver, machinegun, or firearm muffler or firearm silencer that is not a component part of a complete weapon or device at the time it is sold, shipped, or otherwise disposed of by the licensee must be identified as required by this section with a serial number not duplicated on any other firearm and all additional identifying information, except that the model designation and caliber or gauge may be omitted if that information is unknown at the time the part is identified.

(iv) Size and depth of markings. The engraving, casting, or stamping (impressing) of the serial number and additional information must be to a minimum depth of .003 inch and in a print size no smaller than 1/16 inch. The size of serial numbers required by this section is measured as the distance between the latitudinal ends of the character impression bottoms (bases). The depth of all markings required by this section is measured from the flat surface of the metal and not the peaks or ridges.

(v) Period of time to identify firearms. Licensed manufacturers must identify a complete weapon or complete muffler or silencer device no later than seven days following the date of completion of the active manufacturing process for the weapon or device, or prior to disposition, whichever is sooner. Except as provided in paragraph (a)(4)(iv) of this section, licensed manufacturers must identify each part, including a replacement part, defined as a frame or receiver, machinegun, or firearm muffler or firearm silencer that is not a component part of a complete weapon or device at the time it is sold, shipped, or otherwise disposed of no later than seven days following the date of completion of the active manufacturing process for the part, or prior to disposition, whichever is sooner. For purposes of this paragraph, firearms actively awaiting materials, parts, or equipment repair to be completed are actively in the manufacturing process. Licensed importers must identify imported firearms within the period prescribed in § 478.112.

(2) Privately made firearms. Unless previously identified by another licensee in accordance with this section, and except as provided in paragraph (a)(4)(vi) of this section, licensees must legibly and conspicuously identify each privately made firearm within seven days following the date of receipt or other acquisition (including from a personal collection), or before the date of disposition (including to a personal collection), whichever is sooner. PMFs must be identified by placing on each part (or specific part(s) previously determined by the Director) of a weapon defined as a frame or receiver, the same serial number, but must not duplicate any serial number(s) placed by the licensee on any other firearm. The serial number(s) must begin with the licensee's abbreviated Federal firearms license number as a prefix, which is the first three and last five digits, followed by a hyphen, and then followed by a number as a suffix, e.g., "12345678–[number]". The serial number(s) must be placed in a manner otherwise in accordance with this section, including the requirements that the serial number(s) be at the minimum size and depth, and not susceptible of being readily obliterated, altered, or removed.

(3) Meaning of marking terms. For purposes of this section, the terms "legible" and "legibly" mean that the identification markings use exclusively

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Roman letters (e.g., A, a, B, b, C, c) and Arabic numerals (e.g., 1, 2, 3), or solely Arabic numerals, and may include a hyphen, and the terms ''conspicuous'' and ''conspicuously'' mean that the identification markings are capable of being easily seen with normal handling of the firearm and unobstructed by other markings when the complete weapon is assembled.

(4) Exceptions—(i) Alternate means or period of identification. The Director may authorize other means of identification or period of time to identify firearms upon receipt of a letter application or Form 3311.4 from the licensee showing that such other identification or period is reasonable and will not hinder the effective administration of this part.

(ii) Destructive devices. In the case of a destructive device, the Director may authorize other means of identification or period of time to identify that weapon upon receipt of a letter application or Form 3311.4 from the licensee. The application shall show that engraving, casting, or stamping (impressing) such a weapon as required by this section would be dangerous or impracticable, or that the requested period is reasonable and will not hinder the effective administration of this part.

(iii) Adoption of identifying markings. Licensed manufacturers and licensed importers may adopt the serial number(s) or other identifying markings previously placed on a firearm in accordance with this section provided that, within the period and in the manner herein prescribed, the licensee legibly and conspicuously places, or causes to be placed, on each part (or specific part(s) previously determined by the Director) defined as a frame or receiver either: Their name (or recognized abbreviation), and city and State (or recognized abbreviation) where they maintain their place of business; or their name (or recognized abbreviation) and abbreviated Federal firearms license number, which is the first three and last five digits, followed by a hyphen, and then followed by the existing serial number (including any other abbreviated FFL prefix) as a suffix, e.g., ''12345678–[serial number]''.

(iv) Firearm muffler or silencer parts—(A) Firearm muffler or silencer parts transferred between qualified manufacturers to complete new devices. A licensed manufacturer qualified under part 479 may transfer a part defined as a firearm muffler or firearm silencer to another qualified manufacturer without immediately identifying or registering such part provided that, upon receipt, it is actively used to manufacture a complete muffler or silencer device. Once the new device with such part is completed, the manufacturer of the device shall identify and register it in the manner and within the period specified in this part for a complete muffler or silencer device.

(B) Firearm muffler or silencer replacement parts transferred to qualified manufacturers or dealers to repair existing devices. A licensed manufacturer qualified under part 479 may transfer a replacement part defined as a firearm muffler or firearm silencer other than a frame or receiver to a qualified manufacturer or dealer without identifying or registering such part provided that, upon receipt, it is actively used to repair a complete muffler or silencer device that was previously identified and registered in accordance with this part.

(v) Firearms designed and configured before [EFFECTIVE DATE OF THE FINAL RULE]. Licensed manufacturers and licensed importers may continue to identify firearms (other than PMFs) of the same design and configuration as they existed before [EFFECTIVE DATE OF THE FINAL RULE] with the information required to be marked by paragraphs (a)(1)(i) and (ii) of this section that were in effect prior to that date, and any rules necessary to ensure such identification shall remain effective for that purpose.

(vi) Privately made firearms acquired before [EFFECTIVE DATE OF THE FINAL RULE]. Licensees shall identify in the manner prescribed by this section, or cause another licensee to so identify, each privately made firearm received or otherwise acquired (including from a personal collection) by the licensee before [EFFECTIVE DATE OF THE FINAL RULE] within sixty (60) days from that date, or prior to the date of final disposition (including to a personal collection), whichever is sooner.

(b) Armor piercing ammunition. (1) Marking of ammunition. Each licensed manufacturer or licensed importer of armor piercing ammunition shall identify such ammunition by means of painting, staining or dying the exterior of the projectile with an opaque black coloring. This coloring must completely cover the point of the projectile and at least 50 percent of that portion of the projectile which is visible when the projectile is loaded into a cartridge case.

(2) Labeling of packages. Each licensed manufacturer or licensed importer of armor piercing ammunition shall clearly and conspicuously label each package in which armor piercing ammunition is contained, e.g., each box, carton, case, or other container. The label shall include the words ''ARMOR PIERCING'' in block letters at least ¼ inch in height. The lettering shall be located on the exterior surface of the package which contains information concerning the caliber or gauge of the ammunition. There shall also be placed on the same surface of the package in block lettering at least ⅛ inch in height the words ''FOR GOVERNMENTAL ENTITIES OR EXPORTATION ONLY.'' The statements required by this subparagraph shall be on a contrasting background.

(c) Voluntary classification of firearms and armor piercing ammunition. The Director may issue a determination to a person whether an item is a firearm or armor piercing ammunition as defined in this part upon receipt of a written request or form prescribed by the Director. Each such voluntary request or form submitted shall be executed under the penalties of perjury with a complete and accurate description of the item, the name and address of the manufacturer or importer thereof, and a sample of such item for examination along with any instructions, guides, templates, jigs, equipment, tools, or marketing materials that are made available to the purchaser or recipient of the item. The Director shall not issue a determination regarding a firearm accessory or attachment unless it is installed on the firearm(s) in the configuration for which it is designed and intended to be used. Upon completion of the examination, the Director may return the sample to the person who made the request unless a determination is made that return of the sample would be or place the person in violation of law. A determination made by the Director under this paragraph shall not be deemed by any person to be applicable to or authoritative with respect to any other sample, design, model, or configuration.

Licensed importers' records and licensed manufacturers' records of the sale or other disposition of firearms after December 15, 1968, shall be retained until business is discontinued, either on paper, or in an electronic alternative method approved by the Director, at the business premises readily accessible for inspection under this part. Paper records that do not contain any open disposition entries and with no dispositions recorded within 20 years may be stored at a separate warehouse, which shall be considered part of the business premises for this purpose and subject to inspection under this part.

(e) Records of dealers and collectors. The records prepared by licensed dealers and licensed collectors of the sale or other disposition of firearms and the corresponding record of receipt of such firearms shall be retained until business or licensed activity is discontinued, either on paper, or in an electronic alternative method approved by the Director, at the business or collection premises readily accessible for inspection under this part. Paper records that do not contain any open disposition entries and with no dispositions recorded within 20 years may be stored at a separate warehouse, which shall be considered part of the business premises for this purpose and subject to inspection under this part.

§ 479.102 Identification of firearms.

(a) Identification required. You, as a manufacturer, importer, or maker of a firearm, must legibly identify the firearm as follows:

(1) Serial number, name, place of business. By engraving, casting, stamping (impressing), or otherwise conspicuously placing or causing to be engraved, cast, stamped (impressed) or otherwise placed on each part (or specific part(s) previously determined by the Director) defined as a frame or receiver thereof, a serial number, in a manner not susceptible of being readily obliterated, altered, or removed. The serial number identified on each part of a weapon, including a weapon parts kit, defined as a frame or receiver must be the same number, but must not duplicate any serial number(s) placed by the licensee or maker on any other firearm. Except as provided in paragraph (b)(5) of this section, each frame or receiver thereof must also be marked with either: Your name (or recognized abbreviation), and city and State (or recognized abbreviation) where you as a manufacturer or importer maintain your place of business, or in the case of a maker, where you made the

firearm; or if a licensee, your name (or recognized abbreviation) and abbreviated Federal firearms license number as a prefix, which is the first three and last five digits, followed by a hyphen, and then followed by a number as a suffix, e.g., ''12345678–[number]''; and

(2) Model, caliber or gauge, foreign manufacturer, country of manufacture. By engraving, casting, stamping (impressing), or otherwise conspicuously placing or causing to be engraved, cast, stamped (impressed) or placed on each part (or specific part(s) previously determined by the Director) defined as a frame or receiver, or barrel or pistol slide (if applicable) thereof certain additional information. This information must be placed in a manner not susceptible of being readily obliterated, altered, or removed. Except as provided in paragraph (b)(5) of this section, the additional information shall include:

(i) The model, if such designation has been made;

(ii) The caliber or gauge;

(iii) When applicable, the name of the foreign manufacturer or maker; and

(iv) In the case of an imported firearm, the name of the country in which it was manufactured. For additional requirements relating to imported firearms, see Customs regulations at 19 CFR part 134.

(3) Frame or receiver, machine gun conversion part, or silencer part disposed of separately. Except as provided in paragraph (b)(4) of this section, each part defined as a frame or receiver, machine gun, or firearm muffler or firearm silencer, that is not a component part of a complete weapon or device at the time it is sold, shipped, or otherwise disposed of by you must be identified as required by this section with a serial number not duplicated on any other firearm and all additional identifying information, except that the model designation and caliber or gauge may be omitted if that information is unknown at the time the part is identified.

(4) Size and depth of markings. The engraving, casting, or stamping (impressing) of the serial number and additional information must be to a minimum depth of .003 inch and in a print size no smaller than 1/16 inch. The size of serial numbers required by this section is measured as the distance between the latitudinal ends of the character impression bottoms (bases). The depth of all markings required by this section is measured from the flat surface of the metal and not the peaks or ridges.

(5) Period of time to identify firearms. You must identify a complete weapon or complete muffler or silencer device no later than seven days following the date of completion of the active manufacturing process for the weapon or device, or prior to disposition, whichever is sooner. Except as provided in paragraph (b)(4) of this section, you must identify each part, including a replacement part, defined as a frame or receiver, machine gun, or firearm muffler or firearm silencer, that is not a component part of a complete weapon or device at the time it is sold, shipped, or otherwise disposed of no later than seven days following the date of completion of the active manufacturing process for the part, or prior to disposition, whichever is sooner. For purposes of this paragraph, firearms actively awaiting materials, parts, or equipment repair to be completed are actively in the manufacturing process. Licensed importers must identify imported firearms within the period prescribed in § 478.112.

(6) Meaning of marking terms. For purposes of this section, the terms ''legible'' and ''legibly'' mean that the identification markings use exclusively Roman letters (e.g., A, a, B, b, C, c) and Arabic numerals (e.g., 1, 2, 3), or solely Arabic numerals, and may include a hyphen, and the terms ''conspicuous'' and ''conspicuously'' mean that the identification markings are capable of being easily seen with normal handling of the firearm and unobstructed by other markings when the complete weapon is assembled.

(b) Exceptions—(1) Alternate means or period of identification. The Director may authorize other means of identification or period of time to identify firearms upon receipt of a letter application or Form 3311.4 from you showing that such other identification or period is reasonable and will not hinder the effective administration of this part.

(2) Destructive devices. In the case of a destructive device, the Director may authorize other means of identification or period of time to identify that weapon upon receipt of a letter application or Form 3311.4 from you. The application shall show that engraving, casting, or stamping (impressing) such a weapon as required by this section would be dangerous or impracticable, or that the requested time period is reasonable and will not hinder the effective administration.

(3) Adoption of identifying markings. Licensed manufacturers and licensed importers may adopt the serial number(s) or other identifying markings previously placed on a firearm in accordance with this section provided that, within the period and in the manner herein prescribed, the licensee legibly and conspicuously places, or causes to be placed, on each part (or specific part(s) previously determined by the Director) defined as a frame or receiver either: Their name (or recognized abbreviation), and city and State (or recognized abbreviation) where they maintain their place of business; or their name (or recognized abbreviation) and their abbreviated Federal firearms license number, which is the first three and last five digits, followed by a hyphen, and then followed by the existing serial number (including any other abbreviated FFL prefix) as a suffix, e.g., ''12345678–[serial number]''.

(4) Firearm muffler or silencer parts—(i) Firearm muffler or silencer parts transferred between qualified manufacturers to complete new devices. A licensed manufacturer qualified under this part may transfer a part defined as a muffler or silencer to another qualified manufacturer without immediately identifying or registering such part provided that, upon receipt, it is actively used to manufacture a new complete muffler or silencer device. Once the new device with such part is completed, the manufacturer of the device shall identify and register it in the manner and within the period specified in this part for a complete muffler or silencer device.

(ii) Firearm muffler or silencer replacement parts transferred to qualified manufacturers or dealers to repair existing devices. A licensed manufacturer qualified under this part may transfer a replacement part defined as a muffler or silencer other than a frame or receiver to a qualified manufacturer or dealer without identifying or registering such part provided that, upon receipt, it is actively used to repair a complete muffler or silencer device that was previously identified and registered in accordance with this part.

(5) Firearms designed and configured before [EFFECTIVE DATE OF THE FINAL RULE]. Licensed manufacturers and licensed importers may continue to identify firearms of the same design and configuration as they existed before [EFFECTIVE DATE OF THE FINAL RULE] with the information required to be marked by paragraphs (a)(1) and (2) of this section that were in effect prior to that date, and any rules necessary to ensure such identification shall remain effective for that purpose.

(c) Voluntary classification of firearms. The Director may issue a determination to a person whether an item is a firearm as defined in this part upon receipt of a written request or form prescribed by the Director. Each such voluntary request or form submitted shall be executed under the penalties of perjury with a complete and accurate description of the item, the name and address of the manufacturer or importer thereof, and a sample of such item for examination along with any instructions, guides, templates, jigs, equipment, tools, or marketing materials that are made available to the purchaser or recipient of the item. The Director shall not issue a determination regarding a firearm accessory or attachment unless it is installed on the firearm(s) in the configuration for which it is designed and intended to be used. Upon completion of the examination, the Director may return the sample to the person who made the request unless a determination is made that return of the sample would be or place the person in violation of law. A determination made by the Director under this paragraph shall not be deemed by any person to be applicable to or authoritative with respect to any other sample, design, model, or configuration.

■ 24. In § 479.103, at the end of the third sentence, add ", except as provided in § 479.102(b)(4)."

§ 479.112 [Amended]

■ 25. In § 479.112(a), second sentence, remove the words "serial number" and add in their place the words "serial number(s)".

§ 479.141 [Amended]

■ 26. In § 479.141, remove the word "manufacturer" and add in its place "manufacturer(s)" and remove the words "serial number" and add in their place "serial number(s)".

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

ST. EVE, Circuit Judge. Indiana's Sex Offender Registration Act ("SORA") imposes registration requirements and restrictions on sex offenders who reside, work, or study in the State. Ind. Code § 11-8-8-1 et seq. By virtue of the State supreme court's construction of the Indiana Constitution, Indiana's Ex Post Facto Clause prohibits retroactive application of SORA to offenders convicted before its enactment unless the marginal effects of doing so would not be punitive. Wallace v. State, 905 N.E.2d 371 (Ind. 2009); Jensen v. State, 905 N.E.2d 384 (Ind. 2009). If an offender was under no registration requirement prior to SORA's passage, imposing a registration requirement in the first instance is impermissibly punitive. Wallace, 905 N.E.2d at 371. The Indiana Supreme Court has held, however, that if another state previously subjected a pre-SORA offender to a registration requirement, requiring him to register in Indiana is not punitive. See, e.g., Tyson v. State, 51 N.E.3d 88 (Ind. 2016). Indiana caselaw thus has the peculiar effect of permitting the State to treat similarly situated offenders differently based solely on whether an offender had an out-of-state registration obligation. That feature underlies the present appeal.

The plaintiffs, six sex offenders residing in Indiana, were convicted prior to SORA's passage. Each of them had to register in another state. After moving to Indiana, the State required them to register under SORA. Absent their out-of-state registration obligations, Indiana's Constitution would prohibit SORA's application to them. Plaintiffs challenge the constitutionality of SORA on three fronts, arguing that it violates their right to travel under the Privileges or Immunities Clause, their right to equal protection under the Fourteenth Amendment, and Article I's prohibition on ex post facto laws. The district court granted summary judgment for the plaintiffs on all claims, and Indiana appealed. A divided panel of this Court affirmed the district court, but we subsequently agreed to hear the case en banc.

We now reverse. SORA does not violate the right to travel because it does not expressly discriminate based on residency, as consistently required by the Supreme Court. Plaintiffs' ex post facto claim is likewise precluded by precedent. Applying Smith v. Doe, 538 U.S. 84 (2003), we hold that SORA is not "so punitive either in purpose or effect" as to surmount Indiana's nonpunitive intent for the law. But because the district court did not address whether SORA passes rational basis scrutiny under an equal protection analysis, we remand for consideration of the equal protection claim.

A.

The Indiana General Assembly enacted SORA, also known as "Zachary's Law," in 1994. SORA establishes both requirements and restrictions for qualifying sex offenders, and it authorizes the Indiana Department of Correction ("IDOC") to collect and publish data about them. Ind. Code § 11-8-2-13(b). Under SORA, offenders must register by reporting to local law enforcement at least once annually in every county where they reside, work, or study. §§ 11-8-8-14, 11-8-8-7. Reporting requirements are more frequent for "sexually violent predators"—every 90 days—and offenders without permanent housing—every 7 days. §§ 11-8-8-14, 11-8-8-12. Registration entails providing detailed personal information, including: a photograph; legal name, date of birth, and physiological features; identification numbers; internet usernames and email addresses; residential, school, and workplace addresses; vehicle information and license plate number; and any "other information required by the [IDOC]." § 11-8-8-8(a). Offenders must report any change to this information within 72 hours. SORA also mandates that law enforcement officers contact offenders once a year to verify their residences (every 90 days for sexually violent offenders). § 11-8-8-13(a). And offenders pay a yearly $50 registration fee, plus a $5 fee any time they must register a change of address. § 36-2-13-5.6.

Certain offenders are subject to more stringent requirements. A "sexually violent predator" must notify law enforcement if he plans to be absent from his residence for more than 72 hours and must register in the county that he visits. § 11-8-8-18. An "offender against children" may not work or volunteer at a school, daycare, youth program center, or public park and cannot live within 1,000 feet of these locations. §§ 35-42-4-10(c), 35-42-4-11. A "serious sex offender" may not enter school property. § 35-42-4-14. An offender's failure to comply with SORA can result in criminal sanctions.

Following its enactment, SORA underwent several expansions. Indiana broadened the list of crimes that trigger registration requirements, and it amended SORA to require registration for individuals convicted of substantially similar offenses in another state. On July 1, 2006, the General Assembly extended SORA's requirements to any "person who is required to register as a sex offender in any jurisdiction." § 11-8-8-5(b)(1). In its current form, SORA requires offenders to register if they were:

> (1) convicted of an enumerated Indiana criminal offense, §§ 11-8-8-4.5, 11-8-8-5(a);

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

(2) convicted of a "substantially similar" offense in another jurisdiction, § 1-1-2-4(b)(3); or

(3) required to register by another state (the "other-jurisdiction provision"), § 11-8-8-5(b)(1).

By its plain terms, SORA covers any offender who fits within these categories—regardless of his date of conviction.

B.

While SORA is fully retrospective as a statutory matter, the Indiana Constitution constrains its applicability to offenders with pre-SORA offenses. The Indiana Supreme Court articulated these constitutional boundaries in a series of decisions, beginning with Wallace v. State. In Wallace, the court applied its own version of the Supreme Court's "intent-effects" test and held that SORA had a punitive effect as applied to Wallace—who had been charged, convicted, and served his sentence before Indiana enacted SORA—and that it thus violated Indiana's Ex Post Facto Clause. 905 N.E.2d at 379, 384.

Wallace did not foreclose all retroactive applications of SORA, however. Indeed, the same day that it decided Wallace, the Indiana Supreme Court issued its opinion in Jensen v. State. Unlike Wallace, Jensen pleaded guilty in 2000—after SORA's enactment. 905 N.E.2d at 388. At the time of his conviction, SORA required that he register as a sex offender for ten years. Id. at 389. Before the expiration of Jensen's ten-year registration requirement, the Indiana General Assembly amended SORA in 2006 to mandate that offenders like him register for life. He argued that this extension as applied to him violated Indiana's Ex Post Facto Clause, but the Indiana Supreme Court disagreed. In contrast to Wallace, who had no obligations before the legislature amended SORA to cover him, the "'broad and sweeping' disclosure requirements were in place and applied to Jensen at the time of his guilty plea in January 2000. Nothing in that regard was changed by the 2006 amendments." Id. at 394. Increasing only the length of an existing registration obligation did not rise to the level of "punishment" such that it violated the Indiana Constitution. Id. at 391–93.

After Jensen, the Indiana Supreme Court continued to focus on the marginal effects of SORA and its amendments. In State v. Pollard, 908 N.E.2d 1145 (Ind. 2009), it said that retroactively applying a new residency restriction was "adding punishment." Id. at 1154. The court's decision in Lemmon v. Harris, 949 N.E.2d 803 (Ind. 2011), though, concluded that an amendment that reclassified someone from a sex offender to a "sexually violent predator" was not punitive because, just like for Jensen, it amounted only to an extension of pre-existing obligations and was not "any more punitive." Id. at 810–11, 813 n.19.

Up to this point, each case had asked whether SORA had a marginal punitive effect compared to those requirements already imposed by Indiana law. A trio of 2016 cases fleshed out the retroactive applicability of SORA to offenders whose initial registration requirements originated in other states. In Tyson v. State, the court upheld the registration requirement for an offender obligated to register under Texas law at the time of his conviction. 51 N.E.3d at 90. It did so even though his conviction and Texas registration obligation occurred before Indiana's SORA covered his offense. Id. In reaching this result, the court concluded that the effect of "maintaining a registry requirement across state lines does not amount to a punitive burden" in violation of the state constitution. Id.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The court extended this reasoning in State v. Zerbe, 50 N.E.3d 368 (Ind. 2016). Zerbe was convicted in Michigan in 1992, before either Michigan or Indiana had enacted sex offender registration laws. Id. at 369. Michigan nevertheless required Zerbe to register upon his release from prison because Michigan did not share Indiana's stricter Ex Post Facto Clause and applied its law retroactively. Id. at 371. This twist changed nothing: the effect of maintaining that registration in Indiana was not punitive. Id. at 370–71. As the court clarified, "it is not Zerbe's crime that triggers his obligation to register as a sex offender in Indiana; rather, it is his Michigan registry requirement that does so." Id. at 370. The trilogy concluded with Ammons v. State, 50 N.E.3d 143 (Ind. 2016) (per curiam). Ammons had been convicted in Indiana before the passage of SORA, but he moved to Iowa, which obligated him to register for his Indiana crime. Id. When he moved back to Indiana in 2013, the Indiana Supreme Court confirmed that, just like for Tyson and Zerbe, maintaining Ammon's Iowa registration requirement for his Indiana crime did not amount to "additional punishment." Id. at 145.

To summarize, the question under Indiana's Ex Post Facto Clause is whether SORA's marginal effect is punitive. Maintaining, extending, or modifying a duty under SORA generally is not punitive, but imposing a new duty is. It is immaterial to the analysis whether Indiana law is maintaining, extending, or modifying its own duties or those of another state. Likewise, it is irrelevant where or when the conviction occurred, as long as another state imposed a lawful registration obligation on the offender and SORA does not so significantly alter that obligation to result in added punishment.

C.

Plaintiffs Brian Hope, Gary Snider, Joseph Standish, Adam Bash, Patrick Rice, and Scott Rush are sex offenders whose convictions predate the enactment of SORA. With the exception of Hope, each plaintiff's conviction occurred in another state, and all the plaintiffs had to register pursuant to the sex offender registration laws of another state. Upon moving or returning to Indiana, the State required the plaintiffs to register as sex offenders. The circumstances leading to the plaintiffs' registration obligations under SORA fall into the same factual patterns addressed by the Indiana Supreme Court in Zerbe and Ammons.

Hope was charged with child molestation in Indiana in 1993, prior to SORA's passage, and pleaded guilty. He then moved to Texas, which required him to register under its law. As in Ammons, Indiana applied SORA's requirements to him upon his return to the State in 2013. Snider, Standish, Bash, Rice, and Rush mirror Zerbe.[2] Each had to register in another state under its retroactive sex offender registration law and

[2] Bash's and Snider's cases differ from the earlier Indiana cases in one significant respect: both moved to Indiana before the 2006 enactment of the other-jurisdiction provision. In all three of the Indiana cases upholding the retroactive application of SORA to offenders with out-of-state registration requirements, the plaintiffs had moved to Indiana after July 1, 2006. There thus was no question whether Indiana's Constitution permits retroactive application of the other-jurisdiction provision. This wrinkle does not affect the remaining plaintiffs, who moved to Indiana after 2006. And we ultimately find it nondeterminative in Bash's and Snider's cases. On its face, the provision applies retroactively, and nothing in Indiana Supreme Court caselaw suggests that the state constitution would forbid this.

later moved to Indiana, where Indiana required them to register under SORA.[3]

The plaintiffs filed this suit alleging that as applied to them, SORA violates their right to travel and equal protection and that it runs afoul of the federal prohibition on ex post facto laws.[4] The plaintiffs articulated the burdens that SORA places on them in detail. Each of them is subject to SORA's more onerous reporting requirements and living and working restrictions given the nature of their offenses.[5] SORA classifies all the plaintiffs as "offender[s] against children" and as "serious sex offender[s]"; four of them also qualify as "sexually violent predator[s]." For Snider, Standish, Rush, and Bash (who has full custody of his minor son), this means that they cannot attend school functions or parent-teacher conferences for their children or grandchildren or drive them to school. Hope, who lacks a residence, has been required to leave a

[3] There has been some disagreement throughout this litigation regarding whether Indiana required the plaintiffs to register pursuant to the other-jurisdiction provision or because they committed registrable offenses under SORA (or substantially similar offenses under the law of another state). Regardless, the State's view of SORA when enforcing it is not pertinent to our understanding of the law and the state constitutional limits on it. We determine that SORA obligated each of the plaintiffs to register under the other-jurisdiction provision alone.

[4] The plaintiffs originally filed two lawsuits, which the district court consolidated.

[5] Hope pleaded guilty to child molestation, and Standish pleaded no contest to attempted sexual contact with a child under 13. Rush was convicted of sexual battery of a child under 12 years old. Snider was convicted of criminal sexual conduct in the first degree (rape), and Rice was convicted of aggravated rape. Bash pleaded guilty but mentally ill to rape and sodomy.

homeless shelter because it was located within 800 feet of a park. Snider had to move from the home he shared with his wife in 2006 because it fell within 1,000 feet of a daycare. Rush must take a day off work every time he reports. Bash, who relies on government financial assistance, has at times been unable to afford SORA's annual registration fee and been placed on a payment plan.

The district court granted summary judgment to the plaintiffs on all claims and enjoined Indiana from requiring them to register.[6] On appeal, a divided panel of this Court affirmed the district court's summary judgment determination based on the right to travel claim. Hope v. Comm'r of Ind. Dep't of Corr., 984 F.3d 532 (7th Cir. 2021). It did not reach the equal protection or ex post facto claims. We then granted Indiana's petition for rehearing en banc and vacated the panel opinion.

We review the district court's summary judgment determination de novo, drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of the nonmovant. Peerless Network, Inc. v. MCI Commc'n Serv., Inc., 917 F.3d 538, 545 (7th Cir. 2019). Upon review, we reverse and remand.

The plaintiffs argue that SORA violates their right to travel by treating them differently based on their length of residency in Indiana. We disagree. SORA may affect newer residents disproportionately, but it does not discriminate based on residency. Consequently, it does not violate the right to travel as the Supreme Court has articulated it.

The Supreme Court has identified three components of the right to travel: (1) "the right of a citizen of one State to enter and to leave another State," (2) "the right to be treated as a welcome visitor rather than an unfriendly alien when temporarily present in the second State," and (3) "for those travelers who elect to become permanent residents, the right to be treated like other citizens of that State." Saenz v. Roe, 526 U.S. 489, 500 (1999). Only the third right is at issue here.

That right has evolved over time. Although it is constitutionally safeguarded, there is no mention of a right to travel in the text of the Constitution. As early as 1872, however, the Supreme Court recognized this right as protected by the Constitution and has articulated its contours through subsequent cases. Id. at 503 (tracing the right's constitutional pedigree). Throughout that caselaw development, the source of the right to travel has shifted. In many of its earlier decisions, the Supreme Court discussed the right in equal protection parlance. See, e.g., Zobel v. Williams, 457 U.S. 55, 60 n.6 (1982) ("Right to travel cases have examined, in equal protection terms, state distinctions between newcomers and longer term residents."). But in its most recent right to travel case, Saenz v. Roe, the Court underscored that the right is grounded in the Privileges or Immunities Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[7] U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1; Saenz, 526 U.S. at 502–03.

[7] The Court has traced the three components of the right to travel to different parts of the Constitution. It is the third component—the right of new residents and longer-term residents to be treated alike—that is

In Saenz, the plaintiffs challenged the constitutionality of a California statute that limited new residents of one year or less to only the welfare benefits to which they would have been entitled in their prior state of residence. 526 U.S. at 492. The Supreme Court held that this rule violated the third aspect of the right to travel. The Court was not concerned with whether California was trying to penalize or deter travel or even if it was succeeding. Id. at 504. Instead, the Court found that "the right to travel embraces the citizen's right to be treated equally in her new State of residence" and that "the discriminatory classification is itself a penalty." Id. at 505. In addressing this discrimination, the Court applied strict scrutiny, which California's law failed.[8] Id. at 504–05. The duration of a citizen's residency and the location of his or her prior residence had no relevance to the citizen's welfare needs, and the bare desire to reduce the state's budget was not compelling enough to justify a complex layered hierarchy among bona fide California residents. Id. at 507.

Saenz solidified that laws infringing the right to travel must pass strict scrutiny. See id. at 504. The full scope of the right, however, remains uncertain. There have been no Supreme Court decisions interpreting the third component of the right to travel since Saenz. Cases before it held other durational-residency requirements unlawful but did so under the covered by the Fourteenth Amendment Privileges or Immunities Clause. Saenz, 526 U.S. at 502–03. The second component is protected by Article IV. Id. at 501. The Court has found support for the first component in various clauses but has not spoken definitively on it. Id.

[8] Like the question of the right to travel's constitutional footing, opinions discussing the appropriate scrutiny for the right have arrived at different answers. After Saenz, however, we apply strict scrutiny.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Equal Protection Clause. See, e.g., Mem'l Hosp. v. Maricopa County, 415 U.S. 250, 251, 261–62 (1974) (striking down a state law requiring an indigent person to be a county resident for one year to receive free medical care); Dunn v. Blumstein, 405 U.S. 330, 334–35, 360 (1972) (holding unlawful a state law permitting only residents who have lived in state for one year to vote); Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618, 622 (1969) (invalidating statutes that deny welfare assistance to individuals during their first year of residency). But see Sosna v. Iowa, 419 U.S. 393, 396, 409 (1975) (upholding an Iowa law requiring a resident to live in state for one year to obtain a divorce decree).

We agree with the plaintiffs, however, that the right to travel should be understood to go beyond prohibiting only durational-residency requirements that place a waiting period on benefits. It seems unlikely that a permanent distinction between bona fide residents based on their time residing in a state would be any more lawful than a temporary one. The Supreme Court's cases illustrate this point, although a majority of the Court has yet to endorse it. In Zobel, Alaska implemented a natural resource dividend statute that created "fixed, permanent distinctions between an ever-increasing number of perpetual classes of concededly bona fide residents, based on how long they have been in the State." 457 U.S. at 59. The Supreme Court held that this scheme was improper even under rational basis review. Id. at 64. The Court did the same thing with a New Mexico tax exemption for Vietnam veterans who were state residents before a specific date. Hooper v. Bernalillo Cnty. Assessor, 472 U.S. 612 (1985).

Although the Supreme Court did not directly hold that the laws at issue in Zobel and Hooper implicated the right to travel, a plurality of the Court later concluded that the right drove those decisions. See Att'y Gen. of N.Y. v. Soto-Lopez, 476 U.S. 898, 907–08 (1986) (plurality opinion). In the plurality's view, "a permanent deprivation of a significant benefit, based only on the fact of nonresidence at a past point in time, clearly operates to penalize appellees for exercising their right to migrate" and thus mandated strict scrutiny. Id. at 909.

At bottom, the Supreme Court's decisions in this area share a defining feature: each involved a rule that explicitly discriminated between old and new residents. As the Court noted in Saenz, the challenged classifications were "defined entirely by (a) the period of residency in California and (b) the location of the prior residences of the [plaintiffs]." 526 U.S. at 505. Likewise, in Soto-Lopez, the plurality emphasized that New York had deprived the plaintiffs "of a significant benefit, based only on the fact of nonresidence at a past point in time." 476 U.S. at 909. In each case, there has been a direct causal connection between a person's status as a new resident and the deprivation of a benefit. In legal parlance, each involved a "disparate treatment" claim.

B.

The critical inquiry in this case is whether Indiana's registration requirement, as applied consistently with the Indiana Supreme Court's marginal-effects test, violates the right to travel as it has been identified by the Supreme Court. Put another way, we ask whether SORA treats bona fide residents differently based on when they become residents. It does not.

Neither SORA nor Indiana's Ex Post Facto Clause discriminates based on residency. As a statutory matter, SORA obligates all offenders—both old and new residents—to register based on prior convictions. Indiana's Ex Post Facto Clause then relieves a subset of those who must register from that statutory obligation. Receiving the clause's benefits, though, does not depend on when an offender became an Indiana resident but on whether one is subject to an existing registration requirement. That requirement can come from Indiana, Jensen, 905 N.E.2d at 391–93, or from another state, Tyson, 51 N.E.3d at 90. The twist in this case is that for those offenders like the plaintiffs, convicted before Indiana's SORA covered their crimes, such a registration obligation must come from elsewhere.

The dissent takes issue with this feature of SORA but concedes that unlike Saenz and its predecessors, SORA has neither a durational-residency requirement nor a true, fixed-point residency scheme. That distinction is fatal to the plaintiffs' claim. Right to travel violations under the third component of the right exist only when a law expressly differentiates between residents based on their length or timing of residency. SORA does neither.

Instead, the dissent notes that SORA "does take notice of an individual's treatment in another jurisdiction" and argues that it thus "necessarily implicates his travel history." While true, that does not constitute a violation of the right to travel. The third component of the right—which the parties agree is the only aspect at issue in this appeal—deals only with discrimination based on residency. It is not triggered by every law that tangentially relates to a person's travel to or from another state.

In the absence of a true durational-residency requirement or any discriminatory purpose, the plaintiffs look to the effect of SORA on newer residents. As a practical effect of Indiana's SORA, the plaintiffs argue, out-of-state residency is a determinative factor for them and similar offenders. Undoubtedly having a registration obligation in another state is correlated with changing one's state of residence, as we can see not only from the six plaintiffs here but also from those in Tyson, Zerbe, and Ammons, all of whom had to register after moving to Indiana. But the correlation is imperfect. Some lifelong Indiana residents who committed crimes before SORA might well have a registration obligation based on their employment or schooling in an adjacent state. See, e.g., 730 ILCS 150/3(a-5) (requiring out-of-state students or employees to register in Illinois). The inverse is also true: some new Indiana residents who committed their crimes elsewhere might have no registration requirement in their prior state because of state-law protection against retroactivity. See, e.g., Doe v. State, 189 P.3d 999, 1004 (Alaska 2008) (holding that the state's Ex Post Facto Clause prohibits retroactive application of SORA). While prior, out-of-state residency is often an element in the application of SORA's registration requirements, residency is not the trigger for the other-jurisdiction provision.

The dissent acknowledges this but suggests that the law may still be unconstitutional even though some new residents are not adversely affected by SORA's requirements. For support, the dissent looks to Saenz. There, the Supreme Court struck down the law, even though some of the new residents received welfare benefits on equal footing as long-term Californians. Saenz, 526 U.S. at 497. What mattered, the Court concluded, was that California explicitly based its provision of benefits to new Californians—favorable or not—on the duration of their residence in California. Id. at 497, 505. The upshot of the dissent's Saenz analogy is that SORA likewise cannot be saved by the fact that some new Hoosiers may not be subject to the registration requirements while some lifelong Hoosiers may be covered. That is a false equivalence. California employed an express, durational-residency classification; it applied to all persons who had resided in California for less than a year and happened to produce a favorable effect for some of them. In contrast, as the dissent admits, SORA by its terms does not base its application on any length of residency in Indiana. New Indiana residents who arrive in Indiana without any prior registration requirements do not experience a favorable effect under SORA—the law simply does not apply to them at all. In sum, Saenz involved a discriminatory test that some new residents passed, while SORA involves a nondiscriminatory test that some new residents fail.

Prior, out-of-state residency represents neither causation nor perfect correlation for the application of SORA's registration requirements, and there is no evidence that anyone in Indiana intended to deter travel through the other-jurisdiction provision. The result? Only a disparate-impact claim remains—an argument that, as a practical matter, more new residents than old residents must register under the law. The difficulty with that approach, though, is that the Supreme Court has never extended the right to travel this far. Cf. Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 239 (1976) (holding that only disparate treatment or discriminatory purpose violates the Equal Protection Clause). To the contrary, every Supreme Court case involving a violation of the right to travel has featured a law that expressly imposes either a durational-residency requirement or a fixed-point residency restriction. See, e.g., Saenz, 526 U.S. at 505; Soto-Lopez, 476 U.S. at 905; Hooper, 472 U.S. at 621–22; Zobel, 457 U.S. at 57; Mem'l Hosp., 415 U.S. at 251, 261–62; Dunn, 405 U.S. at 334–35, 360. This case does not involve such a disparate treatment claim.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The dissent's approach thus expands the right to travel to an unprecedented extent. And it does so through a legal analysis that the Court has rejected repeatedly in the analogous Fourteenth Amendment equal protection context. Village of Arlington Heights v. Metro. Hous. Dev. Corp., 429 U.S. 252, 264–65 (1977) ("[O]fficial action will not be held unconstitutional solely because it results in a racially disproportionate impact."); see also Washington, 426 U.S. at 242. Equal protection jurisprudence is unequivocal: the only relevant consideration is a law's express categorization and any discriminatory purpose. Crawford v. Marion Cnty. Election Bd., 553 U.S. 181, 207 (2008) (Scalia, J., concurring).

The Supreme Court has never indicated that the neighboring Fourteenth Amendment Privileges or Immunities Clause ought to be evaluated differently, and it is difficult to justify such a distinction. It would be strange indeed if a law that created a disparate impact based on race would be subject to less exacting scrutiny than laws with a disparate impact on the right to travel. Further, one of the primary bases that the Supreme Court gave for rejecting disparate-impact theory—the potential invalidation of many neutral laws—applies with equal force in the right to travel context. See Washington, 426 U.S. at 248 (observing that a disparate-impact approach to equal protection claims "would be far-reaching and would raise serious questions about, and perhaps invalidate, a whole range of tax, welfare, public service, regulatory, and licensing statutes"). There is no reason for permitting disparate-impact theory in one context but not the other, especially given how historically intertwined the Supreme Court's right to travel jurisprudence has been with the Equal Protection Clause.[9]

The Third Circuit has actively refused to take this step. In Connelly v. Steel Valley School District, 706 F.3d 209 (3d Cir. 2013), a Pennsylvania school district set its teachers' salaries based on years of teaching experience but gave full credit for years teaching in the district, partial credit for years teaching in Pennsylvania, and reduced credit for years teaching elsewhere. Id. at 211–12. A teacher who taught for nine years in Maryland and received one year of credit argued that the school district's salary scheme violated his right to travel. Id. at 213. The Third Circuit recognized that the district was not discriminating based on duration of residency but on location of teaching experience. Id. at 214. A lifelong Pennsylvania resident who taught across the border in Maryland would have received the same treatment as a similar Maryland resident who moved to Pennsylvania. Id. at 214–15. In the Third Circuit's view, "[t]he right to travel simply is not implicated when there is no discrimination based on the duration of one's residency." Id. at 215. We agree.

There are good reasons for limiting the right to travel to disparate treatment claims, as we recognized more than a decade before Saenz. In Sklar v. Byrne, 727 F.2d 633 (7th Cir. 1984), we rejected the suggestion that laws with a disproportionate impact on new residents violate the right to travel. Sklar presented a right to travel objection to an ordinance banning unregistered handguns in the City of Chicago. Because one needed to be a Chicago resident to register a handgun for lawful possession—and Chicago stopped new registrations after 1982—Sklar argued that the ordinance violated the right to travel. Id. We explained then that this could not be how the right to travel functions, for applying strict scrutiny "based merely on a showing that newer residents would not benefit" would make huge swaths of the law vulnerable. Id. at 639. As in Sklar, the plaintiffs here want to apply strict scrutiny on the showing that they, as new residents, are "merely one group among several who do not benefit" from the protections of Indiana's Ex Post Facto Clause. Id. at 639. We refused the invitation in 1984 and decline it again today.

[9] Recall that prior to Saenz, the Supreme Court often positioned the right to travel within the Equal Protection Clause. See Zobel, 457 U.S. at 60 n.6.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The Privileges or Immunities Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment simply does not prohibit a state from incidentally burdening travel to or from the state. It guarantees only "the right of the newly arrived citizen to the same privileges and immunities enjoyed by other citizens of the same State." Saenz, 526 U.S. at 502. Because both old and new Indiana residents are treated equally under SORA and Indiana's Ex Post Facto Clause, we hold that the law does not violate plaintiffs' right to travel.

III.

The plaintiffs' equal protection claim is closely intertwined with their right to travel claim, but it remains distinct. Equal protection and right to travel claims require independent analyses—even when the basis for the claims is identical. Under the Privileges or Immunities Clause, if the right to travel is not implicated, that is the end of the plaintiffs' claim. The challenged law either is reviewed under strict scrutiny or not at all. Under the Equal Protection Clause, by contrast, failure to trigger heightened scrutiny does not end the claim. Courts still review the challenged law to ensure that the state has a rational basis for treating similarly situated people differently. FCC v. Beach Commc'ns, Inc., 508 U.S. 307, 313 (1993).

The Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause guarantees that "No State shall . . . deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1. Unlike the right to travel, which requires strict scrutiny when implicated, the standard of review applied to laws in equal protection cases varies. We apply strict scrutiny to a law if the plaintiffs' unequal treatment is based on membership in a protected class—race, national origin, religion, or alienage—or denial of a fundamental right. St. Joan Antida High Sch. Inc. v. Milwaukee Pub. Sch. Dist., 919 F.3d 1003, 1008 (7th Cir. 2019). When a plaintiff's unequal treatment is premised on a quasi-suspect classification, like gender, we apply intermediate scrutiny. Id. at 1008 n.3. In all other cases, courts default to rational basis review. Id. at 1008.

Here, plaintiffs argue that the district court correctly applied strict scrutiny when it evaluated SORA. That is because their equal protection theory assumes that SORA violates a fundamental right—the right to travel. We have already held that it does not. SORA treats the plaintiffs differently from other, pre-SORA offenders based on their out-of-state registration requirements—not based on their length of residency. Because Indiana's treatment of the plaintiffs is not based on their membership in a protected class or the denial of a fundamental right, strict scrutiny is inapplicable. Nor does intermediate scrutiny apply. Neither gender nor any other quasi-suspect class serves as the catalyst for the plaintiffs' differential treatment under SORA.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Our determination that heightened scrutiny is inapplicable is not fatal to their equal protection claim, however. It just means that SORA will be assessed under rational basis review. The plaintiffs may still challenge Indiana's application of SORA to them because it treats them differently than similarly situated Indiana offenders. SORA, as modified by the Indiana Supreme Court's constitutional overlay, creates two classes of pre-SORA offenders—those who must register in Indiana, and those who are free from that requirement. Indiana distinguishes between the two groups based solely on whether the pre-SORA offender had a registration obligation in another state. For example: two lifelong Indiana residents, both with pre-SORA convictions, will be treated differently if one commutes into Chicago for work—and so is subject to Illinois's reporting requirements—while the other never leaves Indiana. The distinction holds true for offenders who attend school in another state or who have lived in another state imposing registration obligations on them. In short, two similarly situated Indiana offenders may have vastly different legal obligations simply because one of them has an out-of-state registration obligation. The question is whether Indiana's differential treatment on this basis is rationally related to a legitimate government purpose. See Armour v. City of Indianapolis, Ind., 566 U.S. 673, 680 (2012); FCC, 508 U.S. at 313 ("[A] statutory classification that neither proceeds along suspect lines nor infringes fundamental constitutional rights must be upheld against equal protection challenge if there is any reasonably conceivable state of facts that could provide a rational basis for the classification.").

Because the district court did not address whether SORA satisfies rational basis review, we remand the equal protection claim for this purpose. In doing so, we stress that this review should be undertaken with care and that the district court should thoroughly develop the factual record on this score. Rational basis review favors the State but does not ensure an automatic win. See, e.g., Allegheny Pittsburgh Coal Co. v. Cnty. Comm'n, 488 U.S. 336 (1989) (invalidating a tax assessment on equal protection grounds for failing rational basis review).

IV.

The plaintiffs' final claim is an ex post facto challenge to SORA. Because we determine that SORA is not a punitive statute, it does not violate the federal Ex Post Facto Clause.

Article I, section 10, clause 1 of the United States Constitution prohibits states from passing ex post facto laws—those which "retroactively alter the definition of crimes or increase the punishment for criminal acts." Cal. Dep't of Corr. v. Morales, 514 U.S. 499, 504 (1995) (quoting Calder v. Bull, 3 U.S. (Dall.) 386, 391–92 (1798)). Statutes that transgress the Ex Post Facto Clause, then, share two characteristics: They are "both retroactive and penal." Vasquez v. Foxx, 895 F.3d 515, 520 (7th Cir. 2018); see also Johnson v. United States, 529 U.S. 694, 699 (2000).

There is tension in the caselaw regarding the requirements of the retroactivity prong. Compare United States v. Leach, 639 F.3d 769, 773 (7th Cir. 2011) (deciding that SORAs are prospective regardless of their reach because they "merely create[] new, prospective legal obligations based on the person's prior history"), with Does #1-5 v. Snyder, 834 F.3d 696, 698 (6th Cir. 2016) (holding Michigan's version of SORA retroactive because it applied to offenders convicted prior to the law's enactment), and Shaw v. Patton, 823 F.3d 556, 560 (10th Cir. 2016) (holding the same with respect to Oklahoma's version of SORA). While we recognize this tension, we need not—and do not—revisit our decisions on retroactivity at this time. Here, the plaintiffs did not ask us to overrule our prior decisions, and their ex post facto challenge fails regardless because SORA is not punitive.

In determining whether a statute is punitive, Smith v. Doe is our guidepost. There, the Supreme Court addressed whether Alaska's sex offender registration and notification law violated the federal Ex Post Facto Clause. The Court applied what is commonly called the intent-effects test to hold that Alaska's sex offender registration act was not punitive. Smith, 538 U.S. at 105–06. Applying that two-step standard, courts first query whether the legislature intended to enact a punitive, rather than a civil, law. If not, the inquiry becomes whether the law is "so punitive either in purpose or effect as to negate [the State's] intention to deem it civil." Id. at 92 (internal quotation and citation omitted). To assess a law's effects, Smith considered five of the factors originally articulated in Kennedy v. Mendoza-Martinez, 372 U.S. 144 (1963). Those factors are "whether, in its necessary operation, the regulatory scheme: [1] has been regarded in our history and traditions as a punishment; [2] imposes an affirmative disability or restraint; [3] promotes the traditional aims of punishment; [4] has a rational connection to a nonpunitive purpose; or [5] is excessive with respect to this purpose." Smith, 538 U.S. at 97.

This is a challenging standard for plaintiffs. When assessing whether a law is punitive, "we ordinarily defer to the legislature's stated intent." Kansas v. Hendricks, 521 U.S. 346, 361 (1997). If the legislative intent is to enact a civil law, only the "clearest proof that the statutory scheme is so punitive in either purpose or effect" will suffice to override it. Seling v.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Young, 531 U.S. 250, 261 (2001); Hudson v. United States, 522 U.S. 93, 104 (1997); see also Smith, 538 U.S. at 92.

The plaintiffs have conceded that Indiana intended to enact a civil, regulatory scheme when it passed SORA. We thus consider only whether SORA is so punitive in effect as to override Indiana's nonpunitive intent. To that end, we address the Mendoza-Martinez factors in turn.

1. Historical and traditional forms of punishment

Plaintiffs present three historical forms of punishment—shaming, banishment, and parole/probation—and argue that SORA's requirements are tantamount to these sanctions. All three comparators suffer the same infirmity: SORA does not actually inflict what is historically and traditionally considered punishment.

The plaintiffs first argue that SORA's publication of their classifications—such as "sexually violent offender" or "offender against children"—is "designed to outrage" and stigmatizes without a present assessment of individual dangerousness. In this regard, SORA goes further than the statute in Smith, which assigned no categorical labels to offenders. But SORA's classification scheme falls short of public shaming for the same reason as the Alaska statute in Smith. Indiana classifies offenders based on offense type and in doing so, transmits accurate information about the underlying conviction—a matter of public record. To the extent that stigma results, it arises "not from public display for ridicule and shaming but from the dissemination of accurate information about a criminal record." Smith, 538 U.S. at 98. But see Does #1-5, 834 F.3d at 703 (concluding that the "ignominy" results from the statute's application of labels, not from conviction information).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The plaintiffs also suggest that SORA's residency restrictions are akin to banishment, but we rejected this assertion when evaluating the Illinois sex offender registration statute. Vasquez, 895 F.3d at 521. We reasoned that although residency restrictions limit offenders' living and employment options, they do not amount to banishment—which traditionally meant that persons "could neither return to their original community nor … be admitted easily into a new one." Id. (internal quotation and citation omitted). The plaintiffs acknowledge our precedent but note that the Indiana restriction is 500 feet greater than the Illinois restriction. The difference between a 500- and 1,000-foot residency restriction is not constitutionally significant, however, because it does not render SORA's requirements any more similar to banishment.

Lastly, the plaintiffs contend that SORA's restrictions on where they may live or work, in tandem with its in-person reporting requirements, make it analogous to parole or probation. This is a closer call. In Smith, the Supreme Court acknowledged that a comparison between the Alaska statute and parole "has some force." Smith, 538 U.S. at 101. Even so, the Court held that the statute was distinguishable because it lacked two key characteristics of parole: (1) mandatory conditions, and (2) the option for a supervisor "to seek the revocation of probation or release in case of infraction." Id. The Court emphasized that Alaska's reporting requirements were not in-person and that offenders could "move where they wish" and live and work without supervision. Id. SORA differs from the Alaska statute on these points.[10] We conclude, however,

[10] While SORA employs mechanisms like those used in parole and probation, we note that it does not subject offenders to the same degree of

that it is still distinct from parole because it lacks the second defining feature of parole discussed by Smith. To be sure, plaintiffs may face criminal prosecution for failure to comply with reporting requirements. But that would be a consequence distinct from the plaintiffs' original offenses; parole and the supervisor's ability to seek revocation of it are tied to the terms of the original offense. A sex offender who violates SORA is not subject to revocation—but rather a new criminal prosecution for violating state law. Shaw, 823 F.3d at 566. But see Snyder, 834 F.3d at 703. Thus, a sex offender covered by SORA is not under the same type of supervision as a parolee.

On balance, SORA's requirements do not amount to traditional forms of punishment. So, this factor, while close, tips in favor of Indiana.

2. Affirmative disabilities or restraints

The next factor considers whether SORA subjects the plaintiffs to an "affirmative disability or restraint." Mendoza-Martinez, 372 U.S. at 168. The boundaries of this factor are undefined. The Alaska law in Smith required offenders to register and mandated reporting of any changes to facial features or plans to borrow a car or procure psychiatric treatment. Smith, 538 U.S. at 101. The Court held that these requirements scrutiny or control. See Vasquez, 895 F.3d at 521 (concluding that Illinois's SORA, despite limiting where offenders could live, did not resemble the "comprehensive control" of probation). For example, SORA entails some supervision—law enforcement officers must do annual check-ins to verify an offender's physical address—but this differs in degree and type from the monitoring of parolees and probationers. See Shaw, 823 F.3d at 564–65 ("Historically, a probation officer took a far more active role in a probationer's life than simply collecting information for a database.").

"make a valid regulatory program effective and do not impose punitive restraints." Id. at 102. In doing so, the Court underscored that the statute "imposes no physical restraint, and so does not resemble the punishment of imprisonment, which is the paradigmatic affirmative disability or restraint." Id. at 100. It also emphasized that the "Act's obligations are less harsh than the sanctions of occupational debarment, which we have held to be nonpunitive." Id. While the Court observed that Alaska's SORA did not require in-person reporting or restrict offenders' ability to change jobs or residences, the Court gave no indication whether such requirements would constitute punitive disabilities or restraints. Id. at 100–01.

Outside the "paradigmatic" example of physical restraint, it is not evident what statutory requirements amount to a restraint or disability. What is clear is that very few burdens are significant enough to tip the scale. See, e.g., Hudson, 522 U.S. at 104 (monetary fine and occupational debarment are not affirmative disabilities or restraints "as that term is normally understood"); Flemming v. Nestor, 363 U.S. 603, 617 (1960) (denial of a noncontractual government benefit is not an affirmative disability or restraint); see also Vasquez, 895 F.3d at 522 ("[L]ike the registration scheme at issue in Smith, the residency law imposes no physical restraint[] and so does not resemble the punishment of imprisonment, which is the paradigmatic affirmative disability or restraint." (internal quotation and citation omitted)). Even when the Supreme Court confronted a state law imposing a paradigmatic form of restraint—involuntary confinement—the Court held that this did not make the law punitive. Hendricks, 521 U.S. at 363. Here, it is sufficient to note that to the extent that SORA's obligations amount to restraints or disabilities, standing alone they are not sufficiently severe in view of Supreme Court precedent to make SORA punitive.

3. Promotion of traditional aims of punishment

Plaintiffs next suggest that SORA has punitive aims—specifically, incapacitation, deterrence, and retribution. The Supreme Court has rejected these arguments in the context of other sex offender registration laws, however. See, e.g., Smith, 538 U.S. at 102 ("Any number of governmental programs might deter crime without imposing punishment."); Hudson, 522 U.S. at 104–05 (holding that the involuntary commitment of a child sex offender was not retributive because prior conviction was used as evidence of future dangerousness, not to assign culpability). We similarly were unpersuaded that the residency restrictions at issue in Vasquez furthered traditional punitive aims in lieu of the Illinois SORA's "obvious aim" to "protect children." Vasquez, 895 F.3d at 522. The Sixth Circuit has also "accordingly give[n] this factor little weight," recognizing that civil statutes often pursue these aims, too. Does #1-5, 834 F.3d at 704. Because the plaintiffs have failed to show why the analyses in these cases do not apply with equal force to the same arguments that they raise here, this factor favors Indiana.

4. Rational connection to a nonpunitive purpose

Whether the law has a "rational connection to a nonpunitive purpose" is "a most significant factor in our determination that the statute's effects" are not punitive. Smith, 538 U.S. at 102 (internal quotation and citation omitted). We begin by identifying a nonpunitive purpose and then turn to whether the law's requirements are rationally connected to that goal.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

One aim of SORA is to advance public safety, particularly for vulnerable minors. See Smith, 538 U.S. at 93 ("[A]n imposition of restrictive measures on sex offenders adjudged to be dangerous is a legitimate nonpunitive governmental objective and has been historically so regarded." (internal quotation and citation omitted)). No one disputes this nonpunitive purpose. The disagreement centers instead on whether SORA's requirements are rationally related to that aim. We are satisfied that they are.

Laws that result in consequences for offenders' prior conduct are not automatically punitive if they are connected to a regulatory purpose that falls within the power of the state, such as public safety. Flemming, 363 U.S. at 616. Deportation, for example, is "an exercise of the plenary [power] of Congress to fix the conditions under which aliens are permitted to enter and remain in this country." Id. While it presents a consequence for people who have unlawfully entered the United States, that does not convert a lawful exercise of congressional power into a punishment. Similarly, the Supreme Court has held that excluding former felons from practicing a profession "is an incident of the State's power to protect the health and safety of its citizens"—"not a purpose to add to the punishment of ex-felons." Id. So, too, here. SORA's registration requirements rationally relate to Indiana's power to protect the safety of its citizens, despite its burden on sex offenders. See Shaw, 823 F.3d at 572 (explaining that Oklahoma's "reporting requirements are also consistent with a non-punitive intent—promoting public safety—by facilitating law enforcement's identification of sex offenders and notification to the public of potential dangers"). This critical factor supports Indiana.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

5. Excessive with respect to that purpose

The touchpoint for the excessiveness factor is "whether the regulatory means chosen are reasonable in light of the nonpunitive objective," not whether "the legislature has made the best choice possible to address the problem it seeks to remedy." Smith, 538 U.S. at 105. The burden is on the plaintiff to establish that the law's "nonpunitive purpose is a sham or mere pretext." Id. at 103 (internal quotation and citation omitted).

While the plaintiffs proffer several arguments on this factor, they fall short of meeting their burden. First, they contend that SORA does not further its goal, making its requirements excessive. The plaintiffs cite a study showing that sex offenders do not recidivate at higher rates than other felons. The implication is that SORA's registration requirements will not bolster public safety because sex offenders do not present an outsized threat. This conclusion is flawed. The plaintiffs' study does not establish that sex offenders pose little risk to the public, just that their risk of reoffending is similar to that of other ex-felons. See Vasquez, 895 F.3d at 522 ("[S]imilar recidivism rates across different categories of crime would not establish that the nonpunitive aim of this statute—protecting children—is a sham.").

The plaintiffs also take issue with SORA's application to all offenders "without regard to their future dangerousness." But the Supreme Court "has upheld against ex post facto challenges laws imposing regulatory burdens on individuals convicted of crimes without any corresponding risk assessment." Smith, 538 U.S. at 104; see, e.g., De Veau v. Braisted, 363 U.S. 144, 159–60 (1960) (plurality opinion) (upholding a law that prohibited former felons from working as union officers).

Although Smith recognized that the "magnitude of the restraint" could require individual assessments in some cases, such cases are the exception. Smith, 538 U.S. at 104 (discussing the involuntary and potentially indefinite confinement at issue in Hendricks as one example). Indiana is not required to make individualized judgments before imposing its registration requirements. This factor favors Indiana.

***

At best, the plaintiffs have shown that SORA partially resembles one historical punishment and may place some affirmative restraints or disabilities on them. The remaining factors, including the law's rational relation to a nonpunitive purpose, all support Indiana. The plaintiffs have not carried their heavy burden of proving that SORA is so punitive in effect as to override the Indiana legislature's intent to enact a civil law. As the plaintiffs acknowledge, "the Alaska statute at issue in [Smith] shares several core provisions with Indiana's SORA." While SORA goes farther than the Alaska law in some respects, it is not so far afield as to warrant a different outcome than in Smith.

V.

We hold that Indiana's SORA neither violates plaintiffs' right to travel nor constitutes an impermissible ex post facto law. Accordingly, we reverse the district court's entry of summary judgment and remand for further analysis of the equal protection claim consistent with this opinion.

REVERSED AND REMANDED

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

SCUDDER, Circuit Judge, concurring. I join the majority opinion and write separately to address one aspect of the opinion—the retroactivity inquiry of the Ex Post Facto Clause.

Our case law on the retroactivity prong needs a course correction. See Vasquez v. Foxx, 895 F.3d 515 (7th Cir. 2018); United States v. Leach, 639 F.3d 769 (7th Cir. 2011). The pertinent retroactivity inquiry is whether the law "imposes a punishment for an act which was not punishable at the time it was committed; or imposes additional punishment to that then prescribed." Carmell v. Texas, 529 U.S. 513, 540 (2000) (quoting Cummings v. Missouri, 71 U.S. 277, 325–26 (1867) (internal quotation marks omitted)).

But in Leach we suggested otherwise, determining that the federal SORNA was not impermissibly retroactive because it "merely creates new, prospective legal obligations based on the person's prior history." 639 F.3d at 773; see also Vasquez, 895 F.3d at 520 (applying Leach's retroactivity holding to Illinois's SORA). Though this observation about how SORNA functions is descriptively correct, it misses the mark on the retroactivity inquiry. What Leach and Vasquez failed to account for is that the registration obligations did not apply at the time the sex offenders committed the offenses triggering registration—meaning that the sex offender registration laws imposed obligations beyond those prescribed at the time of the offense.

The majority opinion acknowledges this tension in our case law but stops short of fixing it. See Maj. Op. 23. I would take the next step and use today's decision to align our law with Supreme Court precedent. The issue is sure to surface in future cases and our sitting en banc provides the perfect opportunity for the full court to issue the course correction.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

There is no question that the obligations imposed by Indiana's SORA on the six plaintiffs in this case apply retroactively, and we should use today's decision to say so.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

ROVNER, Circuit Judge, with whom WOOD and HAMILTON, Circuit Judges, join, concurring in part and dissenting in part. I join all but Part II of the court's opinion today. I remain convinced that Indiana's other jurisdiction provision[1] deprives the plaintiffs of state citizenship on equal terms with other Indiana residents and in so doing violates their right to travel. I therefore dissent from that part of the court's decision.

Encompassed within the right to travel is the right to relocate from one state to another and, upon establishing bona fide residence in a new state, to enjoy the same privileges and immunities as any other citizen of that state. Saenz v. Roe, 526 U.S. 489, 502, 119 S. Ct. 1518, 1526 (1999). Each of the six plaintiffs in this case has been denied the benefit of Indiana's ex post facto provision[2] that a similarly-situated, but lifelong Indiana resident would receive. Because each of the plaintiffs committed a sex offense before Indiana attached a registration obligation to that crime, the Indiana Supreme Court's decision in Wallace precludes the State from relying on their convictions as the basis for requiring them to register. Wallace v. State, 905 N.E.2d 371, 384 (Ind. 2009). What Indiana has done instead is to rely on the fact that each of the plaintiffs previously was required to register in another state as the basis for imposing its own registration obligation on them. Had any of the plaintiffs been a resident of Indiana at the time of his offense and never traveled anywhere that burdened him with a duty to register, Indiana itself would not have imposed such a burden on him. It is thus only their travel—in this case, relocation from another state to Indiana—that renders them subject to a registration obligation in Indiana. This sets up the very sort of tiered classes of state citizenship that the Supreme Court's travel jurisprudence forbids.[3] The fact that a lifelong Indiana resident may also incur an obligation to register in Indiana by working or studying in another state that imposes such a duty on him does not obviate the problem; it simply makes clear that Indiana is relying on the fortuity of a person's travel to burden its citizen with an obligation that it would not otherwise impose.

At bottom, what Indiana is doing is assigning differential obligations to its citizens based not on what they have done but where they have been. It is relying on another state's handling of a particular criminal history to determine how that [3] The number of individuals who can assert the particular right-to-travel claim the plaintiffs are asserting in this case is necessarily limited and dwindling. Anyone convicted of a sex offense since the mid-1990s or later (i.e., after registration requirements were first adopted in Indiana and elsewhere) will likely be subject to registration in Indiana based on their criminal histories. Wallace only poses an obstacle to imposing registration obligations on someone convicted before Indiana made his crime (or its out-of-state equivalent) a registrable offense. So, with respect to the vast majority of offenders, Indiana will not have to rely on the other jurisdiction requirement as it must with respect to the six plaintiffs in this case, all of whom were convicted in 1994 or earlier and are now in their fifties or sixties.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

individual will be treated in Indiana. So a sex offender whose crime would not otherwise trigger a registration obligation as a matter of Indiana law will nonetheless be required to register because another state, as a matter of its own law, required him to register so long as he lived, worked, or studied in that state. Indiana thus is relying on another state's legal rules to circumscribe his rights as an Indiana citizen. This is incompatible with the holdings and the logic of the Supreme Court's right-to-travel cases.

One point should be made clear at the outset: In taking notice that another state has imposed a registration obligation on one of its citizens, Indiana is not purporting to enforce another state's judgment or to implement the registration obligation that state has imposed. This would be a very different case if that were the aim and effect of Indiana's other jurisdiction provision. But it is not. Indiana instead is relying on the historical fact that another state required an offender to register there (whenever and for however long) as the basis for imposing its own registration obligation on one of its citizens. See State v. Zerbe, 50 N.E.3d 368, 370 (Ind. 2016) ("it is not Zerbe's crime that triggers his obligation to register as a sex offender in Indiana; rather it is his Michigan registry requirement that does so") (emphasis in original). This new obligation is not in any way tethered to the life of the registration obligation imposed by the other state. It is not as if, for example, an offender who was required by California to register for a period of 10 years and seven years into that obligation moves to Indiana will now have to register for an additional three years in Indiana in order to complete the 10-year term that California imposed. It does not matter to Indiana's other jurisdiction provision for how long an offender was required to register in another state or when that obligation expires. It only matters to Indiana's registration scheme that there was a prior obligation, period. And how lengthy the new registration obligation will be in Indiana is a matter answered by Indiana law. Thus, whereas the other state may only have required an offender to register for a period of years, Indiana may require him to register for the remainder of his life. Take plaintiff Patrick Rice, for example. Based on his 1989 conviction for aggravated sexual assault, Rice was required by Illinois to register for a period of 10 years upon his release from prison in 2017, but when he subsequently relocated to Indiana to live with his sister, Indiana imposed a lifetime registration obligation on him, because his Illinois offense makes him a "sexually violent predator" under Indiana law. Cf. Jensen v. State, 905 N.E.2d 384, 394 (Ind. 2009) (statutory revisions to registration scheme which have effect of lengthening Indiana offender's existing registration obligation from 10 years to life do not amount to ex post facto violation).

So in no sense is this case one about the enforceability of another state's judgment or the comity that Indiana must afford to that judgment. Indiana is simply relying on an offender's registration history in another state as the basis for implementing its own, independent duty to register in Indiana. And it is doing so in circumstances where the offender's criminal history itself would not trigger a registration obligation as a matter of Indiana law.

Over the course of this litigation, Indiana has cited two related reasons for relying on a prior registration obligation imposed elsewhere as the basis for imposing a duty to register in Indiana. First, Indiana is concerned that it not become a haven for sex offenders who, like the plaintiffs here, committed sex offenses before those offenses became subject to registration in Indiana and whom the state, under Wallace, cannot require to register based on that criminal history. Second, Indiana is using the other jurisdiction requirement as a secondary, catchall criterion for requiring registration of individuals whose particular crimes happen not to fall within any of the categories of offenses that the Indiana legislature has thus far identified as crimes requiring registration.

It goes without saying that Indiana has a legitimate interest in implementing registration obligations as a means of protecting its citizenry from individuals who might repeat their prior sex offenses. I can also appreciate the state's wish not to allow an offender to escape a duty to register in Indiana simply because his specific sex offense is not one that the legislature thought to identify in the drafting process as one warranting registration. But see Edwards v. California, 314 U.S. 160, 173, 62 S. Ct. 164, 167 (1941) ("no boundar[y] to the permissible area of State legislative activity … is more certain than the prohibition against attempts on the part of any single State to isolate itself from difficulties common to all of them by restraining the transportation of persons and property across its borders"); Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618, 629, 89 S. Ct. 1322, 1329 (1969) ("the purpose of inhibiting migration by needy persons into the State is constitutionally impermissible"), overruled in part on other grounds by Edelman v. Jordan, 415 U.S. 651, 671, 94 S. Ct. 1347, 1359–60 (1974).

But Indiana is among a minority of jurisdictions that regards sex offender registration as punitive and thus subject to the ex post facto clause of its constitution.[4] Thus, as a matter of its own law, Indiana cannot require the six plaintiffs in this case to register based solely on their criminal histories, as the plaintiffs committed their crimes before the state legislature first made them registrable offenses. Wallace precludes the state from effectively increasing their punishment after the fact.

By looking instead to a registration obligation imposed by another state as the basis for imposing its own obligation on the plaintiffs, Indiana nominally avoids the ex post facto problem.[5] But in doing so, it has created another, federal

[4] Some eight state supreme courts have held that the retroactive application of sex offender registration and notification laws violate their respective state constitutions. See U.S. Dep't of Justice, Office of Justice Programs, Office of Sex Offender Sentencing, Monitoring, Apprehending, Registering, & Tracking, Sex Offender Registration and Notification in the United States, Current Case Law and Issues—March 2019: Retroactive Application & Ex Post Facto Considerations, at 1–2 & n.9, available at https://smart.ojp.gov/sorna/current-law/case-law-updates.

[5] I say nominally because the rationale of the Indiana cases is that Indiana is premising its registration obligation solely upon the obligation imposed by the offender's former domicile and not on his underlying criminal offense, e.g., Zerbe, 50 N.E.3d at 370, with the result that his obligation to register is effectively continued across state lines, Tyson v. State, 51 N.E.3d 88, 96 (Ind. 2016). (Of course, there would have been no duty to register in the first instance but for the particular offense he committed, and that offense would not trigger a duty to register under Indiana law.) I am not confident this rationale holds up in all applications of Indiana's other jurisdiction requirement, however. Two of the plaintiffs, Gary Snider and Adam Bash, relocated to Indiana three and six years, respectively, before the Indiana legislature adopted the other jurisdiction provision in 2006. Although they had been required to register in their former domiciles, those registration obligations would have effectively come to an end once they moved to Indiana, at least absent an assertion of constitutional problem. Relying on an obligation that another state has imposed as a matter of its own law as the determinant for how a new Indiana citizen will be treated in Indiana interferes with his right to travel. It is only because each plaintiff lived somewhere else previously that he can now be required to register as a matter of Indiana law. And upon their relocation to Indiana each finds his rights vis-à-vis registration defined by his former domicile: only because he once lived somewhere that authorized registration for his offense may he be required to register in Indiana, whose own law would not have permitted a registration obligation based on the very same criminal history. See Saenz, 526 U.S. at 505, 119 S. Ct. at 1527 ("the right to travel embraces the citizen's right to be treated equally in her new state of residence"); Hooper v. Bernalillo Cnty. Assessor, 472 U.S. 612, 623, 105 S. Ct. 2862, 2868 (1985) ("The State may not favor established residents over new residents based on the view that the State may take care of 'its own,' if such is defined by prior residence. Newcomers, by establishing bona fide residence in the State, become the State's 'own' and may not be discriminated against solely on the basis of their [date of] arrival in the State … ."); Shapiro, 394 U.S. at 633, 89 S. Ct. at 1330 ("We recognize that a State has a valid interest in preserving the fiscal integrity of its extraterritorial authority by their former home states. So in their cases, it would be difficult for Indiana to claim that application of the other jurisdiction provision simply maintained their prior registration obligations across state lines. (Of course, we also know that Indiana initially required Snider and Bash to register based on their criminal histories; but the 2009 decision in Wallace made plain in hindsight that the State lacked the authority to require Snider and Bash to register on that basis.)

programs. … But a State may not accomplish such a purpose by invidious distinctions between classes of its citizens.").

My colleagues in the majority characterize the effect of the other jurisdiction provision on the plaintiffs as merely one of disparate impact rather than one of disparate treatment. It is true enough that the statute does not draw express distinctions based on a person's residency. But the statute on its face does take notice of an individual's treatment in another jurisdiction and uses his treatment elsewhere as the template for how he will now be treated as an Indiana citizen, under Indiana law. In doing so, the statute necessarily implicates his travel history. More to the point, it creates distinct classes of Indiana citizenship that turn upon what rights and obligations an individual has been assigned by another state. In some instances, the effect is benign; in others, the individual loses important freedoms he would have enjoyed as an Indiana citizen had he never relocated from or traveled to another state. In all applications of the statutory provision at issue here, it is the person's travel history, and his treatment in another jurisdiction, that define his rights as an Indiana citizen going forward. The burdens that the plaintiffs in this case, and other Indiana offenders like them, must shoulder as a result of the other jurisdiction provision are not the unintended consequence of a statute that is otherwise neutral vis-à-vis the right to travel. The very purpose of the statute is to use the fact of one's prior presence in another jurisdiction to circumscribe his rights as an Indiana citizen. This is not disparate impact. It is, overtly and unmistakably, disparate treatment. Although the Supreme Court has not yet confronted the particular fact pattern presented here, its teachings show us why

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The majority relies on two features of Indiana's other jurisdiction provision to distinguish it from the sorts of durational residency schemes that the Supreme Court has deemed to violate the right to travel. First, if a sex offender relocates to Indiana from another state that did not require him to register, Indiana's other jurisdiction provision will not by its terms compel him to register in Indiana. Second, relocating to Indiana is not the only way of triggering the other jurisdiction provision: The provision also comes into play when an Indiana resident—however longstanding—travels to another state for work or study (while remaining an Indiana resident) and is required to register in that state so long as he is present for those purposes. To the majority's way of thinking, these provisions show that Indiana is not discriminating based on the length of one's residency in Indiana, as has typically been the case in the Supreme Court's jurisprudence.

Certainly the timing and duration of one's residency in Indiana is not the sole determinant of whether its other jurisdiction provision will compel him to register as a sex offender in Indiana. If anything, however, the way in which Indiana's other jurisdiction provision operates makes plain that Indiana is relying exclusively on how one was treated in another state to determine how he will be treated in Indiana. This cannot be reconciled with what I understand to be the animating rationale of the Supreme Court's right-to-travel cases. I will take each feature of the Indiana provision, including its application to relocating persons like the plaintiffs, in turn to explain my view.

Start with the benign application of the other jurisdiction provision: If an offender relocates to Indiana from a state that did not require him to register, then he will not be made to register in Indiana. I agree with the majority that this is one aspect of the provision showing that Indiana is not invariably discriminating against residents who relocate from other states.

Of course, as the majority recognizes, this was true in Saenz as well. For the recipients of public benefits who were relocating to California from other states, California capped the amount of such benefits such individuals could receive during their first year of residence in California at the levels they received in their prior states of residence for a period of one year. But not every state had public benefit levels that were lower than California's relatively generous payments; a handful gave their residents equal or greater benefits. Individuals relocating from those states thus suffered no disadvantage as a result of their relocation; they received the same benefit amounts upon relocation that a long-standing Californian would. 526 U.S. at 497 & n.8, 119 S. Ct. at 1523 & n.8. That did not move the Supreme Court. It still found the scheme as a whole one that impermissibly discriminated against new residents based on their recent arrival in California. Id. at 505–07, 119 S. Ct. at 1527–28.

So the fact that not every sex offender who relocates to Indiana from another state or travels from Indiana to another state will incur a registration obligation as a result does not rule out the possibility that Indiana is interfering with the right to travel—indeed, it confirms that what Indiana is doing is using another state's treatment of a sex offender as a proxy for how he should be treated in Indiana. If an offender is fortunate enough to travel to or relocate from a state that does not impose a registration obligation on him, Indiana will not do so; but if the other state does require him to register, then Indiana will as well. Either way, Indiana is relying on another state's treatment of the offender as dispositive of how he will be treated in Indiana.

This is unquestionably the case with the six plaintiffs before us. All six committed a sex offense in or before 1994, when Indiana adopted the original version of its Sex Offense Registration Act (SORA). Because the plaintiffs' crimes were committed before they became registrable offenses under Indiana law, Wallace precludes the state from imposing a registration obligation based on their criminal histories. Wallace treats registration as a punishment, and thus one that Indiana's ex post facto provision rules out for offenses taking place before registration became proscribed for an individual's offense. Had the plaintiffs been living in Indiana at the time of their offenses and remained there afterward, they would be free today of any obligation to register under Wallace.

For the plaintiffs, it is the fact that they relocated to Indiana at a later date, and from other states that required them to register, that deprives them of the benefit of Indiana's ex post facto provision. Although their crimes were such that, if committed in Indiana, they would not be registrable offenses under Wallace, because each of the plaintiffs lived previously in a jurisdiction that treated the offenses as registrable—and saw no ex post facto problem with doing so—Indiana seizes on the prior registration obligation itself to demand registration in Indiana. It is thus one's relocation from such a state that is the trigger for the registration obligation in Indiana.

Plaintiff Brian Hope's history makes plain the problem. Hope in fact committed his sex offense in Indiana. He committed the offense in 1993 and pleaded guilty in 1996. In 2000, he completed his probation. In 2004, he moved to California and later to Texas, where he was required to register under Texas law based on his Indiana conviction.[6] When he returned to Indiana in 2013 to help care for an ailing family member, Indiana invoked the other jurisdiction provision to require him to register in Indiana. Given the date of his offense, Indiana law does not treat his criminal history as one requiring registration: Again, Wallace holds that the state's ex post facto provision forbids it. But because Hope previously lived in Texas, which did treat his offense as one requiring registration, Indiana relies on the prior registration obligation itself to demand that he register in Indiana. But for his travel to and from Texas, Hope would have no such obligation as a matter of Indiana law. See also Ammons v. State, 50 N.E.3d 143, 144–45 (Ind. 2016) (per curiam) (no ex post facto violation where Indiana resident committed sex offense pre-SORA, later moved to Iowa, which required him to register based on his Indiana conviction, and upon subsequent return to Indiana was required to register based on the Iowa registration obligation).

The same, of course, is true with respect to the other five plaintiffs. Like Hope, they committed sex offenses (albeit not [6] Hope himself does not concede that Texas required him to register based on his Indiana conviction. For present purposes, I am accepting Indiana's representation that he was required to register on this basis.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

in Indiana) that were not registrable in Indiana when the crimes took place. So under Wallace, Indiana's ex post facto provision would bar the state from imposing a registration requirement based on their criminal histories. Instead, the state looks to the obligations imposed on the plaintiffs by their former states of residence as the trigger for registration in Indiana.

As a consequence of this scheme, the plaintiffs arrived in Indiana with a lesser set of rights than otherwise similarly-situated Indiana offenders. Rather than treat the offender's criminal history as the dispositive factor in deciding whether registration is required—and permitted by Indiana's ex post facto provision—Indiana has looked instead to what civil burdens an offender's former state of residence imposed on him and adopts those burdens as its own.

In effect, the state is treating an offender who moved to Indiana from, say, New York, where he was required to register, as if he remains a citizen of New York for registration purposes, and he cannot claim the benefit of Indiana's ex post facto clause in the same way that a lifelong Indiana resident with the identical criminal history can. Even Hope, who was an Indiana resident when he committed his sex offense, has lost the benefit of Indiana's ex post facto decision because he left Indiana and for a time resided in another state which burdened him with a registration obligation that Wallace foreclosed Indiana from imposing. Because he was formerly a citizen of Texas, Indiana requires Hope to carry the same burden as a Hoosier that he carried as a Texan.

This unique feature of Indiana's registration scheme—requiring registration based not on one's criminal history and on how Indiana law treats that history, but rather on how another state treated that history as a matter of its own law (even if it is an Indiana criminal history)—implicates the core concerns that have animated the Supreme Court's right-to-travel decisions. Indiana is classifying the six plaintiffs based on their prior domiciles and assigning them a lesser set of rights (no ex post facto protection vis-à-vis registration obligations) and a greater set of burdens (the duty to register as a sex offender, in some cases for life) as compared with similar offenders who lived in Indiana before its SORA was adopted and have remained there since. As more recently arrived residents of Indiana, the plaintiffs do not enjoy all of the same rights and privileges as other Indiana residents. See Saenz, 526 U.S. at 505–07, 119 S. Ct. at 1527–28 (invalidating California scheme temporarily capping amount of public aid new residents could receive to amounts they received in their former domiciles); *Attorney General of N.Y. v. AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Shapiro, 394 U.S. at 633, 89 S. Ct. at 1330 (invalidating various provisions requiring one year's residence in state to be eligible for public aid).

To be sure, there are factual differences between the offender-registration scheme at issue here and the public benefit schemes the Court has addressed previously. Indiana is not imposing a durational residency requirement as California did in Saenz: it is not requiring any and all offenders who were required to register in their former states to register in Indiana for a period of one year after their relocation, for example, after which the state will re-evaluate whether they must continue to register in Indiana based on their criminal histories. Indiana's scheme is more like a fixed-point residency scheme, in the sense that had the plaintiffs all established residency in Indiana by 1994 and remained there continuously thereafter, they would have no obligation to register; but having instead relocated to Indiana at later dates, they do have to shoulder the burdens of registration. Cf. Soto-Lopez, 476 U.S. 898, 106 S. Ct. 2317 (veteran must have resided in state at the time he entered military service in order to qualify for veterans' civil service preference); Hooper, 472 U.S. 612, 105 S. Ct. 2862 (veteran must have been a state resident by specified date in order to qualify for tax exemption). Even that analogy is imperfect because, as the majority reminds us, any Indiana resident can become subject to a registration obligation by commuting to another state that requires him to register there. (More on that aspect of Indiana's scheme in a moment.)

But what Indiana's registration scheme has in common with Saenz in particular is that Indiana is looking to an individual's treatment by his former state of residence as the determinant for how he will be treated by Indiana, and limiting his rights as an Indiana citizen based on the rules of his former domicile. Had Hope never left Indiana, he would by virtue of the Wallace decision be free of any obligation to register today. But because he left Indiana and for a time resided in Texas, whose own ex post facto clause did not preclude the imposition of a registration obligation upon him, he now occupies a distinct tier of Indiana citizenship which requires him to register for life. In one respect, his case is like that of a veteran who did not yet live in New Mexico as of the qualifying eligibility date the state established for a special tax break for veterans. Hooper. In another, he is like a public aid recipient relocating to California, who is assigned a lesser set of benefits upon arrival from another state, Saenz, except that here the benefit in question is not public aid but one's ability to invoke Indiana's ex post facto protections, and instead of being temporary, the lesser benefit is permanent. Cf. Soto-Lopez, 476 U.S. at 909, 106 S. Ct. at 2324 (plurality) ("a permanent deprivation of a significant benefit, based only on the fact of nonresidence at a past point in time, clearly operates to penalize appellees for exercising their right to migrate").

Certainly it is true that the Supreme Court has not addressed the right to travel in this particular context. But what it has already said about a state's obligation to treat newcomers on equal terms with longer-term residents applies with equal force here. With respect to the state's ex post facto guarantee, Indiana is treating each of the plaintiffs as a stranger rather than one of its own, relegating them to the more burdensome status they held in their prior domiciles as offenders subject to punitive registration requirements. Cf. Mem. Hosp., 415 U.S. at 261–62, 94 S. Ct. at 1084 ("Not unlike the admonition of the Bible that, 'Ye shall have one manner of law, as well for the stranger, as for your own country,' Leviticus 24:22 (King James version), the right of interstate travel must be seen as insuring new residents the same right to vital government benefits and privileges in the States to which they migrate as are enjoyed by other residents.").

But what of the fact that any citizen of Indiana, however long he has resided in the state, can incur a registration obligation simply by commuting to another state that requires him to register so long as he is present there? See, e.g., 730 Ill. Comp. Stat. 150/3(a-5) ("An out-of-state student or out-of-state employee shall, within 3 days after beginning school or employment in this State, register in person and provide accurate information as required by the Department of State Police."). Certainly this is another point of distinction between this case and the Supreme Court's precedents, and as the majority points out, this application of Indiana's scheme shows that residency per se is not always the triggering factor for the obligation to register (although it is for the plaintiffs). But one's travel certainly is the trigger, and as in the case of relocation to Indiana from another state, one's travel for work or study to another state that requires registration while there again results in the permanent loss of rights vis-à-vis other Indiana citizens. Although the commuter scenario is not presented in this case, it implicates the Supreme Court's right-to-travel jurisprudence just as surely as the plaintiffs' relocation scenario does.

Consider what happens when a lifelong Indiana resident who was convicted of a sex offense pre-SORA commutes to another state—neighboring Illinois, for example—for work or study and must register there as a matter of Illinois law. Now he has been required to register in another jurisdiction, and Indiana can cite that Illinois registration requirement as the basis for requiring him to register in Indiana. As a result of his travel, this individual has now effectively lost the benefit of Indiana's ex post facto clause and the Wallace decision. His criminal history is precisely the same as it was before. He has not violated the terms of supervision or a protective order, or taken some other action that suggests he poses an increased risk of recidivism or danger to others. Nothing about his background has changed except for the fact that he traveled to another jurisdiction that required him to register as a matter of its own law (including its own ex post facto jurisprudence), so long as he was present in that other state. Without ever surrendering his Indiana citizenship, he leaves Indiana with one set of rights and obligations and returns with another, simply because he traveled to another state with a different set of rules.

From the earliest days of this country, the right to travel freely among the states has been recognized as an essential right of national citizenship. See Articles of Confederation, art. IV, § 1 (1778) (recognizing a right of "free ingress and regress to and from any other State" and affording to the free inhabitants of each state "all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several states"); U.S. Const., art. IV, § 2, cl. 1 ("[t]he citizens of each state shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States"); id., amend. XIV, § 1 ("All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law that shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States[.]"); Corfield v. Coryell, 6 Fed. Cas. 546, 552 (Cir. Ct. E.D. Pa. 1823) (Bushrod Washington, Circuit Justice) ("The right of a citizen of one state to pass through, or to reside in any other state, for purposes of trade, agriculture, professional pursuits, or otherwise ... may be mentioned as [one] of the particular privileges and immunities of citizens, which are clearly embraced by the general description of privileges deemed to be fundamental … ."); Passenger Cases, 48 U.S. 283, 492 (1849) (Taney, C.J., dissenting) ("We are all citizens of the United States; and, as members of the same community, must have the right to pass and repass through every part of it without interruption, as freely as in our own States."); Edwards, 314 U.S. at 178, 62 S. Ct. at 169 (Douglas, J., concurring) ("The right to move freely from State to State is an incident of national citizenship protected by the privileges and immunities clause of the Fourteenth Amendment against state interference."); id. at 183, 62 S. Ct. at 171 (Jackson, J., concurring) ("This Court should … hold squarely that it is a privilege of citizenship of the United States, protected from state abridgment, to enter any state of the Union, either for temporary sojourn or for the establishment of permanent residence therein and for gaining resultant citizenship thereof. If national citizenship means less than this, it means nothing."); Shapiro, 394 U.S. at 629, 89 S. Ct. at 1329 ("This Court long ago recognized that the nature of our Federal Union and our constitutional precepts of personal liberty unite to require that all citizens be free to travel throughout the length and breadth of our land uninhibited by statutes, rules, or regulations which unreasonably burden this movement.").

Traveling from one state to another at the cost of surrendering the rights one otherwise enjoys as the bona fide resident of one's home state is not free travel. Indiana cannot, I submit, tell one of its citizens, "You have all the rights of a Hoosier today, but if you travel to another state that accords you lesser rights, you return with only so many rights as that state gave you." To do so may implicate the first as well as the third aspect of the right to travel, see ante at 11 (outlining the three aspects), but it certainly violates the central teaching of the Supreme Court's right-to-travel precedents, which is that a state cannot invidiously classify its residents, and afford them differential rights, based on when and whence they have come to the state.

States can and do reach different conclusions about what crimes should require registration. They also can and do reach different conclusions about whether registration obligations are punitive, such that they implicate their own ex post facto provisions. What they cannot do, having settled these questions in a particular way, is to apply a different set of rules to a citizen who has relocated from a jurisdiction that answered the questions differently. In terms of his rights as a state citizen, an Indiana citizen newly relocated from Texas is not a former Texan, he is a Hoosier, period, and he must be treated as such.

Indiana decided to require registration for the particular offenses that the plaintiffs committed, but only after the plaintiffs committed those crimes. And because Indiana's Supreme Court has decided that the state's registration obligations are punitive, Indiana's ex post facto provision bars the state from requiring registration of all six plaintiffs based on their criminal histories. The state cannot pick and choose which of its residents can claim the benefit of that provision, but that is in effect what Indiana is doing. By placing its reliance on the fact that an offender relocated from another state that imposed a registration obligation as a matter of its own laws (including its ex post facto jurisprudence) as the basis for requiring the offender to register in Indiana, it is precluding the offender from claiming the benefit of the Indiana ex post facto clause that another citizen of Indiana would be entitled to claim. It is saying to plaintiff Hope, "Yes, you had a right to be free from registration when you previously lived in Indiana and committed your offense, but you lost that right when you moved to Texas, which interpreted its own legal provisions so as to require you to register."

None of the six plaintiffs in this case has done a single thing to distinguish himself from a similarly-situated Indiana offender who, by virtue of the timing of his residency in Indiana, cannot be required to register under Wallace—except relocate (i.e., travel) from another state that had different registration rules. The right to travel, as conceived and applied by the Supreme Court, forbids such inconsistent and discriminatory treatment of Indiana's citizens. The express logic, if not the fact-specific holdings, of the Supreme Court's right-to-travel precedents, call upon us to affirm the district court's decision to grant the plaintiffs declaratory and injunctive relief on this point.

For the foregoing reasons, and the additional reasons set forth in the panel's now-vacated majority opinion, 984 F.3d 532, I respectfully dissent as to this aspect of the court's decision.

RIN 1140–AA54

Definition of "Frame or Receiver" and Identification of Firearms

AGENCY: Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms, and Explosives, Department of Justice.

ACTION: Notice of proposed rulemaking; request for comment.

SUMMARY: The Department of Justice ("Department") proposes amending Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms, and Explosives ("ATF") regulations to provide new regulatory definitions of "firearm frame or receiver" and "frame or receiver" because the current regulations fail to capture the full meaning of those terms. The Department also proposes amending ATF's definitions of "firearm" and "gunsmith" to clarify the meaning of those terms, and to provide definitions of terms such as "complete weapon," "complete muffler or silencer device," "privately made firearm," and "readily" for purposes of clarity given advancements in firearms technology. Further, the Department proposes amendments to ATF's regulations on marking and recordkeeping that are necessary to implement these new or amended definitions.

DATES: Written comments must be postmarked and electronic comments must be submitted on or before August 19, 2021. Commenters should be aware that the electronic Federal Docket Management System will not accept comments after Midnight Eastern Time on the last day of the comment period.

SUPPLEMENTARY INFORMATION:

I. Background

The Attorney General is responsible for enforcing the Gun Control Act of 1968 ("GCA"), as amended, and the National Firearms Act of 1934 ("NFA"), as amended.[1] This responsibility includes the authority to promulgate regulations necessary to enforce the provisions of the GCA and NFA. See 18 U.S.C. 926(a); 26 U.S.C. 7801(a)(2)(A), 7805(a). Congress and the Attorney General have delegated the responsibility for administering and enforcing the GCA and NFA to the Director of ATF, subject to the direction of the Attorney General and the Deputy Attorney General. See 28 U.S.C. 599A(b)(1); 28 CFR 0.130(a)(1)–(2). Accordingly, the Department and ATF have promulgated regulations implementing the GCA and NFA. See 27 CFR parts 478, 479.

Prior to passage of the GCA, the Federal Firearms Act of 1938 ("FFA") regulated all firearm parts. The FFA and implementing regulations defined the term "firearm" to mean "any weapon, by whatever name known, which is designed to expel a projectile or projectiles by the action of an explosive and a firearm muffler or firearm silencer, or any part or parts of such weapon." Public Law 75–785, 52 Stat. 1250 (1938); 26 CFR 177.10 (repealed) (emphasis added). The Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act of 1968 repealed the FFA, replacing it with the GCA. Public Law 90–351, section 907, 82 Stat. 197 (1968). During debate on the GCA and related bills introduced to address firearms trafficking, Congress recognized that regulation of all firearm parts was impractical. Senator Dodd explained that "[t]he present definition of this term includes 'any part or parts' of a firearm. It has been impractical to treat each small part of a firearm as if it were a weapon. The revised definition substitutes the words 'frame or receiver' for the words 'any part or parts.'" See 111 Cong. Rec. 5527 (March 22, 1965).[2]

A "firearm" is defined by 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(3) to include not only a weapon that will, is designed to, or may readily be converted to expel a projectile, but also the "frame or receiver" of any such weapon. Because "frames" or "receivers" are included in the definition of "firearm," any person who engages in the business of manufacturing, importing, or dealing in frames or receivers must obtain a license from ATF. 18 U.S.C. 922(a)(1)(A); id. at 923(a). Each licensed manufacturer or importer must "identify by means of a serial number engraved or cast on the receiver or frame of the weapon, in such manner as the Attorney General shall by regulations prescribe, each firearm imported or manufactured by such importer or manufacturer."[3] 18 U.S.C. 923(i); see 27 CFR 478.92, 479.102. Licensed manufacturers and importers must also maintain permanent records of production or importation, as well as their receipt, sale, or other disposition of firearms, including frames or receivers. 18 U.S.C. 923(g)(1)(A); 27 CFR 478.122, 478.123.

A "frame or receiver" is the primary structural component of a firearm to which fire control components are attached.[4] While the GCA does not define the term ''frame or receiver,'' to implement the statute, the terms ''firearm frame or receiver'' and ''frame or receiver'' were defined in regulations several decades ago as that part of a firearm that provides housing for the hammer, bolt or breechblock, and firing mechanism, and which is usually threaded at its forward portion to receive the barrel. 27 CFR 478.11 (implementing GCA, Title I); 27 CFR 479.11 [5] (implementing GCA, Title II). The intent in promulgating these definitions was to provide guidance as to which portion of a firearm was the frame or receiver for purposes of licensing, serialization, and recordkeeping, thereby ensuring that a necessary component of the weapon could be traced if later involved in a crime.

[1] NFA provisions still refer to the "Secretary of the Treasury." 26 U.S.C. ch. 53. However, the Homeland Security Act of 2002, Public Law 107–296, 116 Stat. 2135 (2002), transferred the functions of ATF from the Department of the Treasury to the Department of Justice, under the general authority of the Attorney General. 26 U.S.C. 7801(a)(2); 28 U.S.C. 599A(c)(1). Thus, for ease of reference, this notice of proposed rulemaking refers to the Attorney General throughout.

It was found impractical to have controls over each small part of a firearm. Thus, this definition includes only the major parts of the firearm, that is, the frame or receiver."); S. Rep. No. 90–1097, at 2200 (April 29, 1968) (same).

At the time these definitions were published around 50 years ago, single-framed firearms such as revolvers and break-open shotguns were far more prevalent for civilian use than split/multi-piece receiver weapons, such as semiautomatic rifles and pistols with detachable magazines. Single-framed firearms incorporate the hammer, bolt or breechblock, and firing mechanism within the same housing. Years after these definitions were published, split/multi-piece receiver firearms, such as the AR–15 semiautomatic rifle (upper receiver and lower receiver), Glock semiautomatic pistols (upper slide assembly and lower grip module), and Sig Sauer P320 (M17/18 as adopted by the U.S. military) (upper slide assembly, chassis, and lower grip module), became popular.[6] Additionally, more firearm manufacturers began incorporating a striker-fired mechanism rather than a ''hammer'' in the firing design. With the rise in popularity of striker-fired Glock semiautomatic pistols in the mid-1980s, other manufacturers began incorporating a striker-fired mechanism, rather than a hammer, in semiautomatic handguns.[7]

A. ATF's Application of the Definitions To Split Frames or Receivers

Although ATF's regulatory definitions of ''frame or receiver'' do not expressly capture these types of firearms (i.e., split/multi-piece receivers) that now constitute the majority of firearms in the United States,[8] ATF's position has long been that the weapon ''should be examined with a view toward determining if [either] the upper or lower half of the receiver more nearly fits the legal definition of 'receiver,' '' and more specifically, for machineguns, whether the upper or lower portion has the ability to accept machinegun parts.[9] [10]

Since it began issuing firearm classifications under the GCA and NFA in private letter rulings and for criminal investigations, ATF has considered a variety of factors when examining firearms, including: (a) Which component the manufacturer intended to be the frame or receiver; (b) which component the firearms industry commonly considers to be the frame or receiver with respect to the same or similar firearms; (c) how the component fits within the overall design of the firearm when assembled; (d) the design and function of the fire control components to be housed, such as the hammer, bolt or breechblock, and firing mechanism; (e) whether the component could permanently, conspicuously, and legibly be identified with a serial number and other markings in a manner not susceptible of being readily obliterated, altered, or removed, in accordance with regulations; (f) whether classifying the particular component is consistent with the legislative intent of the GCA and implementing regulations; and (g) whether classifying the component as the frame or receiver is consistent with ATF's prior classifications.

Even though neither the upper nor the lower portion of a split/multi-piece receiver firearm alone falls within the precise wording of the regulatory definition, ATF has for many years interpreted the regulatory definition using these factors as a guide in determining which portion of a weapon model is a firearm frame or receiver. Indeed, the current definitions were never intended to be, or understood to be, exhaustive; at the time the current definitions were adopted there were numerous models of firearms that did not contain a part that fully met the regulatory definition of ''frame or receiver,'' such as the Colt 1911, FN–FAL, and the AR–15/M–16, all of which were originally manufactured almost exclusively for military use, and ATF has long applied these factors in determining which component of those weapons qualifies as the frame or receiver.[11]

Existing law recognizes that the definition of ''frame or receiver'' need not be limited to a strict application of the regulation. The prefatory paragraph to the definitional section of 27 CFR 478.11 (Meaning of Terms) states: ''[w]hen used in this part and in forms

''frame'' means ''the basic structure and principal component of a firearm''); Steindler's New Firearms Dictionary p. 209 (1985) (''receiver'' means ''that part of a rifle or shotgun (excepting hinged frame guns) that houses the bolt, firing pin, mainspring, trigger group, and magazine or ammunition feed system. The barrel is threaded into the somewhat enlarged forward part of the receiver, called the receiver ring. At the rear of the receiver, the butt or stock is fastened. In semiautomatic pistols, the frame or housing is sometimes referred to as the receiver.'').

[5] The definition of ''frame or receiver'' in § 479.11 differs slightly from the definition in § 478.11 in that it omits an Oxford comma between ''bolt or breechblock'' and ''firing mechanism.''

The ability to accept machinegun parts is considered because both the GCA and the NFA regulate machinegun receivers as ''machineguns.'' See 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(23); 26 U.S.C. 5845(b) (''The term ['machinegun''] shall also include the frame or receiver of any such weapon [which shoots is designed to shoot, or can be readily restored to shoot, automatically more than one shot, without manual reloading, by a single function of the trigger].'').

prescribed under this part, where not otherwise distinctly expressed or manifestly incompatible with the intent thereof, terms shall have the meanings ascribed in this section." [12] The intent of Congress, as indicated by the plain language and the statutory scheme of the GCA, is to regulate—as a firearm—the frame or receiver of a firearm. See 111 Cong. Rec. 5527 (March 22, 1965). As stated above, Congress replaced the term "part or parts" in the FFA definition of "firearm" with "frame or receiver," the major parts of a weapon regulated under the GCA. This includes marking these parts with serial numbers for tracing purposes, recording these parts as "firearms" in required records, and running a National Instant Criminal Background Check System ("NICS") background check when individuals purchase or acquire them.

In the past few years, however, some courts have treated the regulatory definition as exhaustive when applied to the lower portion of the AR–15-type rifle, which is the semiautomatic version of the M–16-type machinegun originally designed for the U.S. military. While ATF for decades has classified the lower receiver of the AR–15 rifle as a "frame or receiver," courts recently have read the regulatory definition to mean that the lower portion of the AR–15 is not a "frame or receiver" because it only provides housing for the hammer and firing mechanism, but not the bolt or breechblock. See United States v. Rowold, 429 F. Supp. 3d 469, 475–77 (N.D. Ohio 2019) ("The language of the regulatory definition in § 478.11 lends itself to only one interpretation: namely, that under the GCA, the receiver of a firearm must be a single unit that holds three, not two components: 1) the hammer, 2) the bolt or breechblock, and 3) the firing mechanism."); United States v. Jimenez, 191 F. Supp. 3d 1038, 1041 (N.D. Cal. 2016) ("[A] receiver must have the housing for three elements: hammer, bolt or breechblock, and firing mechanism."); United States v. Joseph Roh, SACR 14–167–JV, Minute Order p. 6 (C.D. Cal. July 27, 2020) (granting defendant's post-trial motion for acquittal for manufacturing AR–15 lower receivers without a license because "[n]o reasonable person would understand that a part constitutes a receiver where it lacks the components specified in regulation").

These courts' interpretation of ATF's regulations, if broadly followed, could mean that as many as 90 percent of all firearms now in the United States would not have any frame or receiver subject to regulation.[13] Those firearms would include numerous widely available models, such as Glock-type and Sig Sauer P320 [14] pistols, that do not utilize a hammer—a named component—in the firing sequence. Such a narrow interpretation of what constitutes a frame or receiver would allow persons to avoid: (a) Obtaining a license to engage in the business of manufacturing or importing upper or lower frames or receivers; (b) identifying upper or lower frames or receivers with a serial number and other traceable markings; (c) maintaining records of upper or lower frames or receivers produced or imported through which they can be traced; and (d) running NICS checks on potential transferees to determine if they are legally prohibited from receiving or possessing firearms when they acquire upper or lower frames or receivers. In turn, this would allow prohibited persons to acquire upper and lower receivers that can quickly be assembled into semiautomatic weapons more easily and without a background check.[15] If no portion of split/multi-piece frames or receivers were subject to any existing regulations, such as marking, recordkeeping, or background checks, law enforcement's ability to trace semiautomatic firearms later used in crime would be severely impeded. This result would thereby undermine the intent of Congress in requiring the frame or receiver of every firearm to be identified, see 18 U.S.C. 923(i), and regulated as a firearm, see 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(3)(B).[16]

B. Privately Made Firearms or "Ghost Guns"

Technological advances have also made it easier for unlicensed persons to make firearms at home from standalone parts or weapon parts kits, or by using 3D printers or personally owned or leased equipment, without any records or a background check. Commonly referred to as "ghost guns," these privately made firearms ("PMFs"), when made for personal use, are not required by the GCA to have a serial number placed on the frame or receiver, making it difficult for law enforcement to determine where, by whom, or when they were manufactured, and to whom they were sold or otherwise disposed.

In recent years, the number of PMFs recovered from crime scenes throughout the country has increased.[17] From January 1, 2016, through December 31, 2020, there were approximately 23,906 suspected PMFs reported to ATF as having been recovered by law enforcement from potential crime scenes, including 325 homicides or attempted homicides, and that were attempted to be traced by ATF, broken down by year as follows: [18]

[12] ATF's predecessor agency, the Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms Division within the Internal Revenue Service, derived this limitation on the application of definitions from the Internal Revenue Code ("IRC"), 26 U.S.C. 7701(a). Courts interpreting definitions in the IRC have not strictly applied those definitions where they would be manifestly incompatible with the intent of the applicable statute. See, e.g., Pierre v. Commissioner, 133 T.C. 24, 35 (2009) (even though a Limited Liability Company was not among any of the named entities defined in section 7701, it would be manifestly incompatible with the Federal estate and gift tax statutes to exclude them); Bunnel v. Commissioner, 50 T.C. 837, 841 (1968) (literal application of the definition of "taxpayer" in section 7701(a)(14) was avoided where it was manifestly incompatible with the intent of other sections of the IRC); Davis v. Commissioner, 30 T.C. 462, 466–67 (1958) (strict geographical application of the term "United States" in 26 U.S.C. 3797(a)(9) (now 7701(a)(9)) to the territory of American Samoa, rather than in a political sense, would be manifestly incompatible with the intent and purpose of the income tax exemption for persons earning income outside the United States).

It is, therefore, not unexpected that numerous Federal criminal cases have been brought by the Department to counter illegal trafficking in unserialized home-completed and assembled weapons, and possession of such weapons by prohibited persons.[19]

The problem of untraceable firearms being acquired and used by violent criminals and terrorists is international in scope. On May 28, 2019, citing intelligence reports by the Department of Homeland Security ("DHS"), the Federal Bureau of Investigation ("FBI"), and the National Counterterrorism Center ("NCTC"), the House Committee on Homeland Security issued a report concluding that "[g]host guns not only pose a challenge on the front end, enabling prohibited buyers to purchase deadly weapons with just a few clicks online, but also on the back end, hamstringing law enforcement's ability to investigate crimes committed with untraceable weapons" and that the "wide availability of ghost guns and the emergence of functional 3D-printed guns are a homeland security threat. Terrorists and other bad actors may seek to exploit the availability of these weapons for dangerous ends." H.R. Rep. No. 116–88, at 2 (May 28, 2019).[20] Criminal investigations and studies highlight this concern.[21]

are likely far lower than the actual number of PMFs recovered from crime scenes because some law enforcement departments incorrectly trace some PMFs as commercially manufactured firearms, or may not see a need to use their resources to attempt to trace firearms with no serial number or other identifiable markings. The term "suspected PMF" is used because of the difficulty of getting law enforcement officials to uniformly enter PMF trace information into ATF's electronic tracing system ("eTrace"), resulting in reporting inconsistencies of PMFs involved in crime. For example, often PMFs resemble commercially manufactured firearms, or incorporate parts from commercially manufactured firearms bearing that manufacturer's name, so some firearms suspected of being PMFs were entered into eTrace using a commercial manufacturer's name rather than as one privately made by an individual. The term "potential crime scenes" is used because ATF does not know if the firearm being traced by the law enforcement agency was found at a crime scene as opposed to one recovered by them that was stolen or otherwise not from at the scene of a crime. This is because the recovery location or correlated crime is not always communicated by the agency to ATF in the tracing process.

any investigation involving the criminal use of firearms.''); Blaustein & Reich, Inc. v. Buckles, 220 F. Supp. 2d 535, 537 (E.D. Va. 2002) (ATF has a statutory duty pursuant to the GCA to trace firearms to keep them out of the hands of criminals).[22] An accurate firearm description is necessary to trace a firearm and is required to be recorded by a person licensed to engage in the business of manufacturing, importing, or dealing in firearms, or by a licensed collector of curio or relic firearms, regardless of whether it is a business or personal firearm.[23]

ATF traces firearms found by law enforcement at a crime scene by first contacting the licensed manufacturer or importer marked on the frame or receiver who maintains permanent records of their manufacture or importation and disposition. Using the information obtained from those required records, ATF then contacts each licensed dealer or other licensee who recorded their receipt and disposition to locate the first unlicensed purchaser to help find the perpetrator or otherwise solve the crime.[24] However, because PMFs do not bear a serial number or other markings of a licensed manufacturer or importer, ATF has found it extremely difficult to complete such traces on behalf of law enforcement to individual unlicensed purchasers. From January 1, 2016, through March 4, 2021, ATF could only complete traces of suspected PMFs recovered by law enforcement to an individual purchaser in approximately 151 out of 23,946 attempts, generally by tracing a serial number engraved on a handgun slide, barrel, or other firearm part not currently defined as a frame or receiver, but recorded by licensees in the absence of other markings.[25]

With the proliferation of PMFs, ATF has also received numerous requests from licensees seeking clarity on how they may be accepted and recorded so that they can track their inventories, process warranty claims, reconcile any missing inventory, respond to trace requests, and report lost or stolen PMFs to police and insurance companies. Federal law and regulations require licensees, before conducting business, to inventory the firearms possessed for such business and record it in a Firearms Acquisition and Disposition Record (''A&D Record'').[26] After commencing business, licensees must record all firearms received and disposed of by the business in the A&D Record to include the following information separated into columns: Manufacturer and/or importer, model, serial no., type, and caliber or gauge.[27] When a firearm is disposed to an unlicensed person, licensees are required to complete a Firearms Transaction Record, ATF Form 4473 (''Form 4473'').[28] Like the A&D Record, this form requires licensees to record the manufacturer and importer, model (if designated), serial number, type, and caliber or gauge of the firearm. Licensees are also required by law to report the theft or loss of firearms on a Federal Firearms Licensee Theft/Loss Report, ATF Form 3310.11, which includes a description of the manufacturer, importer, model, serial number, type, and caliber/gauge of each firearm stolen or lost.[29] And when licensees sell or otherwise dispose of multiple pistols or revolvers within five consecutive business days to the same person, they must report to ATF the type, serial number, manufacturer, model, importer, and caliber on a Report of Multiple Sale or Other Disposition of Pistols and Revolvers, ATF Form 3310.4.[30]

However, because PMFs do not have markings identifying the name of a licensed manufacturer or importer, model, serial number, or caliber/gauge, licensees might only record a ''type'' of firearm (e.g., pistol, revolver, rifle, or shotgun) in their A&D Records and on ATF Forms 4473. Over time, as more PMFs are accepted into inventory, it will become increasingly difficult, if not impossible, for licensees and ATF (during inspections) to distinguish between those PMFs physically in the firearms inventory and those recorded in required A&D Records, as well as determine which PMFs recorded as disposed on ATF Form 4473, were those recorded as disposed in the A&D Record.[31] Likewise, it will be difficult for licensees and ATF to accurately determine which PMFs were stolen or lost from inventory, and for police to locate stolen PMFs in the business inventories of pawnbrokers,[32] or to return any recovered stolen or lost PMFs to their rightful owners.

Not only does the inability to distinguish between unmarked firearms

[22] See also ATF Ruling 2009–5, p.2 (''The unique marks of identification of firearms serve several purposes. First, the marks are used by Federal firearms licensees to effectively track their firearms inventories and maintain all required records. Second, the marks enable law enforcement officers to trace specific firearms used in crimes from the manufacturer or importer to individual purchasers, and to identify particular firearms that have been lost or stolen. Further, marks help prove in certain criminal prosecutions that firearms used in a crime have travelled in interstate or foreign commerce.'').

Otherwise, we will not have tracing capability. This provision simply requires that a bound volume be maintained by the dealer of the sales of firearms which would include a complete description of the firearm, including its manufacturer, model number, and its serial number and the verified name, address, and date of birth of the purchaser. There is only a minimal inconvenience for the dealer, yet obtaining and recording this information is critical to avoid serious damage to the Firearm Tracing Program.'').

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

make it extremely difficult for law enforcement to trace PMFs involved in crime, it also makes it more difficult for Federal, State, and local law enforcement to identify and prosecute illegal firearms traffickers who are often tied to violent criminals and armed narcotics traffickers.[33] The ATF Form 4473 is the primary evidence used to prosecute straw purchasers who buy firearms from a Federal firearms licensee on behalf of prohibited persons, such as felons, and other persons who could use them to commit a violent crime. The form is typically the key evidence that the straw purchaser who bought the firearm (and who can pass a background check) made a false statement to the Federal firearms licensee concerning the identity of the actual purchaser when acquiring that firearm, in violation of 18 U.S.C. 922(a)(6) and 924(a)(1)(A), or State law.[34] But as unmarked and difficult-to-trace PMFs proliferate throughout the marketplace, it is likely to become increasingly difficult to prove that firearms acquired under false pretenses on a Form 4473 were the ones found in the hands of the true purchaser—and thus more difficult to prosecute straw purchasers for making false statements.[35] This assumes, of course, that the PMF involved in the crime could even be traced to the Federal firearms licensee, or that the correct Form 4473 could be located. Likewise, the absence of identifying firearm information on multiple sales forms and theft/loss reports makes it more difficult for ATF to identify firearms traffickers and thieves.[36]

Although clarifying the definition of ''frame or receiver'' in this rule would help the firearms industry and the public understand which part of a complete weapon is the regulated ''frame or receiver,'' and more commercially manufactured frames or receivers are likely to be marked by licensed manufacturers as a result, PMFs are increasingly being made or 3D printed at home without any identifying marks, recordkeeping, or background checks. In turn, these firearms are progressively finding their way to licensees who may wish to acquire them so they can advertise and market them broadly, or who may repair, customize, or accept them as security in pawn for a loan. Rulemaking is therefore necessary to ensure that PMFs are not unlawfully manufactured for sale to licensees who may wish to acquire them for resale, or accept them as security in pawn for a loan, as this would undermine the important public safety goals of the GCA to reduce violent crime, which includes assisting State and local law enforcement in their efforts to control the traffic of firearms within their borders.[37] Indeed, several States and municipalities have banned or severely restricted unserialized or 3D printed firearms.[38]

II. Proposed Rule

Due to judicial developments as well as continued technological advancements in firearms manufacturing, maintaining the current definitions negatively affects both public safety and the regulated firearms industry. For these reasons, the Department proposes amending ATF's regulations to clarify the definition of ''firearm'' and to provide a more comprehensive definition of ''frame or receiver'' so that those definitions more accurately reflect firearm configurations not explicitly captured under the existing definitions in 27 CFR 478.11 and 479.11. Further, this NPRM proposes new terms and definitions to take into account technological developments and modern terminology in the firearms industry, as well as amendments to the marking and recordkeeping requirements that would be necessary to implement these definitions. However, nothing in this rule would restrict persons not otherwise prohibited from possessing firearms from making their own firearms at home without markings solely for personal use (not for sale or distribution) in accordance with Federal, State, and local law. Also, while licensed manufacturers who sell or distribute firearms to law enforcement agencies would be subject to this rule, law enforcement agencies (not engaged in the business of manufacturing firearms for sale or distribution) would be excluded from this rule, including associated amendments to the marking and recordkeeping requirements necessary to implement its definitions.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

A. Definition of "Firearm"

Under the GCA and implementing regulations, the term "firearm" includes:

"(A) any weapon (including a starter gun) which will or is designed to or may readily be converted to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive." 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(3); 27 CFR 478.11 (emphasis added). Although weapon parts kits in their unassembled, incomplete, and/or unfinished state or configuration generally will not expel a projectile by the action of an explosive at the time of sale or distribution, weapon parts kits that are "designed to" [39] or "may readily be converted" [40] to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive are "firearms" under the GCA.[41]

In recent years, individuals have been purchasing firearm parts kits with incomplete frames or receivers, commonly called "80% receivers," [42] either directly from manufacturers of the kits or retailers, without background checks or recordkeeping. Some of these parts kits contain most or all of the components (finished or unfinished) necessary to complete a functional weapon within a short period of time. Some of them include jigs, templates, instructions, drill bits, and tools that allow the purchaser to complete the weapon to a functional state with minimal effort, expertise, or equipment. Weapon parts kits such as these are "firearms" under the GCA because they are designed to or may readily be converted to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive.[43] Manufacturers of such parts kits must be licensed, abide by the marking and recordkeeping requirements, and pay Federal Firearms Excise Tax on their sales price.[44] Any Federal firearms licensee that sells such kits to unlicensed individuals would need to complete ATF Forms 4473, conduct NICS background checks, and abide by the recordkeeping requirements applicable to fully completed and assembled firearms.[45] Therefore, to reflect existing case law, this proposed rule would add a sentence at the end of the definition of "firearm" in 27 CFR 478.11 providing that "[t]he term shall include a weapon parts kit that is designed to or may readily be assembled, completed, converted, or restored to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive."

Nonetheless, this amendment is not intended to affect the classification of a weapon, including a weapon parts kit, in which each frame or receiver (as defined in this proposed rule) of such weapon is properly destroyed in accordance with ATF standards. Because such weapons have been completely destroyed or permanently redesigned not to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive, and cannot readily be converted to do so, ATF would not consider them as either "designed to" or "readily assembled, completed, converted, or restored to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive." To make this clear, this proposed rule would add another sentence to the end of the definition of "firearm" in 27 CFR 478.11 to provide that "[t]he term shall not include a weapon, including a weapon parts kit, in which each part defined as a frame or receiver of such weapon is destroyed." (see Section II.B.5 of the preamble)

B. Definition of "Frame or Receiver"

The proposed new regulatory definition of "frame or receiver" would be a multi-part definition added to 27

[39] See H.R. Rep. 90–1577, at 4416 (June 21, 1968) ("This provision makes it clear that so-called unserviceable firearms come within the definition."); S. Rep. No. 90–1097, at 2200 (April 29, 1968) (same). Numerous courts have held that weapons designed to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive are "firearms" under 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(3)(A) even if they cannot expel a projectile in their present form or configuration. See, e.g., United States v. Hardin, 889 F.3d 945, 946 (8th Cir. 2017) (pistol with broken trigger and numerous missing internal parts was a weapon designed to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive); United States v. Dotson, 712 F.3d 369 (7th Cir. 2013) (damaged pistol with corroded, missing and broken components); United States v. Rivera, 415 F.3d 284, 285–87 (2nd Cir. 2005) (pistol with a broken firing pin and flattened firing-pin channel); United States. v. Brown, 117 F.3d 353 (7th Cir. 1997) (no firing pin); United States v. Reed, 114 F.3d 1053 (10th Cir. 1997) (shotgun with broken breech bolt); United States v. Hunter, 101 F.3d 82 (9th Cir. 1996) (pistol with broken firing pin); United States v. Yannott, 42 F.3d 999, 1005 (6th Cir. 1994) (shotgun with broken firing pin); United States v. Ruiz, 986 F.2d 905, 910 (5th Cir. 1993) (revolver with hammer filed down); United States. v. York, 830 F.2d 885, 891 (8th Cir. 1987) (revolver with no firing pin and cylinder did not line up with barrel). But see United States v. Wada, 323 F. Supp. 2d 1079 (D. Or. 2004) (firearms redesigned as ornaments that "would take a great deal of time, expertise, equipment, and materials to attempt to reactivate" were no longer designed to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive and could not readily be converted to do so).

[40] See, e.g., United States v. Wick, 697 F. App'x 507, 508 (9th Cir. 2017) (complete UZI parts kits "could 'readily be converted to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive,' meeting the statute's definition of firearm under section 921(a)(3)(A)" because the "kits contained all of the necessary components to assemble a fully functioning firearm with relative ease"); United States v. Stewart, 451 F.3d 1071, 1073 n.2 (9th Cir. 2006) (upholding district court's finding that .50 caliber rifle kits with incomplete receivers were "firearms" under 921(a)(3)(A) because they could easily be converted to expel a projectile); United States v. Morales, 280 F. Supp. 2d 262, 272–73 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) (partially disassembled Tec-9 pistol that could be assembled within short period of time could readily be converted to expel a projectile).

[41] The plain language of the definition of "firearm" in 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(3)(A) states that a weapon need not function so long as it is designed to, or may readily be converted to, expel a projectile. Even though they generally cannot function to expel a projectile when sold, weapon parts kits are still "weapons"—real combat instruments, such as pistols, revolvers, rifles, or shotguns—in an unassembled, unfinished, and/or incomplete state or configuration. There is no minimum utility or lethality requirement in the GCA or NFA for an item to be considered a "weapon." Cf. United States v. Thompson/Center Arms, 504 U.S. 505, 513, n.6 (1992) (a rifle was "made" under the NFA when a pistol was packaged together with a disassembled rifle parts kit); United States v. Hunter, 843 F. Supp. 235, 256 (E.D. Mich. 1994) ("If Defendants believe that machinegun conversion kits are not in and of themselves 'weapons' under § 921(a)(3), they forget that that section clearly envisions machineguns as weapons."); United States v. Drasen, 845 F.2d 731, 736–37 (7th Cir. 1988) (rejecting argument that a collection of rifle parts cannot be a "weapon").

[42] The term "80% receiver" is a term used by some industry members, the public, and the media to describe a frame or receiver that has not yet reached a stage in manufacture to be classified as a "frame or receiver" under Federal law. However, that term is neither found in Federal law nor accepted by ATF.

[44] The Internal Revenue Code of 1954, 26 U.S.C. 4181, imposes on the manufacturer, producer, or importer an excise tax of 10% (pistols and revolver) or 11% (other firearms) on the sales price of firearms manufactured, produced, or imported, including complete, but unfinished, weapon parts kits. See Rev. Rul. 62–169 (IRS RRU), 1962–2 C.B. 245 (kits which contain all of the necessary component parts for the assembly of shotguns are complete firearms in knockdown condition even though, in assembling the shotguns the purchaser must 'final-shape,' sand, and finish the fore-arm and the stock); cf. Rev. Rul. 61–189 (IRS RRU), 1961–2 C.B. 185 (kits containing unassembled components and tools to complete artificial flies for fisherman were sporting goods subject to excise tax); Hine v. United States, 113 F. Supp. 340, 343 (Ct. Cl. 1953) ("True enough, [these fishing rod kits] might be called 'blanks' by those engaged in the trade, but what could they be called or to what practical use could they be put other than 'fishing rods?' Plaintiff says that it would be extremely difficult if not impossible to case with a 'blank' rod and this is true, but we can conceive of no other practical use for them except as fishing rods. . . . Having reached the stage of manufacture or development where they became recognizable as one of the sporting goods described in Section 3406(a)(1) the rods upon being sold were subject to tax even though there remained one or more finishing operations to be performed.") (citations omitted).

[45] Additionally, persons who engage in the business of selling or distributing such weapon parts kits cannot avoid licensing, marking, recordkeeping, or excise taxation by selling or shipping the parts in more than one box or shipment to the same person, or by conspiring with another person to do so. See, e.g., United States v. Evans, 928 F.2d 858 (9th Cir. 1991) (conspiracy to cause and aid and abet the possession of unregistered machineguns where one defendant sold parts kits containing all component parts of Sten machineguns except receiver tubes, and the other sold customers blank receiver tubes along with detailed instructions on how to complete them); Internal Revenue Service Technical Advice Memorandum 8709002, 1986 WL 372494, at 4 (Nov. 13, 1986) (for purposes of imposing Firearms Excise Tax it is irrelevant whether the components of a revolver in an unassembled knockdown condition are sold separately to the same purchaser in various related transactions, rather than sold as a complete kit in a single transaction).

CFR 478.11 and 479.11 (referencing section 478.11). First, there would be a general definition of ''frame or receiver'' with non-exclusive examples that illustrate the definition. This would be followed by supplements that further explain the meaning of the term ''frame or receiver'' for certain firearm designs and configurations, as follows: (a) Firearm muffler or silencer frame or receiver; (b) split or modular frame or receiver, also followed by examples of the frames or receivers for common firearm designs that are distinguishable because of differences in firing cycle, method of operation, or physical design characteristics; (c) partially complete, disassembled, or inoperable frame or receiver; and (d) destroyed frame or receiver. Although the new definition would more broadly define the term ''frame or receiver'' than the current definition, it is not intended to alter any prior determinations by ATF of what it considers the frame or receiver of a particular split/modular weapon. ATF would also continue to consider the same factors when classifying firearms (see Section I.A of the preamble).

ATF proposes to replace the respective regulatory definitions of ''firearm frame or receiver'' and ''frame or receiver'' in 27 CFR 478.11 and 479.11 because they too narrowly limit the definition of receiver with respect to most current firearms and have led to erroneous district court decisions. Indeed, most firearms currently in circulation in the United States do not have a specific part that expressly falls within the current ''frame or receiver'' regulatory definitions. Most concerning is that the interpretation of these definitions by some courts, relying on the current regulations, would make it easier to obtain the majority of existing firearms, including some of the most advanced semiautomatic weapons, without complying with the requirements of the GCA, and make it far more difficult to trace those firearms after a crime. Should the current definition remain in place and courts continue to interpret it such that no part or parts of most firearms are defined as the frame or receiver, these unserialized parts, easily purchased and assembled to create functioning firearms, would be untraceable, thereby putting the public at risk. While a ''frame or receiver'' is clearly within the statutory definition of what constitutes a ''firearm'' under the GCA, 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(3)(B), clarifying that this term includes how most modern-day firearms operate would help ensure that the regulatory definition of ''frame or receiver'' will not be misinterpreted by the courts, the firearms industry, or the public at large to mean that most firearms in circulation have no part identifiable as a frame or receiver.

As a threshold matter, the new definition makes clear that a ''frame or receiver'' must be visible to the exterior when the complete weapon is assembled so that licensees can quickly record the identifying markings, and law enforcement officers who recover the weapon can easily see the identifying markings for tracing purposes. Nonetheless, as explained in Section II.B.3 of the preamble, an internal frame or chassis at least partially exposed to the exterior to allow identification may be determined by ATF to be the frame or receiver of a split or modular frame or receiver.

Next, the new definition more broadly describes a ''frame or receiver'' as one that provides housing or a structure designed to hold or integrate any fire control component. Unlike the prior definitions of ''frame or receiver'' that were rigidly tied to three specific fire control components (i.e., those necessary for the firearm to initiate or complete the firing sequence), the new regulatory definition is intended to be general enough to encompass changes in technology and parts terminology. With respect to the fire control components housed by the frame or receiver, the definition would include, at a minimum, any housing or holding structure for a hammer, bolt, bolt carrier, breechblock, cylinder, trigger mechanism, firing pin, striker, or slide rails. However, the definition is not limited to those particular fire control components.[46] There may be future changes in firearms technology or terminology resulting in housings or holding structures for new or different components that initiate, complete, or continue the firing sequence of weapons that expel a projectile by the action of an explosive. For further clarity, the definition would then give four nonexclusive examples with illustrations of common single-framed firearms: (1) Hinged or single frame revolver (structure to hold the trigger, hammer, and cylinder); (2) bolt-action rifle (structure to hold the bolt and firing pin, and attach the trigger mechanism); (3) break action, lever action, or pump action rifle or shotgun (housing for the bolt and firing pin, or a structure designed to integrate the breechblock); and (4) semiautomatic firearm or machinegun with a single receiver housing all fire control components (housing for the hammer, bolt, trigger mechanism, and firing pin, e.g., AK-type firearms).

Finally, the definition would make clear to persons who may acquire or possess a part now defined as a ''frame or receiver'' that is identified with a serial number that they must presume, absent an official determination by ATF or other reliable evidence to the contrary, that the part is a firearm ''frame or receiver'' without further guidance.

2. Firearm Muffler or Silencer Frame or Receiver

Under the GCA, licensed manufacturers and importers must identify the frame or receiver of each firearm, including a firearm muffler or silencer, with a serial number in accordance with regulations. 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(3)(C), 923(i). The NFA requires firearm manufacturers, importers, and makers to identify each firearm, including a firearm muffler or silencer, with a serial number and such other identification as may be prescribed by regulations. 26 U.S.C. 5842(a); id. at 5845(a)(7). Because under the NFA each individual part of a firearm muffler or silencer is a ''firearm'' [47] that must be registered in the National Firearms Registration and Transfer Record (''NFRTR''), the regulations currently assume that every part defined as a silencer must be marked in order to be registered, and expressly require that they be marked whenever sold, shipped, or otherwise disposed even though they may be installed by a qualified licensee within a complete muffler or silencer device.[48]

However, this result has caused confusion and concern among many silencer manufacturers because some silencer parts defined as ''silencers,'' such as baffles, are difficult to mark, and make little sense to mark for tracing purposes when the outer tube or

[47] A firearm ''muffler or silencer'' is defined to include ''any combination of parts'' designed and intended for the use in assembling or fabricating a firearm silencer or muffler and ''any part intended only for use in such assembly or fabrication.'' 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(24); 26 U.S.C. 5845(a)(7); 27 CFR 478.11; id. at 479.11. This rule defines the term ''complete muffler or silencer device'' not to say that individual silencer parts are not considered a firearm ''muffler or silencer'' subject to the requirements of the NFA, but to advise industry members when those individual silencer parts must be marked and registered in the NFRTR when they are used in assembling or fabricating a muffler or silencer device.

housing of the complete device is marked and registered. Not only is it difficult for manufacturers to apply identifying markings, there is also the administrative difficulty in timely filing and processing numerous ATF Forms 2, Notice of Firearms Manufactured or Imported upon manufacture of each part, and ATF Forms 3, Application for Tax-Exempt Transfer of Firearm and Registration to Special Occupational Taxpayer upon sale or other disposition of each part to another qualified licensee.

For these reasons, ATF is proposing a number of amendments to clarify how and when firearm muffler or silencer parts must be marked and registered in the NFRTR. Among other changes (see Section II.H.9 of the preamble, below), this rule defines the term ''frame or receiver'' as it applies to a ''firearm muffler or silencer frame or receiver'' and adds the term ''complete muffler or silencer device'' (see Section II.D of the preamble). Under the NPRM, the term ''frame or receiver'' means, ''in the case of a firearm muffler or firearm silencer, a part of the firearm that, when the complete device is assembled, is visible from the exterior and provides housing or a structure, such as an outer tube or modular piece, designed to hold or integrate one or more essential internal components of the device, including any of the following: baffles, baffling material, or expansion chamber.'' These new definitions would clarify for manufacturers and makers of complete muffler or silencer devices that they need only mark each part (or specific part(s) previously determined by the Director) of the device defined as a ''frame or receiver'' under this rule. However, individual muffler or silencer parts must be marked if they are disposed of separately from a complete device unless transferred by qualified manufacturers to other qualified licensees for the manufacture or repair of complete devices (see Section II.H.9 of the preamble).[49]

ATF anticipates that, under this supplemental definition, the outer tube of a complete muffler or silencer device would be considered the frame or receiver with respect to most commercial silencer designs currently on the market. This is because the outer tube would be the only housing for essential internal components (e.g., baffles or baffling material) of the complete device. Marking the outer tube, as distinguished from a smaller non-housing component like an end cap that can be damaged upon expulsion of projectiles, best preserves the ability of law enforcement to trace the silencer device if used in crime, and is consistent with recommendations ATF has received from the firearms industry.[50]

Nonetheless, like the definition of ''frame or receiver'' for projectile weapons, this sub-definition would be flexible enough to encompass changes in technology and parts terminology. This is because any housing or structure designed to hold or integrate an essential internal component of the muffler or silencer device would meet the definition. While the proposed definition gives examples of internal components that manufacturers must consider as essential, e.g., baffles, baffling material, or expansion chamber, it is not limited to those particular components.[51]

3. Split or Modular Frame or Receiver

This second supplement explains that ATF may determine ''in the case of a firearm with more than one part that provides housing or a structure designed to hold or integrate one or more fire control or essential components'' whether one or more specific part(s) of a weapon is the frame or receiver, which may include an internal frame or chassis at least partially exposed to the exterior to allow identification. It then sets forth the factors ATF considers in making this determination: ''(a) Which component the manufacturer intended to be the frame or receiver; (b) which component the firearms industry commonly considers to be the frame or receiver with respect to the same or similar firearms; (c) how the component fits within the overall design of the firearm when assembled; (d) the design and function of the fire control components to be housed or integrated; (e) whether the component may permanently, conspicuously, and legibly be identified with a serial number and other markings in a manner not susceptible of being readily obliterated, altered, or removed; (f) whether classifying the particular component is consistent with the legislative intent of the Act and this part; and (g) whether classifying the component as the frame or receiver is consistent with the Director's prior classifications.'' No single factor is controlling. It would further make clear that ''[f]rames or receivers of different weapons that are combined to create a similar weapon each retain their respective classifications as frames or receivers provided they retain their original design and configuration.''

This supplement to the general definition addresses one of the core problems of the current definition of ''firearm frame or receiver;'' namely, that a majority of firearms now use a split or modular design in which more than one part houses a different fire control component and/or incorporates a striker instead of a hammer. It would make clear that even though a firearm, including a silencer, may have more than one part that falls within the definition of ''frame or receiver,'' ATF may classify a specific part or parts to be the ''frame or receiver'' of a particular weapon. For this reason, manufacturers may wish to submit samples to ATF for classification of one or more particular components as the frame or receiver so that they need only mark a specific part or parts of a weapon, rather than all qualifying parts (see Section II.H.10 of the preamble) or obtain a marking variance (see Section II.H.6 of the preamble). However, this supplemental definition would also make clear that ATF would not classify an internal frame or chassis as a ''frame or receiver'' unless it is at least partially exposed to the exterior to allow identification so that licensees accepting them into inventory can quickly record the identifying markings, and law enforcement officers who recover the weapon can easily see the identifying markings for tracing purposes.[52]

One important goal of this rule is to ensure that it does not affect existing ATF classifications of firearms that specify a single component as the frame or receiver. Application of the rule, as proposed, would not alter these prior

[50] In 2016, ATF issued an Advance Notice of Proposed Rulemaking in response to a petition for rulemaking from a firearms industry trade association recommending that regulations be amended to require that a silencer be marked on the outer tube (as opposed to other locations), unless a variance is granted by the Director on a case-by-case basis for good cause. See 81 FR 26764 (May 4, 2016).

[52] Markings must also be clearly visible from the exterior because they may be needed to prove that a criminal defendant had knowledge that the serial number was obliterated or altered. See, e.g., Lewis v. United States, No. 3:12–0522, 2012 WL 5198090, at *4 (M.D. Tenn. Oct. 19, 2012) (serial number obliterated on the ''visible exterior'' of a revolver); State v. Shirley, No. 107449, 2019 WL 2156402 (Ct. App. Ohio May 16, 2019) (same); cf. United States v. Sands, 948 F.3d 709, 719 (6th Cir. 2020) (serial number is not altered or obliterated so long as it is ''visible to the naked eye''); United States v. St. Hilaire, 960 F.3d 61, 66 (2d Cir. 2020) (''This 'naked eye test' best comports with the ordinary meaning of 'altered'; it is readily applied in the field and in the courtroom; it facilitates identification of a particular weapon; it makes more efficient the larger project of removing stolen guns from circulation; it operates against mutilation that impedes identification as well as mutilation that frustrates it; and it discourages the use of untraceable weapons without penalizing accidental damage or half-hearted efforts.'').

ATF classifications. To provide more clarity, this supplement to the definition would include a nonexclusive list of common weapons with a split/multi-piece frame or receiver configuration for which ATF has previously determined a specific part to be the frame or receiver. If a manufacturer produces or an importer imports a firearm falling within one of these designs as they exist as of the date of publication of a final rule, it can refer to this list to know which part is the frame or receiver. The manufacturer or importer can then mark without needing to ask ATF for a classification. The nonexclusive list identifies the frame or receiver for the following firearms: (i) Colt 1911-type, Beretta/Browning/FN Herstal/Heckler & Koch/Ruger/Sig Sauer/Smith & Wesson/Taurus hammer fired semiautomatic pistols; (ii) Glock-type striker fired semiautomatic pistols; (iii) Sig Sauer P320-type semiautomatic pistols; (iv) certain locking block rail system semiautomatic pistols; (v) AR–15-type and Beretta AR–70-type firearms; (vi) Steyr AUG-type firearms; (vii) Thompson M1A1-type machineguns and semiautomatic variants, and L1A1, FN FAL, FN FNC, MP 38, MP 40, and SIG 550 type firearms, and HK-type machineguns and semiautomatic variants; (viii) Vickers/Maxim, Browning 1919, and M2-type machineguns, and box-type machineguns and semiautomatic variants thereof; and (ix) Sten, Sterling, and Kel-tec Sub-2000-type firearms. However, if there is a present or future split or modular design for a firearm that is not comparable to an existing classification, then the definition of ''frame or receiver'' would advise that more than one part is the frame or receiver subject to marking and other requirements, unless a specific classification or marking variance is obtained from ATF, as described above.

4. Partially Complete, Disassembled, or Inoperable Frame or Receiver

This third supplement would define ''frame or receiver'' to include ''in the case of a frame or receiver that is partially complete, disassembled, or inoperable, a frame or receiver that has reached a stage in manufacture where it may readily be completed, assembled, converted, or restored to a functional state.'' To determine this status, ''the Director may consider any available instructions, guides, templates, jigs, equipment, tools, or marketing materials.'' For clarification, ''partially complete'' for purposes of this definition ''means a forging, casting, printing, extrusion, machined body, or similar article that has reached a stage in manufacture where it is clearly identifiable as an unfinished component part of a weapon.''

This supplement addresses another core challenge of the existing, definition of firearm ''frame or receiver;'' namely, that it does not address the question when an object becomes a frame or receiver. While the GCA and implementing regulations define a ''firearm'' to include the ''frame or receiver,'' neither delineates when a frame or receiver is created. The crucial inquiry, then, is the point at which an unregulated piece of metal, plastic, or other material becomes a regulated item under Federal law. ATF has long held that a piece of metal, plastic, or other material becomes a frame or receiver when it has reached a critical stage of manufacture. This is the point at which a substantial step has been taken, or a critical line crossed, so that the item in question may be so classified under the law. This ''critical stage of manufacture'' is when the article becomes sufficiently complete to function as a frame or receiver, or may readily be completed, assembled, converted, or restored to accept the parts it is intended to house or hold.[53]

Clarifying this issue is needed to deter the increased sale or distribution of unlicensed and unregulated partially complete or unassembled frames or receivers often sold within parts kits that can readily be completed or assembled to a functional state.[54] Many kits that include unfinished frame or receivers have been sold by nonlicensees who were not required to run a background check or maintain transaction records. Accordingly, prohibited persons have easily obtained them.[55] Moreover, without any markings, they are nearly impossible to trace. Although this addition is intended to capture when an item becomes a frame or receiver that is regulated irrespective of the type of technology used to complete the assembly, frame or receiver molds that can accept metal or polymer, unformed blocks of metal, and other articles only in a primordial state would not—without more—be considered a ''partially complete'' frame or receiver. However, when a frame or receiver is broken or has been disassembled into pieces that can readily be made into a frame or receiver, or is a partially complete frame or receiver forging, casting, or additive printing[56] that has reached a stage in manufacture where it can readily be made into a functional frame or receiver, that article would be a ''frame or receiver'' under the GCA.

5. Destroyed Frame or Receiver

This fourth supplement would exclude from the definition of ''frame or receiver'' any frame or receiver that is destroyed. The supplement describes what it means to be a ''destroyed'' frame or receiver: One permanently altered not to provide housing or a structure that may hold or integrate any fire control or essential internal component, and that may not readily be assembled, completed, converted, or restored to a functional state. This new definition then would set forth nonexclusive acceptable methods of destruction, which have been provided by ATF in past guidance.[57]

[56] ATF does not believe the production of 3D printed frames or receivers is substantial at this time when compared with commercially produced firearms. For the most part, individuals currently make PMFs from parts kits produced commercially, not by using 3D printers. However, the cost, capabilities, and availability of 3D printers are quickly improving.

C. Definition of "Readily"

To provide guidance on how the term "readily" is used to classify firearms, including frame or receiver parts kits or weapon parts kits sold with incomplete or unassembled frames or receivers, the NPRM adds this term to 27 CFR 478.11 and 479.11 and defined as "a process that is fairly or reasonably efficient, quick, and easy, but not necessarily the most efficient, speedy, or easy process." It would further list factors relevant in making this determining to include: (a) Time, i.e., how long it takes to finish the process; (b) ease, i.e., how difficult it is to do so; (c) expertise, i.e., what knowledge and skills are required; (d) equipment, i.e., what tools are required; (e) availability, i.e., whether additional parts are required, and how easily they can be obtained; (f) expense, i.e., how much it costs; (g) scope, i.e., the extent to which the subject of the process must be changed to finish it; and (h) feasibility, i.e., whether the process would damage or destroy the subject of the process, or cause it to malfunction. This definition and factors considered in determining whether a weapon, including a weapon parts kit, or unfinished or damaged frame or receiver may readily be assembled, completed, converted, or restored to function are based on case law interpreting the terms "may readily be converted to expel a projectile" in 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(3)(A) and "can be readily restored to shoot" in 26 U.S.C. 5845(b).[58] Thus, defining the term "readily" is necessary to provide further clarity in determining when incomplete weapons or configurations of parts become a "firearm" regulated under the GCA and NFA.

D. Definitions of "Complete Weapon" and "Complete Muffler or Silencer Device"

This proposed rule would add definitions for "complete weapon" and "complete muffler or silencer device" to 27 CFR 478.11 and 479.11. A "complete weapon" would be defined as "a firearm other than a firearm muffler or firearm silencer that contains all component parts necessary to function as designed whether or not assembled or operable." Likewise, a "complete muffler or silencer device" would be defined as "a firearm muffler or firearm silencer that contains all of the component parts necessary to function as designed whether or not assembled or operable." These definitions are needed to explain when a frame or receiver of a firearm, including a firearm muffler or silencer, as the case may be, must be marked.

E. Definition of "Privately Made Firearm"

The NPRM proposes adding a definition of "privately made firearm" to 27 CFR 478.11 to mean "[a] firearm, including a frame or receiver, assembled or otherwise produced by a person other than a licensed manufacturer, and without a serial number or other identifying markings placed by a licensed manufacturer at the time the firearm was produced." The term would not include a firearm identified and registered in the NFRTR pursuant to chapter 53, title 26, United States Code, or any firearm made before October 22, 1968 (unless remanufactured after that date). This proposed definition explains that PMFs are those firearms that were made by nonlicensees without the markings required by this part, and excludes those already marked and registered in the NFRTR, and any firearm made before enactment of the GCA which, unlike the repealed law it replaced, required all firearms to be marked under federal law.[59] The term "made" is incorporated within the term "privately made firearm" rather than "manufacture" to distinguish between firearms manufactured (or "made") by private individuals without a license and those manufactured by persons licensed to engage in the business of manufacturing firearms.[60]

F. Definition of "Importer's or Manufacturer's Serial Number"

The proposed rule would define the term "importer's or manufacturer's serial number" in 27 CFR 478.11 as: "[t]he identification number, licensee name, licensee city or state, or license number placed by a licensee on a firearm frame or receiver in accordance with this part. The term shall include any such identification on a privately made firearm, or an ATF issued serial number." Because "privately made firearms" are manufactured by someone other than a licensed manufacturer, the serial number that incorporates the abbreviated Federal firearms license ("FFL") number placed by a licensee on a PMF under this rule is the "importer's or manufacturer's serial number." This definition would help ensure that the serial numbers and other markings necessary to ensure tracing, including those placed by a licensee on a "privately made firearm" or marked with an ATF-issued serial number,[61] to include imported firearms, are considered the "importer's or manufacturer's serial number" protected by 18 U.S.C. 922(k), which prohibits their removal, obliteration, or alteration.[62]

Supp. 2d 262, 272–73 (S.D.N.Y. 2003) (partially disassembled Tec-9 pistol that could be assembled within a short period of time could readily be converted to expel a projectile); United States v. Catanzaro, 368 F. Supp. 450, 453 (D. Conn. 1973) (a sawed-off shotgun was "readily restorable to fire" where it could be reassembled in one hour and the necessary missing parts could be obtained at a Smith & Wesson plant); compare with United States v. Seven Miscellaneous Firearms, 503 F. Supp. 565, 574–75 (D.D.C. 1980) (weapons could not be "readily restored to fire" when restoration required master gunsmith in a gun shop and $65,000 worth of equipment and tools).

[59] The Federal Firearms Act of 1938 (repealed), the predecessor to the GCA, made it unlawful for a person to receive a firearm that had the manufacturer's serial number removed, obliterated or altered. 15 U.S.C. 902(i). Regulations promulgated to implement this law required each firearm manufactured after July 1, 1958, to be identified with the name of the manufacturer or importer, a serial number, caliber, and model. However, there was an exception from the serial number and model requirements for any shotgun or .22 caliber rifle unless that firearm was also subject to the NFA. 26 CFR 177.50 (rescinded).

[60] Both the GCA and NFA define the term "manufacturer" as any person "engaged in the business of manufacturing firearms," and the GCA further defines the term "licensed manufacturer" as "any such person licensed under the provisions of this chapter." 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(10); 26 U.S.C. 5845(m). The NFA further defines the term "make," and the various derivatives of that word, to include "manufacturing (other than by one qualified to engage in the business under this chapter), putting together, altering, any combination of these, or otherwise producing a firearm." 26 U.S.C. 5845(i).

[61] ATF occasionally issues serial numbers for placement on firearms in which the serial numbers were not originally placed, see 26 U.S.C. 5842(b), or were accidentally removed, damaged, or worn due to routine use or other innocent reason.

[62] In addition to Federal law, 18 U.S.C. 922(k) and 26 U.S.C. 5861(g), (h), (i), almost every state prohibits the removal, alteration, or obliteration of a firearm's serial number or possession of a firearm with a serial number that has been removed,

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

G. Definition of "Gunsmith" [63]

To provide greater access to professional marking, this proposed rule would clarify that the meaning of the term "gunsmith" includes persons who engage in the business of identifying firearms for nonlicensees so that gunsmiths may become licensed as dealer-gunsmiths solely to provide professional PMF marking services. Specifically, this proposed rule would amend the definition of "engaged in the business" as it applies to a "gunsmith" in 27 CFR 478.11 to clarify the meaning of that term as someone "who, as a service performed on existing firearms not for sale or distribution by a licensee, devotes time, attention, and labor to repairing or customizing firearms, making or fitting special barrels, stocks, or trigger mechanisms to firearms, or identifying firearms in accordance with this chapter, as a regular course of trade or business with the principal objective of livelihood or profit, but such term shall not include a person who occasionally repairs or customizes firearms, or occasionally makes or fits special barrels, stocks, or trigger mechanisms to firearms."

This amendment would make clear that businesses that routinely repair or customize existing firearms, make or fit special barrels, stocks, or trigger mechanisms, or mark firearms as a service performed on firearms not for sale or distribution by a licensee, may be licensed as dealer-gunsmiths rather than as manufacturers.[64] Under this rule, PMFs would first need to be recorded by the dealer-gunsmith as an acquisition in the licensee's A&D Records upon receipt from the private owner (whether or not the licensee keeps the PMF overnight), and once marked, the licensee would update the acquisition entry with the identifying information, and then record its return as a disposition to the private owner. This would ensure that the PMF, if ever found by police at a crime scene, can be traced. However, no ATF Form 4473 or NICS background check would be required upon return of the marked firearm to the person from whom it was received, pursuant to 27 CFR 478.124(a).

H. Marking Requirements for Firearms

1. Information Required To Be Marked on the Frame(s) or Receiver(s)

To properly implement the new definitions, this proposed rule would amend 27 CFR 478.92(a) and 479.102 to explain how and when markings must be applied on each part defined as a frame or receiver, particularly since there could be more than one part of a complete weapon, or complete muffler or silencer device, that is the frame or receiver (i.e., when ATF has not identified specific part(s) as the frame or receiver). After publication of a final rule, each frame or receiver of a new firearm design or configuration manufactured or imported after the date of publication of the final rule would need to be marked with a serial number, and either: (a) The manufacturer's or importer's name (or recognized abbreviation), and city and State (or recognized abbreviation) where the manufacturer or importer maintains their place of business, or in the case of a maker of an NFA firearm, where the firearm was made; or (b) the manufacturer's or importer's name (or recognized abbreviation), and the serial number beginning with the licensee's abbreviated FFL number as a prefix, which is the first three and last five digits followed by a hyphen, and then followed by a number (which may incorporate letters and a hyphen) as a suffix, e.g., "12345678–[number]." The serial number (with or without the FFL prefix) identified on each part of a weapon defined as a frame or receiver must be the same number, but must not duplicate any serial number(s) placed by the licensee on any other firearm.

The additional information required to be marked on each frame or receiver (i.e., name, city and state, or name and abbreviated serial number) would only apply to new designs or configurations of firearms manufactured or imported after publication of the rule. Licensed manufacturers and importers may continue to identify the additional information on firearms (other than PMFs) of the same design and configuration as they existed before [effective date of the rule] under the prior content rules, and any rules necessary to ensure such identification will remain effective for that purpose. This provision is intended to reduce production costs incurred by licensees.

Requiring Federal firearms licensees to mark in this manner on each part defined as a frame or receiver would make it possible for ATF to trace the firearm if the manufacturer's or importer's name, city, or state is marked on the slide or barrel, and the original components are later separated. At the same time, it would give an option for manufacturers and importers to avoid marking their city and state as currently required at §§ 478.92(a)(1)(ii)(D), (E) and 479.102(a)(1)(iv) and (v), or obtain a marking variance from this requirement, by allowing them to mark their abbreviated license number as a prefix to the serial number as an alternative because this information can be obtained by looking up the licensee's information. Except for silencer parts transferred by manufacturers to other qualified manufacturers and dealers for completion or repair of devices (see Section II.H.9 of the preamble), there would be no change to the existing requirement that each part defined as a machinegun or silencer that is disposed of separately and not part of a complete weapon or device be marked with all required information because individual machinegun conversion and silencer parts are "firearms" under the NFA that must be registered in the NFRTR. 26 U.S.C. 5841(a)(1); id. at 5845(a), (b). However, for frames or receivers, and individual machinegun conversion or silencer parts defined as "firearms" that are disposed of separately, the model designation and caliber or gauge may be omitted if it is unknown at the time the part is identified.

Va. Code section 18.2–311.1; Wis. Stat. section 943.37(3).

[63] The term "gunsmith" is not used in the GCA; however, the Firearm Owners' Protection Act, Public Law 99–308, amended the GCA to define "engaged in the business" as applied to dealers to clarify when gunsmiths must have a license. See 18 U.S.C. 921(a)(11)(B); id. at (a)(21)(D); 132 Cong. Rec. 9603–04 (May 6, 1986) (statement of Sen. McClure).

[64] By clarifying the definition of gunsmith to mean a service routinely performed on existing firearms that are not for sale or distribution by a licensee, this rule would supersede ATF Ruling 2010–10, which allows gunsmiths under specified conditions to engage in certain manufacturing activities for licensed manufacturers. This would eliminate a significant source of confusion among regulated industry members and the public as to who needs a license to manufacture firearms. See Broughman v. Carver, 624 F.3d 670 (4th Cir. 2010) (distinguishing dealer-gunsmiths from manufacturers).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

2. Size and Depth of Markings

This proposed rule would not change the existing requirements for size and depth of markings in 27 CFR 478.92(a)(1) and 479.102(a), but for sake of clarity, consolidates them into a standalone paragraph along with the existing method of measuring the size and depth of markings set forth in 27 CFR 478.92(a)(5) and 479.102(b).

3. Period of Time To Identify Firearms

Neither the GCA nor the NFA explain at what point in the manufacturing process the required markings must be placed. In this regard, the proposed rule would make a distinction between the manufacture or making of a complete weapon or complete muffler or silencer device, and each part, including a replacement part, defined as a frame or receiver, machinegun, or firearm muffler or firearm silencer that is not a component part of a complete weapon or device at the time it is sold, shipped, or otherwise disposed. Complete weapons or complete muffler or silencer devices, as defined in this rule, would be allowed to be marked up to seven days from completion of the active manufacturing process for the weapon or device, or prior to disposition, whichever is sooner. Except for silencer parts produced by qualified manufacturers for transfer to other licensees to complete or repair silencer devices (see Section II.H.9 of the preamble), parts defined as a frame or receiver, machinegun, or firearm muffler or firearm silencer that are not component parts of a complete weapon or device when disposed of would be allowed to be marked up to seven days following the date of completion of the active manufacturing process for the part, or prior to disposition, whichever is sooner. Adding this language would codify ATF Ruling 2012–1, and this ruling would become obsolete upon publication of the rule. As explained in that ruling, whether the end product is to become a complete weapon or device, or a frame or receiver to be disposed of separately, firearms that are actively awaiting materials, parts, or equipment repair to be completed are still considered to be actively in the manufacturing process.

4. Marking of Privately Made Firearms

Because privately made firearms do not have the identifying markings required of commercially manufactured firearms, this rule proposes to amend 27 CFR 478.92 to require FFLs to mark, or supervise the marking of, the same serial number on each frame or receiver (as defined in this rule) of a weapon that begins with the FFL's abbreviated license number (first three and last five digits) as a prefix followed by a hyphen on any "privately made firearm" (as defined) that the licensee acquired (e.g., "12345678–[number]"). Unless previously identified by another licensee, PMFs acquired by licensees on or after the effective date of the rule would need to be marked in this manner within seven days of receipt or other acquisition (including from a personal collection), or before the date of disposition (including to a personal collection), whichever is sooner.[65] For PMFs acquired by licensees before the effective date of the rule, licensees would be required to mark or cause them to be marked by another licensee either within 60 days from that date, or before the date of final disposition (including to a personal collection), whichever is sooner. With respect to polymer firearms, including those that are produced using additive manufacturing (also known as "3D printing"), the method of marking would typically require the licensee to embed (or use pre-existing) metal serial number plates within the plastic to ensure they cannot be worn away during normal use.[66] Incorporation of this metal plate along with other metal components would also help ensure that the polymer firearm does not violate the Undetectable Firearms Act, 18 U.S.C. 922(p), which prohibits the manufacture and possession of firearms that are not as detectable as the "Security Exemplar" that contains 3.7 ounces of material type 17–4 PH stainless steel.[67]

PMFs currently in inventory that a licensee chooses not to mark may also be destroyed or voluntarily turned in to law enforcement within the 60-day period. Also, this proposed rule would not require Federal firearms licensees to accept any PMFs, or to mark them themselves. Licensees would be able to refuse to accept PMFs, or arrange for private individuals to have them marked by another licensee before accepting them, provided they are properly marked in accordance with this proposed rule. To provide greater access to professional marking, as stated previously, this rule would clarify that the meaning of the term "gunsmith" includes persons who engage in the business of identifying firearms for nonlicensees so that gunsmiths may become licensed as dealer-gunsmiths solely to provide professional PMF marking services.

Consistent with the language and purpose of the GCA, this proposed provision is necessary to allow ATF to trace all firearms acquired and disposed of by licensees, prevent illicit firearms trafficking, and provide guidance to FFLs and the public with respect to PMF transactions with the licensed community. This provision is crucial in light of advances in technology that allow unlicensed persons easily to produce firearms at home from parts ordered online, or by using 3D printers or personally owned or leased equipment. Such privately made firearms have and will continue to make their way to the primary market in firearms throughout the licensed community.[68] At the same time, consistent with the intent of the GCA,[69] nothing in this rule would restrict persons not otherwise prohibited from possessing firearms from making their own firearms at home without markings solely for personal use (not for sale or distribution) in accordance with Federal, State, and local law.[70] Persons should consult the laws and officials in their own States and localities to determine the lawfulness of PMFs.

[65] Under this rule, licensed collectors would only need to mark PMFs they receive or otherwise acquire that are defined as "curios or relics." See 27 CFR 478.11 (definitions of "firearm" and "curios or relics").

[66] When the size and depth of markings regulations were first promulgated, ATF recognized that "all markings can be removed by someone who wishes to make a deliberate effort to remove the markings. Realistically, we need to be concerned about markings that could be worn away during normal use or markings that could survive normal refinishing processes, e.g., blueing, plating, etc. . . . As such, ATF has required manufacturers and importers who use polymer plastic frames to mark serial numbers in a steel plate embedded within the plastic." 66 FR 40599 (Aug. 3, 2001).

[67] Handguns that are 3D printed are also subject to the registration and taxation requirements of the NFA if they have a smooth bore and are capable of being concealed on the person, thereby falling within the definition of "any other weapon." See 26 U.S.C. 5845(e).

[68] Under Federal law, for example, certain firearm transactions must be conducted through Federal firearms licensees. See 18 U.S.C. 922(a)(5) (prohibiting any person other than a licensee, subject to certain limited exceptions, from selling or delivering a firearm to an unlicensed out of state resident).

[70] This rule is also consistent with the Second Amendment. As the Supreme Court stated in District of Columbia v. Heller, 554 U.S. 570, 626–27 & n.26 (2008), "presumptively lawful regulatory measures" include those "imposing conditions and qualifications on the commercial sale of arms." See also United States v. Marzzarella, 614 F.3d 85, 99 (3d Cir. 2010) (concluding that even if strict scrutiny were to apply, 18 U.S.C. 922(k) (prohibiting possession of firearms with obliterated serial numbers) would be upheld under the Second Amendment because "serial number tracing serves a governmental interest in enabling law enforcement to gather vital information from recovered firearms. Because it assists law enforcement in this manner, we find its preservation is not only a substantial but a compelling interest.").

5. Meaning of Marking Terms

An additional amendment to 27 CFR 478.92 and 478.102 would clarify the meaning of the terms ''legible'' and ''legibly'' to ensure that ''the identification markings use exclusively Roman letters (e.g., A, a, B, b, C, c) and Arabic numerals (e.g., 1, 2, 3), or solely Arabic numerals, and may include a hyphen,'' and that the terms ''conspicuous'' and ''conspicuously'' are understood to mean that ''the identification markings are capable of being easily seen with normal handling of the firearm and unobstructed by other markings when the complete weapon is assembled.'' This would codify the meaning of those terms as explained in ATF Ruling 2002–6 (''legible''), and ATF's final rule at 66 FR 40599 (Aug. 3, 2001) (referencing U.S. Customs Service regulations on the definition of ''conspicuous'').

6. Alternate Means or Period of Identification

This proposed rule would not alter the Director's ability to authorize other means of identification, or a ''marking variance,'' for any part defined as a firearm (including a machinegun or silencer) upon receipt of a letter application or an Application for Alternate Means of Identification of Firearms (Marking Variance), ATF Form 3311.4, showing that such other identification is reasonable and does not hinder the effective administration of the regulations. The amendment would also allow ATF to grant a variance from the period in which to mark firearms.

7. Destructive Device Period of Identification

Similar to other firearms, because the proposed rule would now specify the seven-day grace period in which to mark all completed firearms, including destructive devices, this rule would also allow ATF to grant a variance from this period. The marking requirements for destructive devices are otherwise unchanged.

8. Adoption of Identifying Markings

This rule proposes to authorize licensed manufacturers and importers to adopt an existing serial number, caliber/gauge, model, or other markings already identified on a firearm provided they legibly and conspicuously place, or cause to be placed, on each part (or part(s) previously determined by the Director) defined as a frame or receiver either: Their name (or recognized abbreviation), and city and State (or recognized abbreviation) where they maintain their place of business; or their name (or recognized abbreviation) and their abbreviated FFL number, which is the first three and last five digits followed by a hyphen, and then followed by the existing serial number (including any other abbreviated FFL prefix) as a suffix, e.g., ''12345678–[serial number],'' to ensure the traceability of the firearm. This language would supersede ATF Ruling 2013–3 as it applies to licensed manufacturers and importers, but the ruling would remain effective for makers of NFA firearms. This change would help avoid multiple markings on firearms that could be confusing to law enforcement and alleviate concerns of some manufacturers and importers regarding serial number duplication when firearms are remanufactured or reimported.

9. Firearm Muffler or Silencer Parts Transferred Between Qualified Licensees

Licensed and qualified firearm muffler or silencer manufacturers routinely transfer small internal muffler or silencer components to each other to produce complete devices, and between qualified licensees when repairing existing devices. Because of the difficulties and expense of marking and registering small individual components used to commercially manufacture a complete muffler or silencer device with little law enforcement benefit, this proposed rule would allow qualified manufacturers to transfer parts defined as a firearm muffler or silencer to other qualified manufacturers without immediately identifying or registering them. Once the new device is complete with the part, the manufacturer would be required to identify and register the device in the manner and within the period specified in this rule for a complete device. Likewise, the proposed rule would allow qualified manufacturers to transfer muffler or silencer replacement parts to qualified manufacturers and dealers to repair existing devices already identified and registered in the NFRTR. Further, this rule would amend the definition of ''transfer'' to clarify that the temporary conveyance of a lawfully possessed NFA firearm, including a silencer, to a qualified manufacturer or dealer for the sole purpose of repair, identification, evaluation, research, testing, or calibration, and return to the same lawful possessor is not a ''transfer'' requiring additional identification or registration in the NFRTR. This change would be consistent with the definition of ''transfer'' in 26 U.S.C. 5845(j) because a temporary conveyance for these purposes is not a sale or other disposition.[71] These proposed rules are intended to reduce the practical and administrative problems of marking and registering silencer parts by the regulated industry, and avoid a potential resource burden on ATF to process numerous tax-exempt registration applications with little public safety benefit.[72]

10. Voluntary Classification of Firearms and Armor Piercing Ammunition

For many years, ATF has acted on voluntarily requests from persons, particularly manufacturers who are developing new products, by issuing determinations or ''classifications'' whether an item is a ''firearm'' or ''armor piercing ammunition'' as defined in the GCA or NFA. This helps regulated industry members and the public determine what laws and regulations may be applicable to the product, and any steps that they may need to take to be compliant with those laws and regulations. To clarify this process, this proposed rule would set forth the procedure and conditions by which persons may voluntarily submit such requests to ATF. Each request would be submitted in writing or on an ATF form executed under the penalties of perjury with a complete and accurate description of the item, the name and address of the manufacturer or importer thereof, and a sample of such item for examination along with any instructions, guides, templates, jigs, equipment, tools, or marketing materials that are made available to the purchaser or recipient of the item. Upon completion of the examination, ATF may return the sample to the person who made the request unless a determination is made that return of the

[71] The definition of ''transfer'' in the NFA only includes ''selling, assigning, pledging, leasing, loaning, giving away, or otherwise disposing of'' a firearm. See United States v. Smith, 642 F.2d 1179, 1182 (9th Cir. 1981) (''We cannot agree that Congress intended to impose a transfer tax and require registration whenever mere physical possession of a firearm is surrendered for a brief period.'').

[72] These changes are consistent with ATF enforcement policy. See NFA Handbook, ATF E-Publication 5320.8 (April 2009), pp. 46, 60 sections 7.4.6; 9.5.1. With regard to silencer repairs, in order to avoid any appearance that an unlawful ''transfer'' has taken place, ATF recommends that an Application for Tax Exempt Transfer and Registration of Firearm, ATF Form 5, be submitted for approval prior to conveying the firearm for repair or identifying the firearm. The conveyance may also be accomplished by submission of a letter from the registrant to the qualified FFL advising the FFL that the registrant is shipping or delivering the firearm for repair/identification and describing the repair or identification. Return of the registered silencer to the registrant may likewise be accomplished by submission of an ATF Form 5 or by a letter from the FFL to the registrant that accompanies the silencer.

sample would be or place the person in violation of law.

ATF's decision whether to classify an item voluntarily submitted is entirely discretionary. The proposed procedure would assist ATF more efficiently to determine the design and intent of the manufacturer of the item through its written statements, and by examining the objective design features of an actual sample along with any instructions, guides, templates, jigs, equipment, tools, or marketing materials that are made available to the purchaser or recipient of the item (though ATF is not limited to examining the items submitted to make its determination). The proposed rule would further codify ATF's policy not to evaluate a firearm accessory or attachment "unless it is installed on the firearm(s) in the configuration for which it is designed and intended to be used," and would further explain that "[a] determination made by the Director under this paragraph shall not be deemed by any person to be applicable to or authoritative with respect to any other sample, design, model, or configuration."

I. Recordkeeping

1. Acquisition and Disposition Records

This proposed rule would make minor amendments to 27 CFR 478.122, 478.123, 478.125, and 478.125a, pertaining to the acquisition and disposition records maintained by importers, manufacturers, and dealers. Due to the possibility that a firearm may have more than one frame or receiver as defined in this rule, and the changes to marking regulations, this rule would make technical amendments to these recordkeeping regulations to make certain words plural, (e.g., manufacturer(s), importer(s), and serial number(s)) in the regulations and for the formatting of their records as applicable. Although under §§ 478.11 and 479.11 singular terms in the regulations must always be read to include the plural form, and vice versa, these changes are necessary to ensure that Federal firearms licensees record more than one manufacturer, importer, or serial number, if appropriate, when acquiring or disposing of firearms with multiple components marked as the frame or receiver, or that have been remanufactured or reimported by another licensee. This is consistent with prior ATF guidance to the firearms industry.[73] However, to reduce costs incurred by licensees, ATF anticipates that it would exercise its discretion not to enforce these format changes to the A&D Record until an existing paper record book is completed (i.e., "closed out") or electronic record version updated in the normal course of business, provided the information is accurately recorded as required in the existing record.

Over the years, licensed importers and manufacturers have asked ATF to allow them to consolidate their records of importation or manufacture and acquisition and disposition of firearms, rather than maintaining separate records as required by 27 CFR 478.122(d) and 478.123(d). Because separate records are also difficult for ATF to inspect, this rule would amend §§ 478.122 and 478.123 to require licensed importers and manufacturers to consolidate their records of importation, manufacture, or other acquisition, and their sale or other disposition in a format containing the applicable columns specified in a table included in § 478.122(b). The columns may be in a different order than the specified format provided they contain all required information. These changes would supersede ATF Rulings 2011–1 and 2016–3, and those rulings would become obsolete upon publication of a final rule.

This rule would also make minor clarifying edits to the format of the Firearms Acquisition and Disposition Record in § 478.125(e). The column titled "Name and address or name and license No." would be retitled as "Name and address of nonlicensee; or if licensee, name and License No." In addition, the column titled "Address or License No. if licensee, or Form 4473 Serial No. if Forms 4473 filed numerically" would be retitled "Address of nonlicensee; License No. of licensee; or Form 4473 Serial No. if such forms filed numerically." This change would make clear that both the name and license number (not the address) of a licensee from whom firearms are received and to whom they are disposed are recorded in the A&D Record. However, to reduce costs incurred by licensees, ATF anticipates that it would exercise its discretion not to enforce these format changes to the A&D Record until an existing paper record book is completed (i.e., "closed out") or electronic record version updated in the normal course of business, provided the information is accurately recorded as required in the existing record.

The proposed changes to § 478.125 would also include a minor amendment to paragraph (f) to make it clear that in the event the licensee records a duplicate entry with the same firearm and acquisition information, whether to close out an old record book or for any other reason, the licensee must record a reference to the date and location of the subsequent entry (e.g., date of new entry, book name/number, page number, and line number) as the disposition. This change is needed to ensure that acquisition records are closed out when firearms are no longer in inventory.[74] This would resolve a significant problem that ATF Industry Operations Investigators have when trying to reconcile the inventory of a Federal firearms licensee, and that Federal firearms licensees have when timely responding to trace requests, particularly when old A&D Records are "closed out" and stored, which, under this proposed rule, could be in a separate warehouse depending on their age (see Section II.J of the preamble).

2. Firearms Transaction Records

Some technical amendments would be needed at 27 CFR 478.124 pertaining to information recorded on the ATF Form 4473. Like changes to the recordkeeping regulations, these amendments would make certain words plural, (e.g., manufacturer(s), importer(s), and serial number(s)) to ensure that the Federal firearms licensee is recording more than one manufacturer, importer, and serial number, if appropriate, on Forms 4473. In addition, the proposed changes to § 478.124 would include a minor technical amendment to paragraph (f) by removing a phrase that indicates that a Federal firearms licensee must fill out the firearm description information only after filling out the information about the transferee. Making this deletion would codify ATF Procedure 2020–1, which sets forth an alternative method of complying with § 478.124(f) for non-over-the-counter firearm transactions. ATF recently issued that procedure in light of changes to ATF Form 4473 (May 2020), which now requires completion of the form in an order different from that provided in § 478.124(f).

3. Recordkeeping for Privately Made Firearms

Minor changes to the above regulations regarding recordkeeping by licensees would also be needed to account for any voluntary receipts or other acquisitions (including from a personal collection) of privately made firearms, and corresponding dispositions (including to a personal collection). Since PMFs are not [73] See FFL Newsletter, May 2012, p.5 ("If a firearm is marked with two manufacturer's names, or multiple manufacturer and importer names, FFLs should record each manufacturers' and importers' name in the A&D record.").

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

commercially manufactured, if a PMF were received or otherwise acquired by a licensee or disposed of, or imported, the abbreviation ''PMF'' would be recorded as the manufacturer in the appropriate column on a licensee's acquisition and disposition record, ATF Form 4473, or import application, as well as the PMF serial number beginning with the abbreviated FFL number in the serial number column. For PMFs received prior to the effective date of a final rule that are to be identified by the licensee in accordance with § 478.92, or by another licensee at the licensee's request, the licensee would be required to first record the firearm as an acquisition in the licensee's A&D Records upon receipt from the private owner (whether or not the licensee keeps the PMF overnight). Once marked, the licensee would update the acquisition entry with the identifying information, and then record its return as a disposition to the private owner. However, to reduce costs incurred by licensees, ATF anticipates that it would exercise its discretion not to enforce a title format change to the A&D Record to add ''and/or PMF'' in the manufacturer column until an existing paper record book is completed (i.e., ''closed out'') or electronic record version updated in the normal course of business, provided each PMF received is accurately recorded as a ''PMF'' in the manufacturer column.

4. NFA Forms Update

Minor technical amendments would also be needed in 27 CFR 479.62, 479.84, 479.88, 479.90, and 479.141, pertaining to NFA Form 1 (Application to Make), NFA Form 4 (Application to Transfer), NFA Form 3 (Tax Exempt Transfers—SOTs), NFA Form 5 (Tax Exempt Transfers—Governmental Entities), and the Stolen or Lost Firearms report, respectively. Due to the new definitions and changes to marking regulations, the technical amendments here would make certain words plural (e.g., manufacturer(s), importer(s), serial number(s)) in the regulations as applicable. Although under §§ 478.11 and 479.11 singular terms in the regulations must always be read to include the plural form, and vice versa, these changes are necessary to ensure that more than one name, manufacturer, importer, or serial number, if appropriate, is recorded when completing the NFA forms.

5. Importation Forms Update

Minor technical amendments would also be needed in 27 CFR 447.42, 447.45, 478.112, 478.113, 478.114, and 479.112, pertaining to the importation of firearms. Again, due to the new definition and changes to marking regulations, the technical amendments here would make certain words plural (e.g., manufacturer(s), country or countries of manufacture, and serial number(s)) in the regulations as applicable. Although under §§ 478.11 and 479.11 singular terms in the regulations must always be read to include the plural form, and vice versa, these changes are necessary to ensure that more than one name, manufacturer, country, importer, or serial number, if appropriate, is recorded when completing importation forms.

J. Record Retention

This rule also proposes to amend 27 CFR 478.129 to remove language stating that FFL dealers and collectors need only keep A&D Records and ATF Forms 4473 for up to 20 years following the date of sale or disposition of the firearm. The proposed changes would require Federal firearms licensees to retain all records until business or licensed activity is discontinued, either on paper or in an electronic format approved by the Director,[75] at the business or collection premises readily accessible for inspection. There would also be an amendment to 27 CFR 478.50(a) to allow all licensees, including manufacturers and importers, to store paper records and forms with no open disposition entries and with no dispositions recorded within 20 years at a separate warehouse, which would be considered part of the business premises for this purpose and subject to inspection.

In view of advancements in electronic scanning and storage technology, and ATF's acceptance of electronic recordkeeping, these amendments would reverse a 1985 rulemaking allowing non-manufacturer/importer Federal firearms licensees to destroy their records after 20 years.[76] The durability and longevity of firearms means that they are often in circulation for more than 20 years, while the cost of storing firearm transaction records has decreased dramatically through electronic recordkeeping. The proposed amendments would enhance public safety by ensuring that records of active licensees will be available for tracing purposes. ATF has encountered some firearms retailers who have destroyed large numbers of records more than 20 years old so that they would no longer need to be stored physically. This resulted in some traces of firearms involved in crimes to be returned incomplete for lack of records. This provision is also essential if PMFs involved in crime are marked and traced directly to licensed dealers who, unlike licensed manufacturers and importers, are not presently required to maintain permanent records.

III. Statutory and Executive Order Review

A. Executive Orders 12866 and 13563

Executive Order 12866 (Regulatory Planning and Review) directs agencies to assess the costs and benefits of available regulatory alternatives and, if regulation is necessary, to select regulatory approaches that maximize net benefits (including potential economic benefits, environmental benefits, public health and safety effects, distributive impacts, and equity). Executive Order 13563 (Improving Regulation and Regulatory Review) emphasizes the importance of quantifying both costs and benefits, of reducing costs, of harmonizing rules, and of promoting flexibility.

The Office of Management and Budget (OMB) has determined that while this proposed rule is not economically significant, it is a ''significant regulatory action'' under section 3(f)(4) of Executive Order 12866 because this proposed rule raises novel legal or policy issues arising out of legal mandates. Accordingly, the rule has been reviewed by OMB.

This proposed rule would update the new definition of ''frame or receiver,'' among other items. Table 1 provides a summary of the provisions of this proposed rule, along with the estimated affected population, costs, and benefits.

1. New Definition of Firearm Frame or Receiver

The proposed definition of this term would maintain current classifications and current marking requirements of firearm frames or receivers, except that the licensed manufacturer or importer must mark on new designs or configurations either: Their name (or recognized abbreviation), and city and State (or recognized abbreviation) where they maintain their place of business; or their name (or recognized abbreviation) and their abbreviated FFL number, on each part defined as a frame or receiver, along with the serial number. To ensure traceability if the parts are separated, there would no longer be an option only to mark the FFL's name, city, and state on the slide or barrel. More specifically—

- The proposed definitions would take into account the fact that modern firearms do not house all the components as defined in the current definition. These definitions account for firearms such as split frames or multi-piece firearms;
- The proposed definition would recognize the current classifications of a firearm "frame or receiver." It is intended to encompass the majority, if not all, of existing regulated firearms, and no new marking requirements would be required for these existing designs and configurations;
- After this proposed rule is finalized, markings on new designs or configurations of firearms manufactured or imported may be accomplished by marking each frame or receiver with the licensee's name, city, and state, and serial number, or with the licensee's name and abbreviated license number prefix and number (serial number) in the manner prescribed by existing marking requirements;
- Markings would need to be accomplished within 7 days of completion of the active manufacturing process for the complete weapon (or frame or receiver of such weapon if not being sold as a complete weapon); and
- The proposed rule would require acquisition and disposition record changes to accommodate recording multiple frames or receivers that have different serial numbers if the original frames or receivers (with the same serial number) become separated and are reassembled with frames or receivers bearing different serial numbers.

ATF believes that the majority of the industry currently complies with these requirements, so the cost would be minimal. While the new definitions would mostly affect new designs or configurations of firearms, manufacturers would still be able to receive a determination or a variance on the design from ATF; therefore, they may not experience an additional cost or burden. For more details, please refer to Chapter 2 of the Regulatory Impact Analysis.[77]

2. Partially Complete, Disassembled, or Inoperable Firearm Kits

This section addresses non-FFL manufacturers who manufacture partially complete, disassembled, or inoperable frame or receiver kits, to include both firearm parts kits that allow a person to make only a frame or receiver, and those kits that allow a person to make a complete weapon. When a partially complete frame or receiver parts kit reaches a stage in manufacture where it may readily be completed, assembled, converted, or restored to a functional state, it would be considered a firearm "frame or receiver" that must be marked. Further, under the proposed rule, weapon parts kits with partially complete frames or receivers containing the necessary parts such that they may readily be completed, assembled, converted, or restored to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive would be "firearms" for which each frame or receiver of the weapon, as defined under this rule, would need to be marked.

For non-FFL manufacturers of firearm parts kits containing a part defined as a firearm frame or receiver, ATF anticipates there would be a significant impact on these individual companies, but notes that the overall industry impact would also be minimal. Based on current marketing related to the unregulated sale of certain firearm parts kits, ATF anticipates that these non-FFLs would either become FFLs to sell regulated frames or receivers or complete weapons (either as kits or fully assembled), or would take a loss in revenue to sell unregulated items or parts kits that do not contain a frame or receiver (i.e., unregulated raw materials or molds, fire control components, barrels, accessories, tools, jigs, or instructions), but not both. For more details, please refer to Chapter 3 of the Regulatory Impact Analysis.

3. Gunsmithing

The proposed rule would result in a one-time cost for contract gunsmithing, estimated to be $180,849. For more details, please refer to Chapter 4 of the Regulatory Impact Analysis.

[77] The Regulatory Impact Analysis is available on www.regulations.gov in the same docket as this rule.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

4. Silencers

The proposed rule would require silencers to be marked on any housing or structure, such as an outer tube or modular piece, designed to hold or integrate one or more essential internal components of the device. Currently, the regulations assume that each part defined as a muffler or silencer must be marked and registered.[78] While this proposed change would increase the number of certain parts—firearm muffler or silencer frames or receivers—that need to be marked for modular silencers, this proposed change is not intended to require marking of all silencer parts so long as they are incorporated into a complete device by the original manufacturer or maker that is marked and registered. More specifically, none of the internal nonstructural parts of a complete muffler or silencer device would need to be marked so long as each frame or receiver as defined in this rule is marked. However, as with current regulations, silencer parts sold, shipped, or otherwise disposed of separately would still be considered ''silencers'' that require all markings prior to disposition except when transferred between qualified manufacturers for the production of new devices, and to qualified manufacturers and dealers for the repair of existing devices (see Section II.H.9 of the preamble).

However, the proposed rule would now require some manufacturers of silencers to mark the outer tube rather than the endcap. ATF anticipates only minimal costs associated with moving the serial number and other identifying information from the end cap or adding the same information to the outer tube on certain silencers. Furthermore, there may be a savings for individual owners of silencers. This proposed rule would expressly allow for repairs on silencer devices without having to undergo the additional NFA transfer and registration process, so long as the device is returned to the sender. For more details, please refer to Chapter 5 of the Regulatory Impact Analysis.

5. Privately Made Firearms

A firearm, including a frame or receiver, assembled or otherwise produced by a non-licensee without any markings by a licensee at the time of production or importation is defined as a ''privately made firearm (PMF)'' in the proposed rule. This does not include a firearm identified and registered in the NFRTR pursuant to chapter 53, title 26, United States Code, or any firearm made before October 22, 1968 (unless remanufactured after that date). Under the proposed rule, FFLs would be required to mark PMFs within 7 days of the firearm being received by a licensee, or before disposition, whichever first occurs. Licensees would have 60 days to mark PMFs already in inventory after a final rule becomes effective. FFLs would have the option to mark their existing PMFs themselves. Both FFLs and non-FFLs would have the option to contract with an FFL, such as a gunsmith, for this purpose, dispose of them, or send them to ATF or another law enforcement agency for disposal. The industry cost for this section is $563,340. For more details, please refer to Chapter 6 of the Regulatory Impact Analysis.

6. Record Retention

Currently, licensees other than manufacturers and importers do not have to store their ATF Forms 4473 or A&D records beyond 20 years. This proposed rule would require licensed dealers and collectors to store their Forms 4473 or A&D records indefinitely. The industry cost for this section would be minimal because FFLs could drop off their overflow records to ATF or have ATF ship them directly. The government cost for this provision is $68,939 annually. For more details, please refer to Chapter 7 of the Regulatory Impact Analysis.

7. ATF Form Updates

This proposed rule would modify existing forms and records, such as ATF Forms 4473, NFA forms, importation forms, the Stolen or Lost Firearms Reports, and A&D Records, to help ensure that if more than one manufacturer or serial number is identified on any firearm, those names or serial numbers are recorded. As paper forms run out, FFLs would be able to order forms as part of their normal operations. In other words, FFLs using paper forms requested from ATF are not anticipated to incur any additional cost. For FFLs maintaining transaction records electronically, these FFLs would also only be required to update their software during their next regularly scheduled update. Because software updates occur regularly, and costs are already incorporated for those, ATF does not anticipate any additional costs would be incurred for these changes. There is no cost associated with this section. For more details, please refer to Chapter 8 of the Regulatory Impact Analysis.

8. Total Cost of the Proposed Rule

The total 10-year undiscounted cost of this proposed rule is estimated to be $1.3 million. The total 10-year discounted cost of the rule is $1.0 million and $1.2 million at 7 percent and 3 percent respectively. The annualized cost of this proposed rule would be $147,048 and $135,750, also at 7 percent and 3 percent, respectively.

9. Alternatives

ATF considered various alternatives when preparing this proposed rule. For a more detailed analysis, please refer to Chapters 1 and 10 of the Regulatory Impact Analysis.

a. This Proposed Rule

ATF chose to propose promulgating new definitions of ''frame or receiver,'' ''privately made firearm,'' ''gunsmithing,'' and an update to records retention and new requirements for marking silencers, because they would maximize benefits.

b. Other Considered Alternatives

Alternative 1—No change. While this alternative minimizes cost, it does not meet any of the objectives outlined in this proposed rule.

Alternative 2—Everytown for Gun Safety petition. ATF received a petition for rulemaking from Everytown for Gun Safety, a non-profit organization, proposing to define ''firearm frame or receiver'' in 27 CFR 478.11. That proposed definition focused on housing the ''trigger group''; however, it did not define ''trigger group'' and even if it did, it would not address firearms that do not house trigger components within a single housing, or which have a remote trigger outside the weapon. In other words, this alternative would fall short of addressing all technologies or designs of firearms that are currently available, or may become available in the future. It also does not address potential changes in firearms terminology. Thus, while the alternative requested by that petition would reduce the cost by reducing the number of entities affected, it does not fully address the objectives of this proposed rule.

Alternative 3—Grandfather all existing firearms and receivers. This alternative would grandfather in all existing firearms that would not meet the serialization standard for partially complete and split frames or receivers. This was considered and incorporated into the proposed alternative, where feasible. However, in order to enforce the regulation, a complete grandfathering of existing firearms and silencers is problematic in that manufacturers could continue to produce non-compliant firearm frames or receivers and falsely market them as grandfathered firearms. This could potentially pose an enforcement issue that may not be resolved for years if not decades.

Alternative 4—Require serialization of all partially complete firearms or split receivers. This would require all firearms purchased by individuals to be retroactively serialized. However, the cost would increase considerably and the GCA only regulates the manufacture of firearms by Federal firearm licensees, not the making of firearms for personal use by private unlicensed individuals.

B. Executive Order 13132

This proposed rule will not have substantial direct effects on the States, the relationship between the Federal Government and the States, or the distribution of power and responsibilities among the various levels of government. This rule is not intended to supersede State requirements unless there is a direct and positive conflict between them such that they cannot be reconciled or consistently stand together.[79] States can require markings on firearms for individuals. This rule does not require individuals to mark their personal firearms. Therefore, in accordance with section 6 of Executive Order 13132 (Federalism), the Attorney General has determined that this proposed rule does not have sufficient federalism implications to warrant the preparation of a federalism summary impact statement.

C. Executive Order 12988

This regulation meets the applicable standards set forth in sections 3(a) and 3(b)(2) of Executive Order 12988 (Civil Justice Reform).

D. Regulatory Flexibility Act

In accordance with the Regulatory Flexibility Act (''RFA''), ATF prepared an Initial Regulatory Flexibility Analysis (''IRFA'') that examines the impacts of the proposed rule on small entities (5 U.S.C. 601 et seq.). The IRFA is included here and as part of the RFA. The term ''small entities'' comprises small businesses, not-for-profit organizations that are independently owned and operated and are not dominant in their fields, and governmental jurisdictions with populations of fewer than 50,000 people. 5 U.S.C. 601(6).

Because this proposed rule affects different populations in different ways, the analysis for the IRFA has been broken up by provision. Certain provisions may have a significant impact on certain small entities, such as non-FFL manufactures of firearm parts kits with incomplete firearm frames or receivers. Based on the information from this analysis:

- ATF estimates that this proposed rule could potentially affect 132,023 entities, including all FFLs and non-FFL manufacturers and retailers of firearm parts kits with incomplete firearm frames or receivers, but anticipates that the majority of entities affected by this rule would experience minimal or no additional costs.
- Non-FFL manufacturers are anticipated to be small and would potentially have a significant impact on their individual revenue.
- The second largest impact would be $12,828 if a manufacturer had to retool their existing production equipment, but ATF anticipates this is unlikely because this proposed rule encompasses the majority of existing technology. This would not affect future production because this work would be part of their normal operations in creating new firearms.
- ATF estimates the majority of affected entities are small entities that would experience a range of costs; therefore, this rule may have a significant impact on small entities.

Under the RFA, we are required to consider what, if any, impact this rule would have on small entities. Agencies must perform a review to determine whether a rule will have such an impact. Because the agency has determined that it will, the agency has prepared an initial regulatory flexibility analysis as described in the RFA. Under Section 603(b) of the RFA, the regulatory flexibility analysis must provide or address:

- A description of the reasons why action by the agency is being considered;
- A succinct statement of the objectives of, and legal basis for, the proposed rule;
- A description of, and where feasible, an estimate of the number of small entities to which the proposed rule will apply;
- A description of the projected reporting, recordkeeping and other compliance requirements of the proposed rule, including an estimate of the classes of small entities which will be subject to the requirement and the type of professional skills necessary for preparation of the report or record;
- An identification, to the extent practicable, of all relevant Federal rules which may duplicate, overlap or conflict with the proposed rule; and
- Descriptions of any significant alternatives to the proposed rule which accomplish the stated objectives of applicable statutes and which minimize any significant economic impact of the proposed rule on small entities.

1. A Description of the Reasons Why Action by the Agency Is Being Considered

One of the reasons ATF is considering this proposed regulation is the failure of the market to compensate for negative externalities caused by commercial activity. A negative externality can be the by-product of a transaction between two parties that is not accounted for in the transaction.

This proposed rule would update the existing definition of frame or receiver to account for the majority of technological advances in the industry and ensure that these firearms continue to remain under the regulatory regime as intended by the enactment of the GCA, including accounting for manufacturing of firearms using multiple manufacturers. In light of recent court cases, the majority of regulated firearms may not meet the existing definition of firearm frame or receiver. This may result in no part of a firearm being regulated as a ''frame or receiver'' contrary to the requirements in the GCA that ensure tracing to solve crime and help prevent prohibited persons from coming into possession of weapons. Furthermore, finding information in support of criminal cases may be hindered because records are destroyed after 20 years despite the fact that firearms may last longer than 20 years and be used in criminal activities.

This proposed rule would also account for advances in technology in performing transactions such as electronic storage. For more specific details regarding the need for regulation, please refer to the specific chapters pertaining to each provision of this proposed rule.

2. A Succinct Statement of the Objectives of, and Legal Basis for, the Proposed Rule

The Attorney General is responsible for enforcing the GCA, as amended, and the NFA, as amended. This responsibility includes the authority to promulgate regulations necessary to enforce the provisions of the GCA and NFA. See 18 U.S.C. 926(a); 26 U.S.C. 7801(a)(2)(A); id. at 7805(a). Congress and the Attorney General have delegated the responsibility for administering and enforcing the GCA and NFA to the Director of ATF, subject to the direction of the Attorney General and the Deputy Attorney General. See

[79] See 18 U.S.C. 927.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

28 U.S.C. 599A(b)(1); 28 CFR 0.130(a)(1)–(2). Accordingly, the Department and ATF have promulgated regulations implementing both the GCA and the NFA. See 27 CFR parts 478, 479.

The proposed rule provides new regulatory definitions of ''firearm frame or receiver'' and ''frame or receiver'' because they are outdated. The proposed rule would also amend ATF's definitions of ''firearm'' and ''gunsmith'' to clarify the meaning of those terms, and to add new regulatory terms such as ''complete weapon,'' ''complete muffler or silencer device,'' ''privately made firearm,'' and ''readily'' for purposes of clarity given advancements in firearms technology. Further, the proposed rule would amend ATF's regulations on marking and recordkeeping that are necessary to implement these new or amended definitions.

3. A Description of, and Where Feasible, an Estimate of the Number of Small Entities to Which the Proposed Rule Will Apply

- ATF estimates that this rule could potentially affect 132,023 entities, including all FFLs and non-FFL manufactures and retailers of firearm kits, but anticipates that the majority of entities affected by this rule would experience minimal or no additional costs.
- ATF anticipates the majority of affected entities are small entities and would experience any range of costs; therefore this rule would have a significant impact on a substantial number of small entities.

4. An Identification, to the Extent Practicable, of All Relevant Federal Rules Which May Duplicate, Overlap or Conflict With the Proposed Rule

This proposed rule does not duplicate or conflict with other Federal rules.

5. Descriptions of any Significant Alternatives to the Proposed Rule Which Accomplish the Stated Objectives of Applicable Statutes and Which Minimize any Significant Economic Impact of the Proposed Rule on Small Entities

The significant alternatives considered are set forth in Section IV(A)(9) of this preamble. For more details, please refer to Chapters 1 and 10 of the Regulatory Impact Analysis.

E. Small Business Regulatory Enforcement Fairness Act of 1996

This proposed rule is not a major rule as defined by section 251 of the Small Business Regulatory Enforcement Fairness Act of 1996, 5 U.S.C. 804.

F. Unfunded Mandate Reform Act of 1995

This proposed rule will not result in the expenditure by State, local, and Tribal governments, in the aggregate, or by the private sector of $100 million or more in any one year and it will not significantly or uniquely affect small governments. Therefore, no actions were deemed necessary under the provisions of the Unfunded Mandates Reform Act of 1995, Public Law 104–4, 109 Stat. 48.

G. Paperwork Reduction Act of 1995

This proposed rule would call for collections of information under the Paperwork Reduction Act of 1995 (44 U.S.C. 3501–20). As defined in 5 CFR 1320.3(c), ''collection of information'' comprises reporting, recordkeeping, monitoring, posting, labeling, and other similar actions. The title and description of the information collection, a description of those who must collect the information, and an estimate of the total annual burden follow. The estimate covers the time for reviewing instructions, searching existing sources of data, gathering and maintaining the data needed, and completing and reviewing the collection.

Under the provisions of this proposed rule, there would be a one-time increase in paperwork burdens of identification markings placed on firearms as well as additional transaction records. This requirement would be added to an existing approved collection covered by OMB control number 1140–0050 and 1140–0067.

Title: Identification Markings Placed on Firearms.

OMB Control Number: OMB 1140–0050.

Proposed Use of Information: The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms, and Explosives would use this information in fighting crime by facilitating the tracing of firearms used in criminal activities. The systematic tracking of firearms from the manufacturer or U.S. importer to the retail purchaser also enables law enforcement agencies to identify suspects involved in criminal violations, determine if a firearm is stolen, and provide other information relevant to a criminal investigation.

Description and Number of Respondents: Currently there are 12,252 licensed manufacturers of firearms and 1,343 licensed importers. Of the potential number of licensed dealers and licensed pawnbrokers, ATF estimates that those directly affected would be a one-time surge of 5,298 licensed dealers, 710 licensed pawnbrokers, and 36 non-licensed dealers that would be affected. This proposed rule would affect a one-time surge of 6,044 respondents.

Frequency of Response: There will be a recurring response for all currently existing 13,595 licensed manufactures and licensed importers. This proposed rule would affect a one-time number of responses of 12,088 responses (6,044 respondents * 2 responses).

Burden of Response: This includes recurring time burden of 1 minute. ATF anticipates a one-time hourly burden of 0.25 hours per respondent.

Estimate of Total Annual Burden: The current burden listed in this collection of information is 85,630 hours. The new burden, as a result of this proposed rulemaking, is a one-time hourly burden of 3,022 (6,044 respondents * 2 responses * 0.25 hourly burden per respondent).

Title: Licensed Firearms Manufactures Records of Production, Disposition, and Supporting Data.

OMB Control Number: OMB 1140–0067.

Proposed Use of Information: The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms, and Explosives would use this information for criminal investigation or regulatory compliance with the Gun Control Act of 1968. The Attorney General may inspect or examine the inventory and records of a licensed importer, licensed manufacturer, or licensed dealer, without such reasonable cause or warrant, and during the course of a criminal investigation of a person or persons other than the licensee in order to ensure compliance with the recordkeeping requirements of 18 U.S.C. 923(g)(1)(A) and (B). The Attorney General may also inspect or examine any records relating to firearms involved in a criminal investigation that is traced to the licensee, or firearms that may have been disposed of during the course of a bona fide criminal investigation.

Description and Number of Respondents: The current number of respondents is 9,056 firearm manufacturers, but this proposed rule would have a one-time surge for an unknown select few licensed manufacturers.

Frequency of Response: There will be a recurring response for all 9,056 licensed manufacturers, but only a one-time surge of 6,790 responses ((2,649 licensed dealer submissions + 710 license pawnbroker submissions + 36 non-licensed dealers) * 2 firearms or firearm kits) to licensed manufactures.

Burden of Response: This includes recurring time burden of 1.05 minutes. The burden resulting from this proposed rule is 0.25 hours per set of submittals by licensed dealers and licensed pawnbrokers to licensed manufacturers.

Estimate of Total Annual Burden: The current burden listed in this collection of information is 201,205 hours. The new burden, as a result of this proposed rulemaking, is 1,698 hours (6,790 responses * 0.25 hours).

As required by the Paperwork Reduction Act of 1995 (44 U.S.C. 3507(d)), a copy of this proposed rule will be submitted to OMB for its review of the collections of information.

We ask for public comment on the proposed collection of information to help us determine how useful the information is; whether it can help us perform our functions better; whether it is readily available elsewhere; how accurate our estimate of the burden of collection is; how valid our methods for determining burden are; how we can improve the quality, usefulness, and clarity of the information; and how we can minimize the burden of collection.

You need not respond to a collection of information unless it displays a currently valid control number from OMB. Before the requirements for this collection of information becomes effective, we will publish a notice in the Federal Register and request additional comments regarding the collection of information prior to OMB's decision to approve, modify, or disapprove the proposed collection.

IV. Public Participation

A. Comments Sought

ATF requests comments on the proposed rule from all interested persons. ATF specifically requests comments on the feasibility of implementing the new definition of firearm "frame or receiver" in 27 CFR 478.11 and 27 CFR 479.11, and related definitions and amendments that ensure the proper marking, recordkeeping, and traceability of all firearms manufactured, imported, acquired and disposed by Federal firearms licensees. ATF also requests comments on the costs or benefits of the proposed rule and on the appropriate methodology and data for calculating those costs and benefits.

All comments must reference this document's docket number ATF 2021R–05, be legible, and include the commenter's complete first and last name and full mailing address. ATF may not consider, or respond to, comments that do not meet these requirements or comments containing profanity. ATF will retain all comments as part of this rulemakings administrative record. ATF will treat all comments as originals and will not acknowledge receipt of comments. In addition, if ATF cannot read your comment due to technical difficulties and cannot contact you for clarification, ATF may not be able to consider your comment.

ATF will carefully consider all comments, as appropriate, received on or before the closing date, and will give comments after that date the same consideration if practical to do so, but assurance of consideration cannot be given except as to comments received on or before the closing date.

B. Confidentiality

ATF will make all comments meeting the requirements of this section, whether submitted electronically or on paper, available for public viewing at ATF and on the internet through the Federal eRulemaking Portal, and subject to the Freedom of Information Act (5 U.S.C. 552). Commenters who do not want their name or other personal identifying information posted on the internet should submit comments by mail or facsimile, along with a separate cover sheet containing their personal identifying information. Both the cover sheet and comment must reference this docket number (2021R–05). For comments submitted by mail or facsimile, information contained on the cover sheet will not appear when posted on the internet but any personal identifying information that appears within a comment will not be redacted by ATF and it will appear on the internet.

A commenter may submit to ATF information identified as proprietary or confidential business information. The commenter shall place any portion of a comment that is proprietary or confidential business information under law on pages separate from the balance of the comment with each page prominently marked "PROPRIETARY OR CONFIDENTIAL BUSINESS INFORMATION" at the top of the page.

ATF will not make proprietary or confidential business information submitted in compliance with these instructions available when disclosing the comments that it received, but will disclose that the commenter provided proprietary or confidential business information that ATF is holding in a separate file to which the public does not have access. If ATF receives a request to examine or copy this information, it will treat it as any other request under the Freedom of Information Act (5 U.S.C. 552). In addition, ATF will disclose such proprietary or confidential business information to the extent required by other legal process.

C. Submitting Comments

Submit comments in any of three ways (but do not submit the same comment multiple times or by more than one method). Hand-delivered comments will not be accepted.

- Federal eRulemaking Portal: ATF recommends that you submit your comments to ATF via the Federal eRulemaking portal at www.regulations.gov and follow the instructions. Comments will be posted within a few days of being submitted. However, if large volumes of comments are being processed simultaneously, your comment may not be viewable for up to several weeks. Please keep the comment tracking number that is provided after you have successfully uploaded your comment.

3. Be signed and contain the commenter's complete first and last name and full mailing address; and
4. Be no more than five pages long.

D. Request for Hearing

Any interested person who desires an opportunity to comment orally at a public hearing should submit his or her request, in writing, to the Director of ATF within the 90-day comment period. The Director, however, reserves the right to determine, in light of all circumstances, whether a public hearing is necessary.

The additions and revisions read as follows:

§ 478.11 Meaning of terms.

* * * * *

Complete muffler or silencer device. A firearm muffler or firearm silencer that contains all component parts necessary to function as designed whether or not assembled or operable.

Complete weapon. A firearm other than a firearm muffler or firearm silencer that contains all component parts necessary to function as designed whether or not assembled or operable.

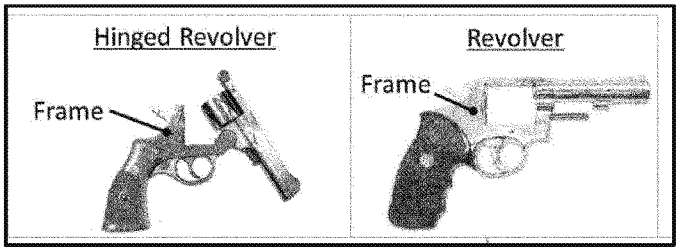
* * * * *

Engaged in the business— * * *

(d) Gunsmith. A person who, as a service performed on existing firearms not for sale or distribution by a licensee, devotes time, attention, and labor to repairing or customizing firearms, making or fitting special barrels, stocks, or trigger mechanisms to firearms, or identifying firearms in accordance with this chapter, as a regular course of trade or business with the principal objective of livelihood or profit, but such term shall not include a person who occasionally repairs or customizes firearms, or occasionally makes or fits special barrels, stocks, or trigger mechanisms to firearms;

* * * * *

Firearm. Any weapon, including a starter gun, which will or is designed to or may readily be converted to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive; the frame or receiver of any such weapon; any firearm muffler or firearm silencer; or any destructive device; but the term shall not include an antique firearm. In the case of a licensed collector, the term shall mean only curios and relics. The term shall include a weapon parts kit that is designed to or may readily be assembled, completed, converted, or restored to expel a projectile by the action of an explosive. The term shall not include a weapon, including a weapon parts kit, in which each part defined as a frame or receiver of such weapon is destroyed.



* * * * *

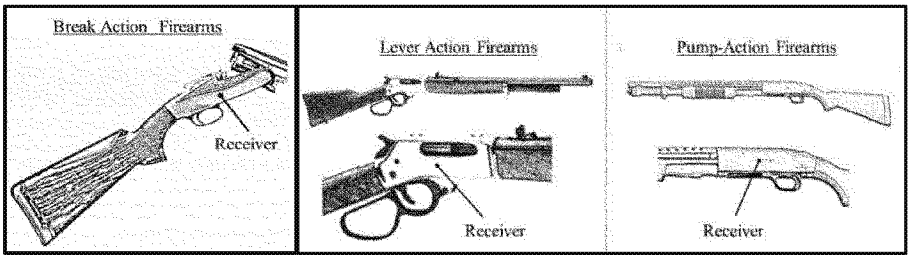
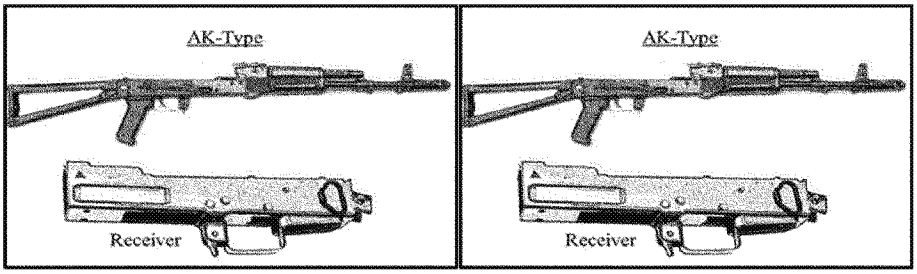
BILLING CODE 4410–FY–P

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT



Example 1 – Hinged or single framed revolver: The frame or receiver is the part of the revolver that provides a structure designed to hold the trigger, hammer, and cylinder.



Example 2 – Bolt action rifle: The frame or receiver is the part of the rifle that provides a structure designed to hold the bolt, firing pin, and trigger mechanism.

Example 3 – Break action, lever action, or pump action rifle or shotgun: The frame or receiver is the part of the rifle or shotgun that provides housing for the bolt and firing pin, or a structure designed to integrate the breechblock.

Example 4 - Semiautomatic firearm or machinegun with a single receiver housing all fire control components: The frame or receiver is the part of the firearm that provides housing for the hammer, bolt, trigger mechanism, and firing pin (e.g., AK-type firearms).

BILLING CODE 4410–FY–C

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

(a) Firearm muffler or silencer frame or receiver. The term ''frame or receiver'' shall mean, in the case of a firearm muffler or firearm silencer, a part of the firearm that, when the complete device is assembled, is visible from the exterior and provides housing or a structure, such as an outer tube or modular piece, designed to hold or integrate one or more essential internal components of the device, including any of the following: Baffles, baffling material, or expansion chamber.

(b) Split or modular frame or receiver. (1) In the case of a firearm with more than one part that provides housing or a structure designed to hold or integrate one or more fire control or essential internal components (e.g., a split frame with upper assembly and lower assembly as in many semiautomatic rifles, upper slide assembly and lower grip module as in many semiautomatic handguns, or multiple silencer modular pieces), the Director may determine whether a specific part or parts of a weapon is the frame or receiver, which may include an internal frame or chassis at least partially exposed to the exterior to allow identification. In making this determination, the Director will consider the following factors, with no single factor being controlling:

(i) Which component the manufacturer intended to be the frame or receiver;

(ii) Which component the firearms industry commonly considers to be the frame or receiver with respect to the same or similar firearms;

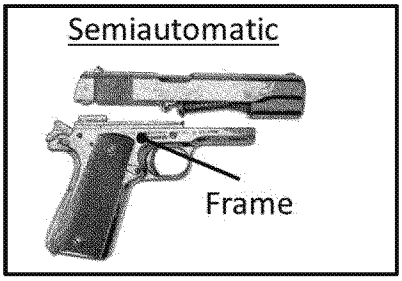
(iii) How the component fits within the overall design of the firearm when assembled;

(iv) The design and function of the fire control components to be housed or integrated;

(v) Whether the component may permanently, conspicuously, and legibly be identified with a serial number and other markings in a manner not susceptible of being readily obliterated, altered, or removed;

(vi) Whether classifying the particular component is consistent with the legislative intent of the Act and this part; and

(vii) Whether classifying the component as the frame or receiver is consistent with ATF's prior classifications.



(2) Frames or receivers of different weapons that are combined to create a similar weapon each retain their respective classifications as frames or receivers provided they retain their original design and configuration.

(3) The Director has previously determined that a specific part is the frame or receiver with respect to certain weapons with split or modular frames or receivers. The following is a nonexclusive list of such weapons and the specific part identified as the frame or receiver as they existed on [date of publication of the final rule]:

(i) Colt 1911-type, Beretta/Browning/FN Herstal/Heckler & Koch/Ruger/Sig Sauer/Smith & Wesson/Taurus hammer fired semiautomatic pistols: The lower portion of the pistol, or grip, that provides housing for the trigger mechanism and hammer, and a structure designed to integrate the slide rails.

(ii) Glock-type striker-fired semiautomatic pistols: the lower portion of the pistol, or grip, that provides housing for the trigger mechanism, and a structure designed to integrate the slide rails.

(iii) Sig Sauer P320-type semiautomatic pistols: the internal removable chassis of the pistol, partially exposed to the exterior to allow identification, that provides housing for the trigger mechanism, and a structure designed to integrate the slide rails.

(iv) Certain locking block rail system semiautomatic pistols: the internal removable frame of the pistol that provides housing for the trigger mechanism, and a structure designed to integrate the slide rails, provided a portion is partially exposed to the exterior to allow identification.

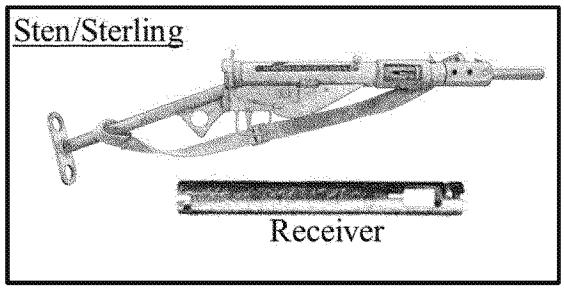
(v) AR-15-type, and Beretta AR-70-type firearms: the lower part of the weapon that provides housing for the trigger mechanism and hammer.

(vi) Steyr AUG-type firearms: the central part of the weapon that provides housing for the rods in the bolt carrier sub-assembly and a structure designed to attach the barrel.

(vii) Thompson M1A1-type machineguns and semiautomatic variants, and L1A1, FN FAL, FN FNC, MP38, MP 40, and SIG 550-type firearms, and HK-type machineguns and semiautomatic variants: the upper part of the weapon that provides housing for the bolt and firing pin.



AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

(viii) Vickers/Maxim, Browning 1919, and M2-type machineguns, and box-type machineguns and semiautomatic variants thereof: the side plate of the weapon that provides a structure designed to hold the charging handle.

(c) Partially complete, disassembled, or inoperable frame or receiver. The term ''frame or receiver'' shall include, in the case of a frame or receiver that is partially complete, disassembled, or inoperable, a frame or receiver that has reached a stage in manufacture where it may readily be completed, assembled, converted, or restored to a functional state. In determining whether a partially complete, disassembled, or inoperable frame or receiver may readily be assembled, completed, converted, or restored to a functional state, the Director may consider any available instructions, guides, templates, jigs, equipment, tools, or marketing materials. For purposes of this definition, the term ''partially complete,'' as it modifies ''frame or receiver,'' means a forging, casting, printing, extrusion, machined body or similar article that has reached a stage in manufacture where it is clearly identifiable as an unfinished component part of a weapon.

(d) Destroyed frame or receiver. The term ''frame or receiver'' shall not include a frame or receiver that is destroyed. For purposes of this definition, the term ''destroyed'' means that the frame or receiver has been permanently altered not to provide housing or a structure that may hold or integrate any fire control or essential internal component, and may not readily be assembled, completed, converted, or restored to a functional state. Acceptable methods of destruction include completely melting, crushing, or shredding the frame or receiver, or by completely severing at least three critical areas of the frame or receiver using a cutting torch having a tip of sufficient size to displace at least ¼ inch of material at each location.

Importer's or manufacturer's serial number. The identification number, licensee name, licensee city or state, or license number placed by a licensee on a firearm frame or receiver in accordance with this part. The term shall include any such identification on a privately made firearm, or an ATF issued serial number. When used in this part, the term ''serial number'' shall mean the ''importer's or manufacturer's serial number.''

placed by a licensed manufacturer at the time the firearm was produced. The term shall not include a firearm identified and registered in the National Firearms Registration and Transfer Record pursuant to chapter 53, title 26, United States Code, or any firearm made before October 22, 1968 (unless remanufactured after that date).

■ 6. In § 478.50(a), add the phrase "or as otherwise provided in § 478.129" after "at the licensed premises served by such warehouse".

■ 7. Revise § 478.92 to read as follows:

§ 478.92 Identification of firearms and armor piercing ammunition.

(a)(1) Firearms manufactured or imported by licensees. Licensed manufacturers and licensed importers of firearms must legibly identify each firearm they manufacture or import as follows:

(i) Serial number, name, place of business. By engraving, casting, stamping (impressing), or otherwise conspicuously placing or causing to be engraved, cast, stamped (impressed) or otherwise placed on each part (or specific part(s) previously determined by the Director) defined as a frame or receiver thereof, a serial number, in a manner not susceptible of being readily obliterated, altered, or removed. The serial number identified on each part of a weapon defined as a frame or receiver must be the same number, but must not duplicate any serial number(s) placed by the licensee on any other firearm. Except as provided in paragraph (a)(4)(v) of this section, each frame or receiver thereof must also be marked with either: Their name (or recognized abbreviation), and city and State (or recognized abbreviation) where they maintain their place of business; or their name (or recognized abbreviation) and abbreviated Federal firearms license number as a prefix, which is the first three and last five digits, followed by a hyphen, and then followed by a number as a suffix, e.g., "12345678–[number]"; and

(ii) Model, caliber or gauge, foreign manufacturer, country of manufacture. By engraving, casting, stamping (impressing), or otherwise conspicuously placing or causing to be engraved, cast, stamped (impressed) or placed on each part (or specific part(s) previously determined by the Director) defined as a frame or receiver, or barrel or pistol slide (if applicable) thereof certain additional information. This information must be placed in a manner not susceptible of being readily obliterated, altered, or removed. Except as provided in paragraph (a)(4)(v) of this section, the additional information shall include:

(A) The model, if such designation has been made;

(B) The caliber or gauge;

(C) When applicable, the name of the foreign manufacturer; and

(D) In the case of an imported firearm, the name of the country in which it was manufactured. For additional requirements relating to imported firearms, see Customs regulations at 19 CFR part 134.

(iii) Frame or receiver, machinegun conversion part, or muffler or silencer part disposed of separately. Except as provided in paragraph (a)(4)(iv) of this section, each part defined as a frame or receiver, machinegun, or firearm muffler or firearm silencer that is not a component part of a complete weapon or device at the time it is sold, shipped, or otherwise disposed of by the licensee must be identified as required by this section with a serial number not duplicated on any other firearm and all additional identifying information, except that the model designation and caliber or gauge may be omitted if that information is unknown at the time the part is identified.

(iv) Size and depth of markings. The engraving, casting, or stamping (impressing) of the serial number and additional information must be to a minimum depth of .003 inch and in a print size no smaller than 1/16 inch. The size of serial numbers required by this section is measured as the distance between the latitudinal ends of the character impression bottoms (bases). The depth of all markings required by this section is measured from the flat surface of the metal and not the peaks or ridges.

(v) Period of time to identify firearms. Licensed manufacturers must identify a complete weapon or complete muffler or silencer device no later than seven days following the date of completion of the active manufacturing process for the weapon or device, or prior to disposition, whichever is sooner. Except as provided in paragraph (a)(4)(iv) of this section, licensed manufacturers must identify each part, including a replacement part, defined as a frame or receiver, machinegun, or firearm muffler or firearm silencer that is not a component part of a complete weapon or device at the time it is sold, shipped, or otherwise disposed of no later than seven days following the date of completion of the active manufacturing process for the part, or prior to disposition, whichever is sooner. For purposes of this paragraph, firearms actively awaiting materials, parts, or equipment repair to be completed are actively in the manufacturing process. Licensed importers must identify imported firearms within the period prescribed in § 478.112.

(2) Privately made firearms. Unless previously identified by another licensee in accordance with this section, and except as provided in paragraph (a)(4)(vi) of this section, licensees must legibly and conspicuously identify each privately made firearm within seven days following the date of receipt or other acquisition (including from a personal collection), or before the date of disposition (including to a personal collection), whichever is sooner. PMFs must be identified by placing on each part (or specific part(s) previously determined by the Director) of a weapon defined as a frame or receiver, the same serial number, but must not duplicate any serial number(s) placed by the licensee on any other firearm. The serial number(s) must begin with the licensee's abbreviated Federal firearms license number as a prefix, which is the first three and last five digits, followed by a hyphen, and then followed by a number as a suffix, e.g., "12345678–[number]". The serial number(s) must be placed in a manner otherwise in accordance with this section, including the requirements that the serial number(s) be at the minimum size and depth, and not susceptible of being readily obliterated, altered, or removed.

(3) Meaning of marking terms. For purposes of this section, the terms "legible" and "legibly" mean that the identification markings use exclusively

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Roman letters (e.g., A, a, B, b, C, c) and Arabic numerals (e.g., 1, 2, 3), or solely Arabic numerals, and may include a hyphen, and the terms ''conspicuous'' and ''conspicuously'' mean that the identification markings are capable of being easily seen with normal handling of the firearm and unobstructed by other markings when the complete weapon is assembled.

(4) Exceptions—(i) Alternate means or period of identification. The Director may authorize other means of identification or period of time to identify firearms upon receipt of a letter application or Form 3311.4 from the licensee showing that such other identification or period is reasonable and will not hinder the effective administration of this part.

(ii) Destructive devices. In the case of a destructive device, the Director may authorize other means of identification or period of time to identify that weapon upon receipt of a letter application or Form 3311.4 from the licensee. The application shall show that engraving, casting, or stamping (impressing) such a weapon as required by this section would be dangerous or impracticable, or that the requested period is reasonable and will not hinder the effective administration of this part.

(iii) Adoption of identifying markings. Licensed manufacturers and licensed importers may adopt the serial number(s) or other identifying markings previously placed on a firearm in accordance with this section provided that, within the period and in the manner herein prescribed, the licensee legibly and conspicuously places, or causes to be placed, on each part (or specific part(s) previously determined by the Director) defined as a frame or receiver either: Their name (or recognized abbreviation), and city and State (or recognized abbreviation) where they maintain their place of business; or their name (or recognized abbreviation) and abbreviated Federal firearms license number, which is the first three and last five digits, followed by a hyphen, and then followed by the existing serial number (including any other abbreviated FFL prefix) as a suffix, e.g., ''12345678–[serial number]''.

(iv) Firearm muffler or silencer parts—(A) Firearm muffler or silencer parts transferred between qualified manufacturers to complete new devices. A licensed manufacturer qualified under part 479 may transfer a part defined as a firearm muffler or firearm silencer to another qualified manufacturer without immediately identifying or registering such part provided that, upon receipt, it is actively used to manufacture a complete muffler or silencer device. Once the new device with such part is completed, the manufacturer of the device shall identify and register it in the manner and within the period specified in this part for a complete muffler or silencer device.

(B) Firearm muffler or silencer replacement parts transferred to qualified manufacturers or dealers to repair existing devices. A licensed manufacturer qualified under part 479 may transfer a replacement part defined as a firearm muffler or firearm silencer other than a frame or receiver to a qualified manufacturer or dealer without identifying or registering such part provided that, upon receipt, it is actively used to repair a complete muffler or silencer device that was previously identified and registered in accordance with this part.

(v) Firearms designed and configured before [EFFECTIVE DATE OF THE FINAL RULE]. Licensed manufacturers and licensed importers may continue to identify firearms (other than PMFs) of the same design and configuration as they existed before [EFFECTIVE DATE OF THE FINAL RULE] with the information required to be marked by paragraphs (a)(1)(i) and (ii) of this section that were in effect prior to that date, and any rules necessary to ensure such identification shall remain effective for that purpose.

(vi) Privately made firearms acquired before [EFFECTIVE DATE OF THE FINAL RULE]. Licensees shall identify in the manner prescribed by this section, or cause another licensee to so identify, each privately made firearm received or otherwise acquired (including from a personal collection) by the licensee before [EFFECTIVE DATE OF THE FINAL RULE] within sixty (60) days from that date, or prior to the date of final disposition (including to a personal collection), whichever is sooner.

(b) Armor piercing ammunition. (1) Marking of ammunition. Each licensed manufacturer or licensed importer of armor piercing ammunition shall identify such ammunition by means of painting, staining or dying the exterior of the projectile with an opaque black coloring. This coloring must completely cover the point of the projectile and at least 50 percent of that portion of the projectile which is visible when the projectile is loaded into a cartridge case.

(2) Labeling of packages. Each licensed manufacturer or licensed importer of armor piercing ammunition shall clearly and conspicuously label each package in which armor piercing ammunition is contained, e.g., each box, carton, case, or other container. The label shall include the words ''ARMOR PIERCING'' in block letters at least ¼ inch in height. The lettering shall be located on the exterior surface of the package which contains information concerning the caliber or gauge of the ammunition. There shall also be placed on the same surface of the package in block lettering at least ⅛ inch in height the words ''FOR GOVERNMENTAL ENTITIES OR EXPORTATION ONLY.'' The statements required by this subparagraph shall be on a contrasting background.

(c) Voluntary classification of firearms and armor piercing ammunition. The Director may issue a determination to a person whether an item is a firearm or armor piercing ammunition as defined in this part upon receipt of a written request or form prescribed by the Director. Each such voluntary request or form submitted shall be executed under the penalties of perjury with a complete and accurate description of the item, the name and address of the manufacturer or importer thereof, and a sample of such item for examination along with any instructions, guides, templates, jigs, equipment, tools, or marketing materials that are made available to the purchaser or recipient of the item. The Director shall not issue a determination regarding a firearm accessory or attachment unless it is installed on the firearm(s) in the configuration for which it is designed and intended to be used. Upon completion of the examination, the Director may return the sample to the person who made the request unless a determination is made that return of the sample would be or place the person in violation of law. A determination made by the Director under this paragraph shall not be deemed by any person to be applicable to or authoritative with respect to any other sample, design, model, or configuration.

■ 23. Revise § 479.102 to read as follows:

§ 479.102 Identification of firearms.

(a) Identification required. You, as a manufacturer, importer, or maker of a firearm, must legibly identify the firearm as follows:

(1) Serial number, name, place of business. By engraving, casting, stamping (impressing), or otherwise conspicuously placing or causing to be engraved, cast, stamped (impressed) or otherwise placed on each part (or specific part(s) previously determined by the Director) defined as a frame or receiver thereof, a serial number, in a manner not susceptible of being readily obliterated, altered, or removed. The serial number identified on each part of a weapon, including a weapon parts kit, defined as a frame or receiver must be the same number, but must not duplicate any serial number(s) placed by the licensee or maker on any other firearm. Except as provided in paragraph (b)(5) of this section, each frame or receiver thereof must also be marked with either: Your name (or recognized abbreviation), and city and State (or recognized abbreviation) where you as a manufacturer or importer maintain your place of business, or in the case of a maker, where you made the

firearm; or if a licensee, your name (or recognized abbreviation) and abbreviated Federal firearms license number as a prefix, which is the first three and last five digits, followed by a hyphen, and then followed by a number as a suffix, e.g., ''12345678–[number]''; and

(2) Model, caliber or gauge, foreign manufacturer, country of manufacture. By engraving, casting, stamping (impressing), or otherwise conspicuously placing or causing to be engraved, cast, stamped (impressed) or placed on each part (or specific part(s) previously determined by the Director) defined as a frame or receiver, or barrel or pistol slide (if applicable) thereof certain additional information. This information must be placed in a manner not susceptible of being readily obliterated, altered, or removed. Except as provided in paragraph (b)(5) of this section, the additional information shall include:

(i) The model, if such designation has been made;

(ii) The caliber or gauge;

(iii) When applicable, the name of the foreign manufacturer or maker; and

(iv) In the case of an imported firearm, the name of the country in which it was manufactured. For additional requirements relating to imported firearms, see Customs regulations at 19 CFR part 134.

(3) Frame or receiver, machine gun conversion part, or silencer part disposed of separately. Except as provided in paragraph (b)(4) of this section, each part defined as a frame or receiver, machine gun, or firearm muffler or firearm silencer, that is not a component part of a complete weapon or device at the time it is sold, shipped, or otherwise disposed of by you must be identified as required by this section with a serial number not duplicated on any other firearm and all additional identifying information, except that the model designation and caliber or gauge may be omitted if that information is unknown at the time the part is identified.

(4) Size and depth of markings. The engraving, casting, or stamping (impressing) of the serial number and additional information must be to a minimum depth of .003 inch and in a print size no smaller than 1/16 inch. The size of serial numbers required by this section is measured as the distance between the latitudinal ends of the character impression bottoms (bases). The depth of all markings required by this section is measured from the flat surface of the metal and not the peaks or ridges.

(5) Period of time to identify firearms. You must identify a complete weapon or complete muffler or silencer device no later than seven days following the date of completion of the active manufacturing process for the weapon or device, or prior to disposition, whichever is sooner. Except as provided in paragraph (b)(4) of this section, you must identify each part, including a replacement part, defined as a frame or receiver, machine gun, or firearm muffler or firearm silencer, that is not a component part of a complete weapon or device at the time it is sold, shipped, or otherwise disposed of no later than seven days following the date of completion of the active manufacturing process for the part, or prior to disposition, whichever is sooner. For purposes of this paragraph, firearms actively awaiting materials, parts, or equipment repair to be completed are actively in the manufacturing process. Licensed importers must identify imported firearms within the period prescribed in § 478.112.

(6) Meaning of marking terms. For purposes of this section, the terms ''legible'' and ''legibly'' mean that the identification markings use exclusively Roman letters (e.g., A, a, B, b, C, c) and Arabic numerals (e.g., 1, 2, 3), or solely Arabic numerals, and may include a hyphen, and the terms ''conspicuous'' and ''conspicuously'' mean that the identification markings are capable of being easily seen with normal handling of the firearm and unobstructed by other markings when the complete weapon is assembled.

(b) Exceptions—(1) Alternate means or period of identification. The Director may authorize other means of identification or period of time to identify firearms upon receipt of a letter application or Form 3311.4 from you showing that such other identification or period is reasonable and will not hinder the effective administration of this part.

(2) Destructive devices. In the case of a destructive device, the Director may authorize other means of identification or period of time to identify that weapon upon receipt of a letter application or Form 3311.4 from you. The application shall show that engraving, casting, or stamping (impressing) such a weapon as required by this section would be dangerous or impracticable, or that the requested time period is reasonable and will not hinder the effective administration.

(3) Adoption of identifying markings. Licensed manufacturers and licensed importers may adopt the serial number(s) or other identifying markings previously placed on a firearm in accordance with this section provided that, within the period and in the manner herein prescribed, the licensee legibly and conspicuously places, or causes to be placed, on each part (or specific part(s) previously determined by the Director) defined as a frame or receiver either: Their name (or recognized abbreviation), and city and State (or recognized abbreviation) where they maintain their place of business; or their name (or recognized abbreviation) and their abbreviated Federal firearms license number, which is the first three and last five digits, followed by a hyphen, and then followed by the existing serial number (including any other abbreviated FFL prefix) as a suffix, e.g., ''12345678–[serial number]''.

(4) Firearm muffler or silencer parts—(i) Firearm muffler or silencer parts transferred between qualified manufacturers to complete new devices. A licensed manufacturer qualified under this part may transfer a part defined as a muffler or silencer to another qualified manufacturer without immediately identifying or registering such part provided that, upon receipt, it is actively used to manufacture a new complete muffler or silencer device. Once the new device with such part is completed, the manufacturer of the device shall identify and register it in the manner and within the period specified in this part for a complete muffler or silencer device.

(ii) Firearm muffler or silencer replacement parts transferred to qualified manufacturers or dealers to repair existing devices. A licensed manufacturer qualified under this part may transfer a replacement part defined as a muffler or silencer other than a frame or receiver to a qualified manufacturer or dealer without identifying or registering such part provided that, upon receipt, it is actively used to repair a complete muffler or silencer device that was previously identified and registered in accordance with this part.

(5) Firearms designed and configured before [EFFECTIVE DATE OF THE FINAL RULE]. Licensed manufacturers and licensed importers may continue to identify firearms of the same design and configuration as they existed before [EFFECTIVE DATE OF THE FINAL RULE] with the information required to be marked by paragraphs (a)(1) and (2) of this section that were in effect prior to that date, and any rules necessary to ensure such identification shall remain effective for that purpose.

(c) Voluntary classification of firearms. The Director may issue a determination to a person whether an item is a firearm as defined in this part upon receipt of a written request or form prescribed by the Director. Each such voluntary request or form submitted shall be executed under the penalties of perjury with a complete and accurate description of the item, the name and address of the manufacturer or importer thereof, and a sample of such item for examination along with any instructions, guides, templates, jigs, equipment, tools, or marketing materials that are made available to the purchaser or recipient of the item. The Director shall not issue a determination regarding a firearm accessory or attachment unless it is installed on the firearm(s) in the configuration for which it is designed and intended to be used. Upon completion of the examination, the Director may return the sample to the person who made the request unless a determination is made that return of the sample would be or place the person in violation of law. A determination made by the Director under this paragraph shall not be deemed by any person to be applicable to or authoritative with respect to any other sample, design, model, or configuration.

■ 24. In § 479.103, at the end of the third sentence, add ", except as provided in § 479.102(b)(4)."

§ 479.112 [Amended]

■ 25. In § 479.112(a), second sentence, remove the words "serial number" and add in their place the words "serial number(s)".

§ 479.141 [Amended]

■ 26. In § 479.141, remove the word "manufacturer" and add in its place "manufacturer(s)" and remove the words "serial number" and add in their place "serial number(s)".

INTRODUCTION

This Court should stay, pending completion of appellate proceedings, the district court's extraordinary injunction. That injunction requires the Department of Homeland Security (DHS)—within seven days—to re-implement the Migrant Protection Protocols (MPP), a former government program through which the Secretary of Homeland Security exercised her discretionary statutory authority to return certain noncitizens arriving at the southern border to Mexico pending removal proceedings. Because the injunction takes effect at 12:01 a.m. on Saturday, August 21, 2021, the government respectfully requests an administrative stay by Thursday, August 19, so that this Court can consider the stay motion in an orderly manner. The government also respectfully requests, if this Court is inclined to deny the stay or deny the administrative stay, that the Court enter an administrative stay of no fewer than seven days to give the government an opportunity to seek emergency relief from the Supreme Court.

A stay is warranted because the district court's legal and factual conclusions are deeply flawed, and its injunctive remedy is legally improper, profoundly disruptive to foreign policy, and virtually impossible to implement on the required timeline. In January 2019, DHS instituted MPP with policy guidance implementing statutory authority in 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C), providing that the Secretary "may return" certain noncitizens "arriving on land ... from a foreign territory contiguous to the United States" "to that territory" pending resolution of their removal proceedings. (emphasis added). Following the change in administration, the acting Secretary temporarily suspended new enrollments in MPP. Following a comprehensive review, on June 1, 2021, the Secretary terminated MPP, finding it unjustified by the resources it required and incompatible with the administration's broader strategy and foreign policy objectives at the time. AR1-7.

Despite the Executive's clear authority to determine immigration policy and § 1225's express commitment of the decision whether to return noncitizens to Mexico to the Secretary's discretion, on August 13, 2021, the district court vacated the Secretary's decision. The court also issued a nationwide, permanent injunction requiring DHS "to enforce and implement MPP in good faith until such a time as it has been lawfully rescinded in compliance with the APA and until such a time as the federal government has sufficient detention capacity to detain all aliens subject to mandatory detention under Section [1225] without releasing any aliens because of a lack of detention resources." Op. 52. That injunction is set to take effect at 12:01 a.m. on Saturday, August 21. Id. at 53; see Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(a)(1).

The district court's order is wrong in multiple respects. Section 1225(b)(2)(C) is discretionary: the Secretary may—not must—return noncitizens to Mexico or Canada. Contrary to the district court's conclusion, nothing in the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA) dictates how that discretion must be exercised, let alone suggests that it must be exercised if DHS cannot detain every noncitizen arriving at the border who is placed in removal proceedings. The district court's contrary conclusion would mean that until MPP was created in 2019, every Administration had been in continuous and systematic violation of the INA since the relevant provisions were enacted in 1996. The district court also erred by finding that the Secretary's decision violated the Administrative Procedure Act (APA). The Secretary issued a thorough, seven-page memo—based on a 691-page administrative record—that reviewed MPP's "mixed effectiveness" and acknowledged the competing policy considerations. The Secretary then forthrightly grounded his decision in a policy choice to devote DHS's scarce resources to pursuing measures that he judged to be more effective and consistent with this Administration's priorities in managing the challenges of regional migration. In finding that comprehensive explanation insufficient, the district court contravened settled APA precedent holding that, when the government changes policy, "it suffices that the new policy is permissible under the statute, that there are good reasons for it, and that the agency believes it to be better," F.C.C. v. Fox Television Stations, Inc., 556 U.S. 502, 515 (2009).

A stay is urgently need because the injunction will impose immediate, substantial harms on the United States by causing operational chaos at the international border. It will also severely interfere in foreign affairs by effectively dictating foreign policy with respect to Mexico and Central American nations. This Court should grant an immediate administrative stay while it receives briefing and considers this stay request, and then stay the district court's injunction pending appellate proceedings. Appellate courts confronting similar injunctive orders have recognized that a stay pending appellate proceedings is warranted. See Wolf v. Innovation Law Lab, 140 S. Ct. 1564 (2020); Innovation Law Lab v. McAleenan, 924 F.3d 503, 510 (9th Cir. 2019).

BACKGROUND

Legal Background. The Executive Branch has broad constitutional and statutory power over the administration and enforcement of the nation's immigration laws. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U.S. 537, 543 (1950); see, e.g., 6 U.S.C. § 202(5); 8 U.S.C. § 1103(a)(3). For decades, the Executive has exercised that authority through prosecutorial discretion to prioritize which noncitizens to remove and through what type of proceedings. See Matter of E-R-M- & L-R-M-, 25 I.&N. Dec. 520, 523 (BIA 2011).

First, Congress has authorized DHS to initiate expedited removal proceedings in 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(1) against certain applicants for admission who lack valid entry documents.[1] Alternatively, the Secretary may place a noncitizen seeking admission into full removal proceedings held before an immigration judge with potential appeal to the Board of Immigration Appeals, § 1229a, if that noncitizen is not "clearly and beyond a doubt entitled to be admitted." Id. § 1225(b)(2)(A). The statute leaves to DHS's discretion whether to seek expedited or full removal against noncitizens. E-R-M-, 25 I.&N. Dec. at 523. When DHS places noncitizens into proceedings under § 1229a, Congress has provided that, if the noncitizen is "arriving on land (whether or not at a designated port of arrival) from a foreign territory contiguous to the United States," the Secretary "may return the alien to that territory pending a proceeding under section 1229a." Id. § 1225(b)(2)(C). The statute also authorizes DHS, within certain limits, to choose between detaining applicants for admission pending their removal proceedings and releasing them pending those proceedings. Id. §§ 1182(d)(5), 1225(b)(2)(A), 1226(a).

[1] References to the Attorney General in § 1225 now mean the Secretary. 6 U.S.C. §§ 251, 552(d).

Migrant Protection Protocols. On January 25, 2019, then-Secretary Nielsen instituted MPP, authorizing immigration officers to "exercise[e] [their] prosecutorial discretion regarding whether" to return to Mexico certain classes of noncitizens arriving from Mexico, and providing guidance for making that determination. See Administrative Record (AR) 151. Implementing MPP required the assistance of Mexico, which took a variety of steps to assist the United States and the individuals who were returned under the program. AR152-53. In April, 2020, however, immigration proceedings were suspended in light of the COVID-19 pandemic

(including for noncitizens waiting in Mexico under MPP), and DHS's use of MPP dramatically decreased as many noncitizens encountered at the border were instead expelled under 42 U.S.C. §§ 265, 268 based on an order from the CDC. AR3, 6.

On January 21, 2021, the acting Secretary "suspend[ed] new enrollments in [MPP], pending further review of the program." AR581. President Biden subsequently directed DHS "to promptly review and determine whether to terminate or modify [MPP]." Executive Order 14010, 86 Fed. Reg. 8267 (Feb 2, 2021). And on June 1, 2021, the Secretary announced that he was terminating MPP and explained his decision in a lengthy memorandum. AR1-7.

This Lawsuit. On April 13, 2021, the States of Missouri and Texas filed this suit in the Northern District of Texas, seeking injunctive relief. On August 13, following a one-day bench trial, the district court issued a nationwide injunction requiring DHS "to enforce and implement MPP." Op. 52, Dkt. 94 (Ex. A). The court concluded that the case is justiciable (Op. 21-34); that § 1225(b)(2)(C) mandates returning noncitizens to Mexico whenever DHS lacks the resources to detain them (Op. 32, 41-44); that the Secretary's decision terminating MPP violated the APA (Op. 31-42); and that a nationwide injunction with monthly reporting requirements, rather than remand without vacatur, was appropriate (Op. 45-52). The court delayed the effective date of its ruling to August 21, 2021. Op. 53. The government promptly appealed, and the district court subsequently denied the government's request for a stay pending appeal. ECF 100.

ARGUMENT

An immediate stay pending appeal is warranted. The government is likely to prevail and will be severely and irreparably harmed without a stay; a stay will not substantially harm Plaintiffs; and the public interest supports a stay. See Nken v. Holder, 556 U.S. 418, 425-26 (2009). The Court should also grant an administrative stay while it considers this request. At an absolute minimum, the Court should grant an administrative stay to give the government an opportunity to seek emergency relief from the Supreme Court.

I. Defendants are likely to succeed on appeal.

A. MPP's termination is not reviewable

The district court erred in holding the Secretary's decision is reviewable. Op. 26-34.

At the outset, the States lack standing to pursue their claims. The district court held that the States are suffering cognizable injuries from the termination of MPP, Op. 49, primarily based on speculation about an increase in "the number of aliens released and paroled" who will seek driver's licenses. Id. at 22. But there is no evidence below that either State has issued a single driver's license to any individual who would have been subject to MPP but for its termination, nor did the States substantiate any other costs directly traceable to MPP's termination. Cf. Texas v. U.S., 809 F.3d 134, 155, 160 (5th Cir. 2015) (driver's license theory of standing requires evidence that the States had "to hire employees, purchase equipment, and obtain office space"). Moreover, the alleged harm is not redressable because MPP did not require that anyone be returned, nor could anyone be returned pursuant to MPP without Mexico's agreement. See Lin v. United States, 690 F. App'x 7, 9 (D.C. Cir. 2017) (redressability cannot be shown where relief requires action by "foreign nations not before the court") (collecting cases).

Even if the States had standing, the agency decision is unreviewable. The APA precludes review of certain categories of decisions traditionally regarded as "committed to agency discretion," Lincoln v. Vigil, 508 U.S. 182, 191 (1993)); 5 U.S.C. § 701(a)(2), and the INA similarly prohibits review of any "decision or action" of the Secretary "the authority for which is specified under this subchapter to be in [his] discretion," 8 U.S.C. § 1252(a)(2)(B)(ii). Both of those provisions separately shield from review the Secretary's decision whether to use the contiguous-territory-return authority, which is entirely discretionary: the Secretary "may return" certain noncitizens to a contiguous territory. 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C) (emphasis added). Congress's use of the term "may" "connotes discretion." Jama v. ICE, 543 U.S. 335, 346 (2005). "[T]he statutory scheme … provides absolutely no guidance as to how that discretion is to be exercised." Texas v. United States, 809

F.3d 164, 168 (5th Cir. 2015). Even the district court acknowledged it could not dictate to the Secretary whether to return an individual noncitizen. Op. 51. And for the same reason, the court cannot dictate that the Secretary must "authorize line-level officers to [return noncitizens to Mexico]." Contra id.

In addition, whether to use § 1225(b)(2)(C)'s "return" authority in an individual case or class of cases represents an exercise of enforcement discretion, because it involves a "complicated balancing" of factors "peculiarly within [the Executive's] expertise," such as how to best expend limited "agency resources" and whether a "particular enforcement action … fits the agency's overall policies." Heckler v. Chaney, 470 U.S. 821, 831 (1985). The concerns justifying prosecutorial discretion are "greatly magnified in the [immigration] context," Crane v. Johnson, 783 F.3d 244, 247 (5th Cir. 2015), which implicates the "dynamic nature of relations with other countries" and the need for enforcement policies to be "consistent with this Nation's foreign policy," Arizona v. United States, 567 U.S. 387, 397 (2012). Here, the Secretary weighed these concerns and determined that other strategies would be more effective and better align with foreign policy goals, AR1-7, and it was improper for the district court to displace his judgment.

The district court concluded that "the decision to terminate MPP 'is more than a non-enforcement policy.'" Op. 31 (quoting DHS v. Regents of the Univ. of California, 140 S. Ct. 1891, 1905 (2020)). But decisions on how and where to secure

noncitizens during removal proceedings, and whether to detain them at all, are quintessential enforcement decisions inextricably intertwined with the decision to pursue removal. Gupta v. McGahey, 709 F.3d 1062, 1065 (11th Cir. 2013). And unlike the DACA program at issue in Regents, the Secretary's decision not to subject applicants for admission to contiguous-territory return does not itself confer any affirmative legal benefits or status.

The district court also erred in concluding that § 1225(b) provides a standard that the court could apply. Op. 32. In the court's view, because § 1225(b)(2)(A) references detention of noncitizens placed in § 1229a proceedings, "DHS must use its authority to return aliens to Mexico when an influx of aliens exceeds DHS's detention capacity." Op. 32. But that understanding of the statute is patently incorrect, as explained below. Infra p. 12.

Finally, the decision to terminate MPP is not a reviewable final agency action, 5 U.S.C. § 704, because it does not determine "rights or obligations" or produce "legal consequences." Bennett v. Spear, 520 U.S. 154, 178 (1997). The June 2021 memorandum ending MPP, like the January 2019 memorandum establishing "MPP[,] qualifies as a general statement of policy." Innovation Law Lab v. McAleenan, 924 F.3d 503, 509 (9th Cir. 2019). A "general statement of policy … is not a 'final agency action,' rendering it unreviewable," Cohen v. United States, 578 F.3d 1, 6 (D.C. Cir. 2009), opinion vacated in part on other grounds, 650 F.3d 717

(D.C. Cir. 2011) (en banc), unless and until it is applied "in a particular situation" to a regulated entity. Nat'l Min. Ass'n v. McCarthy, 758 F.3d 243, 253 (D.C. Cir. 2014) (Kavanaugh, J.); Texas v. Equal Emp. Opportunity Comm'n, 933 F.3d 433, 441 (5th Cir. 2019) (similar).

B. Terminating MPP does not violate § 1225.

The district court acknowledged that "DHS does not have to use [the return] authority." Op. 32. The court nevertheless held that terminating MPP violated § 1225, which provides that certain noncitizens "shall be detained" for removal proceedings. 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(A). In the court's view, "where Defendants cannot meet their detention obligations" due to "resource constraints," Op. 44, § 1225(b) "directs DHS ... to return certain aliens to Mexico," Op. 32, so "terminating MPP necessarily leads to the systemic violation of Section 1225 as aliens are released into the United States because Defendants are unable to detain them." Op. 44. That conclusion misconceives the statutory scheme and would upend decades of practice spanning multiple administrations.

To start, the operative complaint challenges the June 1 memorandum, not any policies governing release from detention. See ECF 48 ¶¶ 95-141. Even if the court were right that § 1225 mandated detention, nothing in the statute suggests a direct relationship between that purported detention mandate and the return authority, such that the Secretary is required to return any noncitizen he fails to detain. The return

authority is explicitly discretionary. Supra p. 8. Accordingly, a violation of any detention mandate would be just that—a violation of the detention mandate. Plaintiffs cannot bootstrap their objections to DHS's alleged detention practices into a basis for invalidating the Secretary's separate decision whether to continue using his contiguous-territory-return authority.[2]

In any event, § 1225 does not mandate universal detention. The INA provides DHS with various options for processing noncitizens beyond discretionary returns or detention. DHS "may ... in [its] discretion" release a noncitizen placed in § 1229a proceedings through "parole" "for urgent humanitarian reasons or significant public benefit." 8 U.S.C. § 1182(d)(5)(A) (emphasis added); see 8 C.F.R. §§ 1.2, 235.3(c). And in certain circumstances, "pending a decision on whether the alien is to be removed" and "[e]xcept as provided in [§ 1226(c)]," noncitizens present in the United States may be released on "bond" or "conditional parole," § 1226(a)(2)(A)-(B).

Subject to specific legal constraints, Congress entrusted the decision whether to detain, release, or return a particular noncitizen to the Secretary's discretion by using discretionary language and barring judicial review. 8 U.S.C. § 1182(d)(5)(A)

[2] Given Plaintiffs' claims, the administrative record did not contain evidence concerning release practices and policies. The court independently abused its discretion by relying on "evidence outside the administrative record." Lousiana ex rel. Guste v. Verity, 853 F.2d 322, 327 n.8 (5th Cir. 1988).

(Secretary "may … in his discretion parole") ; id., § 1225(b)(2)(C) ("may return"); Loa-Herrera v. Trominski, 231 F.3d 984, 991 & n.12 (5th Cir. 2000) ("[Secretary's] discretionary judgment regarding the application of [§ 1226]—including the manner in which that discretionary judgment is exercised, and whether the procedural apparatus supplied satisfies regulatory, statutory, and constitutional constraints—is not ... subject to review.") (citing 8 U.S.C. § 1226(e))). The district court's core legal analysis is thus categorically mistaken: the statute does not impose on DHS a binary choice between detention or return to Mexico for noncitizens arriving from Mexico.[3]

Further proof of the error in the district court's detain-or-return reasoning is found in the history of the return provision, and the absurd results that would follow from the court's view. Congress enacted § 1225(b)(2)(C) in 1996, to codify statutory authority for ad hoc returns that the Board had found lacking. In re M-D-C-V-, 28 I.&N. Dec. 18, 25-26 & n.10 (B.I.A. 2020). But MPP—and its broad use of return authority—came into existence only in 2019. AR151. By the district court's logic, Op. 32, every presidential administration for the last 25 years has been systematically violating § 1225 by paroling or otherwise releasing millions of inadmissible applicants for admission rather than returning them to Mexico. And

[3] The Court's characterization of contiguous return as an alternative to detention under § 1225(b)(1), Op. 32, 41-43, is particularly misguided, as noncitizens in ongoing expedited removal proceedings are not eligible for contiguous return, § 1225(b)(2)(B)(ii).

under the injunction, all future administrations will be required to return all eligible noncitizens arriving from Mexico until the government can detain every applicant for admission—a condition that has never existed. Nothing in the INA remotely supports that extreme result.

The district court compounded its error by concluding that § 1182 does not permit DHS to parole noncitizens "simply because DHS does not have the detention capacity." Op. 43 n.11. The Court lacked jurisdiction to reach that conclusion, supra 12-13. Regardless, it is the agency, not the court, that determines what is a "significant public benefit," § 1182(d)(5), that warrants parole, 8 C.F.R. §212.5(b)(5) ("parole" for "significant public benefit" includes "[a]liens whose continued detention is not in the public interest as determined by" relevant officers), and that determination has always encompassed resource constraints, see Padilla v. Immigr. & Customs Enf't, 953 F.3d 1134, 1145 (9th Cir. 2020), vacated on other grounds, 141 S. Ct. 1041 (2021) (describing ICE policy allowing parole "in light of available detention resources"); ECF 98-1, ¶¶ 13-14 (same).

C. The Secretary's decision to terminate MPP satisfies the APA.

The Secretary's decision easily satisfies the APA's "highly deferential" standard, Avoyelles Sportsmen's League, Inc. v. Marsh, 715 F.2d 897, 904 (5th Cir. 1983), because it is fully explained and supported by the record, acknowledges the agency's change of position, and is within the range of possible options. The

Secretary's 7-page decision articulates a clear connection between terminating MPP and achieving the Administration's objectives to address the root causes of migration, improve regional migration management, and expand bilateral efforts to combat smuggling and trafficking networks. The Secretary described how he considered the relevant information, including the prior administration's assessments of MPP, the effectiveness of related efforts to address challenges, and the resources required to implement the program, concluding that "MPP had mixed effectiveness in achieving several of its central goals and that the program experienced significant challenges." AR3; see 192-203, 426-58, 468-487, 543-50, 589-621, 651-53. He also considered alternatives and the impact of terminating MPP. AR5. Ultimately, the Secretary found that, "on balance, any benefits of maintaining … MPP are far outweighed by the benefits of terminating the program." AR6.

That comprehensive analysis amply satisfies the APA's deferential standard of review: "the new policy is permissible under the statute, [] there are good reasons for it, and [] the agency believes it to be better, which the conscious change of course adequately indicates." Fox, 556 U.S. at 515-16. To the extent the Secretary reached different conclusions than those set out in prior MPP assessments, he adequately explained why subsequent developments or different foreign-policy priorities warranted changes. Nothing more is required. Id.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The district court's contrary ruling is deeply flawed. The court stated that DHS "ignored critical factors," such as prior assessments regarding MPP's goal of encouraging noncitizens without meritorious claims to return home. Op. 35-36. But the memorandum, and lengthy record supporting it, show that the Secretary evaluated all "prior DHS assessments of the program," and "the anticipated benefits and goals articulated at the outset of the program and over [its] course." AR3, see also 151, 192-203, 452, 490, 543, 554-56. Rather than ignore "the importance of deterring meritless asylum applications," Op. 36, the Secretary simply exercised his judgment and discretion to address that problem using different policy tools. For example, the Secretary described other "reforms" the Administration is undertaking—including creation of a dedicated docket for certain arriving noncitizens—to improve the processing of asylum applications and "promote compliance and increase appearances throughout proceedings." AR6 (noting "additional anticipated regulatory and policy changes").

The Secretary also noted ways in which MPP had failed to accomplish this particular goal effectively. The Secretary observed that DHS "originally intended the program to more quickly adjudicate legitimate asylum claims and clear asylum backlogs," but that in fact, "backlogs increased." AR4, see AR187, 653. Moreover, the Secretary concluded that the "focus on speed was not always matched with sufficient efforts to ensure that conditions in Mexico enabled migrants to attend their proceedings," and the "approximately 44 percent" of "cases completed through the entry of in absentia removal orders" raised questions for him "about the design and operation of the program." AR4; see AR557-80, 634-38, 660-63. Although MPP was "intended to reduce burdens" on DHS personnel and resources, "the program imposed additional responsibilities that detracted from [DHS's] critically important mission sets." AR4, 452-55, 660-73.

The district court also concluded that the Secretary had failed to consider "warnings by career DHS personnel" that terminating MPP might "lead to a resurgence of illegal aliens attempting to illegally" enter. Op. 37. Again, the record establishes that the Secretary did not ignore that problem; he sought to address it using different strategies that he reasonably believed would "improve border management and reduce migration surges more effectively and more sustainably than MPP." AR5. Moreover, the court's ruling is based entirely on inadmissible hearsay about what prior DHS officials believe other officials may have told the presidential transition team. But the transition team is not the agency, and those statements are "not part of the administrative record." Op. 37. n.10. The actual administrative record showed that over a quarter of MPP enrollees were subsequently reencountered attempting to enter—meaning MPP produced, at least in those cases, additional border encounters. AR4, 660-73.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The court next stated that DHS had failed to consider the States' "fiscal harm from the termination of MPP." Op. 37. But the States submitted no evidence of additional costs since April 2020, when MPP enrollments significantly declined, or since January 2021, when new enrollments were suspended. AR3. The court's insistence that DHS was required to investigate whether border encounters increased after new enrollments were suspended, id., makes little sense given that MPP enrollments declined much earlier due to COVID-19 and Title 42. Regardless, the Secretary did consider "the impact such a decision could have on border management and border communities." AR4-5, 582, 680. And the court's conclusion that the Secretary failed to consider State reliance interests, Op. 37-38, is meritless given that the States have no cognizable reliance interest in a discretionary program, and did not identify any "substantial," long-held reliance interests they possess. See Encino Motorcars v. Navarro, 136 S. Ct. 2117, 2126 (2016).

The district court also held the Secretary had failed to consider "more limited policies" than terminating MPP, Op. 38, but the Secretary expressly "considered various alternatives, including maintaining the status quo or resuming new enrollments in the program," and concluded that "preserving MPP in this manner" would "be a poor use of [DHS] resources" given the identified defects in the program as it operated. AR5. "DHS was not required … to 'consider all policy alternatives in reaching [its] decision,'" and has "considerable flexibility" when deciding how to

"wind-down" a program. Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1914-15 (quoting Motor Vehicle Mfrs. v. State Farm, 463 U.S. 29, 51 (1983)). The court's conclusion that DHS was required to set out "example" alternative versions of MPP, Op. 38, reflects a misunderstanding of APA review.

The district court also erred by finding that the Secretary acted arbitrarily when he concluded that the high rate of in absentia removal orders under MPP raised concerns about MPP, without definitively establishing that those orders "resulted from aliens abandoning meritorious asylum claims." Op. 39-41. But the Secretary reasonably found that MPP did not adequately "ensure that conditions in Mexico enabled migrants to attend their proceedings," which was supported by record evidence showing a substantially lower in absentia rate for non-MPP cases over the same period. AR660-63. The APA "imposes no general obligation on agencies to conduct or commission their own empirical or statistical studies," F.C.C. v. Prometheus Radio, 141 S. Ct. 1150, 1160 (2021), and often "the available data does not settle a regulatory issue and the agency must then exercise its judgment." State Farm, 463 U.S. at 52. If, as here, "the agency's reasons and policy choices conform to minimal standards of rationality, then its actions are reasonable and must be upheld." Texas Oil & Gas Ass'n v. EPA, 161 F.3d 923, 934 (5th Cir. 1998).[4]

[4] The court also ruled it was arbitrary to consider COVID-related immigration court closures because courts had reopened, Op. 41. But infrastructure used for MPP remains shuttered. ECF 98-2, ¶¶ 10-11.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Finally, as explained above, the district court's conclusion that DHS failed to consider section 1225(b)'s supposed requirement to return noncitizens that it does not detain, Op. 41-42, is based on an erroneous legal premise. Regardless, the Secretary considered "various options" "at its disposal," "including detention, alternatives to detention, and case management programs" that "have been shown to be successful in promoting compliance with immigration requirements." AR6; see 8-146, 560, 563, 569-75, 675-76.

II. The balance of equities strongly favors a stay.

The injunction undermines the Executive Branch's constitutional and statutory authority to enforce the immigration laws, and constitutes a major and "unwarranted judicial interference in the conduct of foreign policy." Kiobel v. Royal Dutch Petroleum, 569 U.S. 108, 116 (2013); see Arizona, 567 U.S. at 396 ("Some discretionary decisions [in the enforcement of immigration law] involve policy choices that bear on this Nation's international relations.").

MPP depended on returned individuals being able to reside temporarily in Mexico, which necessitated "close collaboration and negotiation with the Government of Mexico." ECF 64 at 2, ¶ 5. When first implemented, Mexico took "steps critical to [MPP's] functioning," including committing "personnel and infrastructure to receive individuals" and providing essential services. ECF 98-1, ¶ 15. DHS cannot restart MPP without significant cooperation from Mexico. Id.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Requiring DHS to re-implement MPP is thus tantamount telling the United States how to conduct its foreign policy, including with respect to delicate and ongoing discussions with Mexico. Id. ¶¶ 9-15; ECF 98-3, ¶¶ 7-20. The court's statement that DHS can simply unilaterally reinstitute MPP and send non-Mexican nationals to Mexico without its agreement, Op. 49 n.15, is both astonishing and utterly refuted by the record.

Ordering DHS to immediately "implement MPP," Op. 52, would also cause severe damage to ongoing efforts to manage migration and combat criminal networks by requiring diplomatic and DHS resources be shifted to restarting MPP. AR6. DHS has been in the process of unwinding MPP and its infrastructure for months, and restarting it would "involve significant and complicated burdens on border security personnel and resources," undermining other high-priority efforts and critically important DHS missions. AR2-3, 5-7, 587-88; ECF 64 at 5, ¶ 10-11; ECF 98-1, ¶¶ 15-20. Reinstating MPP would "require new and costly investments from both governments to re-establish the infrastructure that sat dormant for more than a year due to COVID-19." ECF 64 at 8-10, ¶¶ 16-18. That undertaking cannot be accomplished in a safe, orderly, and humane manner in a matter of days. And the injunction's requirement that the government build or obtain "sufficient detention capacity to detain all aliens subject to" the district court's extreme view of § 1225(b), and not "releas[e] any aliens because of lack of detention resources," Op. 52, would similarly upend the government's ability to prioritize finite enforcement resources. ECF 98-1, ¶ 5, 9-14.

These extraordinary and unprecedented harms dwarf those of the States, which submitted no evidence that they incurred any additional costs after MPP enrollments declined in April 2020 or since new enrollments ended. Supra p.7. Without evidence of concrete harm, Plaintiffs cannot even establish Article III standing, much less harm from a stay pending appeal.

A stay pending appeal is thus particularly appropriate, as there is no plausible "way to restore the status quo ante" in seven days, Sugar Cane Growers v. Veneman, 289 F.3d 89, 97 (D.C. Cir. 2002), and attempting to do so would cause massive disruption and implicate issues "intricately interwoven with contemporaneous policies in regard to the conduct of foreign relations," Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U.S. 580, 588-89 (1952). For similar reasons, even if this Court agreed with the district court that the agency has not adequately considered relevant factors or explained its decision, remand without vacatur and without an injunction would be the only appropriate remedy. Texas Ass'n of Mfrs. v. U.S. Consumer Prod. Safety Comm'n, 989 F.3d 368, 389 (5th Cir. 2021). "Remand, not vacatur, is generally appropriate when there is at least a serious possibility that the agency will be able to substantiate its decision given an opportunity to do so." Id. Here, "there is a serious possibility that [DHS] will be able to remedy its [supposed APA] failures," id., and so the district court's mandatory injunction, which causes "serious disruptions," is an abuse of discretion and should be stayed. See Cent. & S. W. Servs. v. EPA, 220 F.3d 683, 692 (5th Cir. 2000); see also 8 U.S.C. § 1252(f)(1); Hamama v. Adducci, 912 F.3d 869, 880 (6th Cir. 2018) (holding § 1252(f)(1) bars such injunctive relief).

CONCLUSION

The Court should issue an immediate administrative stay, and then stay the district court's injunction pending completion of appellate proceedings. If the Court is inclined to deny the stay or administrative stay, the Court should enter an administrative stay for at least seven days to give the government an opportunity to seek emergency relief from the Supreme Court.

INTRODUCTION

This Court should stay, pending completion of appellate proceedings, the district court's extraordinary injunction. That injunction requires the Department of Homeland Security (DHS)—within seven days—to re-implement the Migrant Protection Protocols (MPP), a former government program through which the Secretary of Homeland Security exercised her discretionary statutory authority to return certain noncitizens arriving at the southern border to Mexico pending removal proceedings. Because the injunction takes effect at 12:01 a.m. on Saturday, August 21, 2021, the government respectfully requests an administrative stay by Thursday, August 19, so that this Court can consider the stay motion in an orderly manner. The government also respectfully requests, if this Court is inclined to deny the stay or deny the administrative stay, that the Court enter an administrative stay of no fewer than seven days to give the government an opportunity to seek emergency relief from the Supreme Court.

A stay is warranted because the district court's legal and factual conclusions are deeply flawed, and its injunctive remedy is legally improper, profoundly disruptive to foreign policy, and virtually impossible to implement on the required timeline. In January 2019, DHS instituted MPP with policy guidance implementing statutory authority in 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C), providing that the Secretary "may return" certain noncitizens "arriving on land ... from a foreign territory contiguous to the United States" "to that territory" pending resolution of their removal proceedings. (emphasis added). Following the change in administration, the acting Secretary temporarily suspended new enrollments in MPP. Following a comprehensive review, on June 1, 2021, the Secretary terminated MPP, finding it unjustified by the resources it required and incompatible with the administration's broader strategy and foreign policy objectives at the time. AR1-7.

Despite the Executive's clear authority to determine immigration policy and § 1225's express commitment of the decision whether to return noncitizens to Mexico to the Secretary's discretion, on August 13, 2021, the district court vacated the Secretary's decision. The court also issued a nationwide, permanent injunction requiring DHS "to enforce and implement MPP in good faith until such a time as it has been lawfully rescinded in compliance with the APA and until such a time as the federal government has sufficient detention capacity to detain all aliens subject to mandatory detention under Section [1225] without releasing any aliens because of a lack of detention resources." Op. 52. That injunction is set to take effect at 12:01 a.m. on Saturday, August 21. Id. at 53; see Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(a)(1).

The district court's order is wrong in multiple respects. Section 1225(b)(2)(C) is discretionary: the Secretary may—not must—return noncitizens to Mexico or Canada. Contrary to the district court's conclusion, nothing in the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA) dictates how that discretion must be exercised, let alone suggests that it must be exercised if DHS cannot detain every noncitizen arriving at the border who is placed in removal proceedings. The district court's contrary conclusion would mean that until MPP was created in 2019, every Administration had been in continuous and systematic violation of the INA since the relevant provisions were enacted in 1996. The district court also erred by finding that the Secretary's decision violated the Administrative Procedure Act (APA). The Secretary issued a thorough, seven-page memo—based on a 691-page administrative record—that reviewed MPP's "mixed effectiveness" and acknowledged the competing policy considerations. The Secretary then forthrightly grounded his decision in a policy choice to devote DHS's scarce resources to pursuing measures that he judged to be more effective and consistent with this Administration's priorities in managing the challenges of regional migration. In finding that comprehensive explanation insufficient, the district court contravened settled APA precedent holding that, when the government changes policy, "it suffices that the new policy is permissible under the statute, that there are good reasons for it, and that the agency believes it to be better," F.C.C. v. Fox Television Stations, Inc., 556 U.S. 502, 515 (2009).

A stay is urgently need because the injunction will impose immediate, substantial harms on the United States by causing operational chaos at the international border. It will also severely interfere in foreign affairs by effectively dictating foreign policy with respect to Mexico and Central American nations. This Court should grant an immediate administrative stay while it receives briefing and considers this stay request, and then stay the district court's injunction pending appellate proceedings. Appellate courts confronting similar injunctive orders have recognized that a stay pending appellate proceedings is warranted. See Wolf v. Innovation Law Lab, 140 S. Ct. 1564 (2020); Innovation Law Lab v. McAleenan, 924 F.3d 503, 510 (9th Cir. 2019).

BACKGROUND

Legal Background. The Executive Branch has broad constitutional and statutory power over the administration and enforcement of the nation's immigration laws. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U.S. 537, 543 (1950); see, e.g., 6 U.S.C. § 202(5); 8 U.S.C. § 1103(a)(3). For decades, the Executive has exercised that authority through prosecutorial discretion to prioritize which noncitizens to remove and through what type of proceedings. See Matter of E-R-M- & L-R-M-, 25 I.&N. Dec. 520, 523 (BIA 2011).

First, Congress has authorized DHS to initiate expedited removal proceedings in 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(1) against certain applicants for admission who lack valid entry documents.[1] Alternatively, the Secretary may place a noncitizen seeking admission into full removal proceedings held before an immigration judge with potential appeal to the Board of Immigration Appeals, § 1229a, if that noncitizen is not "clearly and beyond a doubt entitled to be admitted." Id. § 1225(b)(2)(A). The statute leaves to DHS's discretion whether to seek expedited or full removal against noncitizens. E-R-M-, 25 I.&N. Dec. at 523. When DHS places noncitizens into proceedings under § 1229a, Congress has provided that, if the noncitizen is "arriving on land (whether or not at a designated port of arrival) from a foreign territory contiguous to the United States," the Secretary "may return the alien to that territory pending a proceeding under section 1229a." Id. § 1225(b)(2)(C). The statute also authorizes DHS, within certain limits, to choose between detaining applicants for admission pending their removal proceedings and releasing them pending those proceedings. Id. §§ 1182(d)(5), 1225(b)(2)(A), 1226(a).

Migrant Protection Protocols. On January 25, 2019, then-Secretary Nielsen instituted MPP, authorizing immigration officers to "exercise[e] [their] prosecutorial discretion regarding whether" to return to Mexico certain classes of noncitizens arriving from Mexico, and providing guidance for making that determination. See Administrative Record (AR) 151. Implementing MPP required the assistance of Mexico, which took a variety of steps to assist the United States and the individuals who were returned under the program. AR152-53. In April, 2020, however, immigration proceedings were suspended in light of the COVID-19 pandemic

(including for noncitizens waiting in Mexico under MPP), and DHS's use of MPP dramatically decreased as many noncitizens encountered at the border were instead expelled under 42 U.S.C. §§ 265, 268 based on an order from the CDC. AR3, 6.

On January 21, 2021, the acting Secretary "suspend[ed] new enrollments in [MPP], pending further review of the program." AR581. President Biden subsequently directed DHS "to promptly review and determine whether to terminate or modify [MPP]." Executive Order 14010, 86 Fed. Reg. 8267 (Feb 2, 2021). And on June 1, 2021, the Secretary announced that he was terminating MPP and explained his decision in a lengthy memorandum. AR1-7.

This Lawsuit. On April 13, 2021, the States of Missouri and Texas filed this suit in the Northern District of Texas, seeking injunctive relief. On August 13, following a one-day bench trial, the district court issued a nationwide injunction requiring DHS "to enforce and implement MPP." Op. 52, Dkt. 94 (Ex. A). The court concluded that the case is justiciable (Op. 21-34); that § 1225(b)(2)(C) mandates returning noncitizens to Mexico whenever DHS lacks the resources to detain them (Op. 32, 41-44); that the Secretary's decision terminating MPP violated the APA (Op. 31-42); and that a nationwide injunction with monthly reporting requirements, rather than remand without vacatur, was appropriate (Op. 45-52). The court delayed the effective date of its ruling to August 21, 2021. Op. 53. The government promptly appealed, and the district court subsequently denied the government's request for a stay pending appeal. ECF 100.

ARGUMENT

An immediate stay pending appeal is warranted. The government is likely to prevail and will be severely and irreparably harmed without a stay; a stay will not substantially harm Plaintiffs; and the public interest supports a stay. See Nken v. Holder, 556 U.S. 418, 425-26 (2009). The Court should also grant an administrative stay while it considers this request. At an absolute minimum, the Court should grant an administrative stay to give the government an opportunity to seek emergency relief from the Supreme Court.

I. Defendants are likely to succeed on appeal.

A. MPP's termination is not reviewable

The district court erred in holding the Secretary's decision is reviewable. Op. 26-34.

At the outset, the States lack standing to pursue their claims. The district court held that the States are suffering cognizable injuries from the termination of MPP, Op. 49, primarily based on speculation about an increase in "the number of aliens released and paroled" who will seek driver's licenses. Id. at 22. But there is no evidence below that either State has issued a single driver's license to any individual who would have been subject to MPP but for its termination, nor did the States substantiate any other costs directly traceable to MPP's termination. Cf. Texas v. U.S., 809 F.3d 134, 155, 160 (5th Cir. 2015) (driver's license theory of standing requires evidence that the States had "to hire employees, purchase equipment, and obtain office space"). Moreover, the alleged harm is not redressable because MPP did not require that anyone be returned, nor could anyone be returned pursuant to MPP without Mexico's agreement. See Lin v. United States, 690 F. App'x 7, 9 (D.C. Cir. 2017) (redressability cannot be shown where relief requires action by "foreign nations not before the court") (collecting cases).

Even if the States had standing, the agency decision is unreviewable. The APA precludes review of certain categories of decisions traditionally regarded as "committed to agency discretion," Lincoln v. Vigil, 508 U.S. 182, 191 (1993)); 5 U.S.C. § 701(a)(2), and the INA similarly prohibits review of any "decision or action" of the Secretary "the authority for which is specified under this subchapter to be in [his] discretion," 8 U.S.C. § 1252(a)(2)(B)(ii). Both of those provisions separately shield from review the Secretary's decision whether to use the contiguous-territory-return authority, which is entirely discretionary: the Secretary "may return" certain noncitizens to a contiguous territory. 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C) (emphasis added). Congress's use of the term "may" "connotes discretion." Jama v. ICE, 543 U.S. 335, 346 (2005). "[T]he statutory scheme … provides absolutely no guidance as to how that discretion is to be exercised." Texas v. United States, 809

F.3d 164, 168 (5th Cir. 2015). Even the district court acknowledged it could not dictate to the Secretary whether to return an individual noncitizen. Op. 51. And for the same reason, the court cannot dictate that the Secretary must "authorize line-level officers to [return noncitizens to Mexico]." Contra id.

In addition, whether to use § 1225(b)(2)(C)'s "return" authority in an individual case or class of cases represents an exercise of enforcement discretion, because it involves a "complicated balancing" of factors "peculiarly within [the Executive's] expertise," such as how to best expend limited "agency resources" and whether a "particular enforcement action … fits the agency's overall policies." Heckler v. Chaney, 470 U.S. 821, 831 (1985). The concerns justifying prosecutorial discretion are "greatly magnified in the [immigration] context," Crane v. Johnson, 783 F.3d 244, 247 (5th Cir. 2015), which implicates the "dynamic nature of relations with other countries" and the need for enforcement policies to be "consistent with this Nation's foreign policy," Arizona v. United States, 567 U.S. 387, 397 (2012). Here, the Secretary weighed these concerns and determined that other strategies would be more effective and better align with foreign policy goals, AR1-7, and it was improper for the district court to displace his judgment.

The district court concluded that "the decision to terminate MPP 'is more than a non-enforcement policy.'" Op. 31 (quoting DHS v. Regents of the Univ. of California, 140 S. Ct. 1891, 1905 (2020)). But decisions on how and where to secure

noncitizens during removal proceedings, and whether to detain them at all, are quintessential enforcement decisions inextricably intertwined with the decision to pursue removal. Gupta v. McGahey, 709 F.3d 1062, 1065 (11th Cir. 2013). And unlike the DACA program at issue in Regents, the Secretary's decision not to subject applicants for admission to contiguous-territory return does not itself confer any affirmative legal benefits or status.

The district court also erred in concluding that § 1225(b) provides a standard that the court could apply. Op. 32. In the court's view, because § 1225(b)(2)(A) references detention of noncitizens placed in § 1229a proceedings, "DHS must use its authority to return aliens to Mexico when an influx of aliens exceeds DHS's detention capacity." Op. 32. But that understanding of the statute is patently incorrect, as explained below. Infra p. 12.

Finally, the decision to terminate MPP is not a reviewable final agency action, 5 U.S.C. § 704, because it does not determine "rights or obligations" or produce "legal consequences." Bennett v. Spear, 520 U.S. 154, 178 (1997). The June 2021 memorandum ending MPP, like the January 2019 memorandum establishing "MPP[,] qualifies as a general statement of policy." Innovation Law Lab v. McAleenan, 924 F.3d 503, 509 (9th Cir. 2019). A "general statement of policy … is not a 'final agency action,' rendering it unreviewable," Cohen v. United States, 578 F.3d 1, 6 (D.C. Cir. 2009), opinion vacated in part on other grounds, 650 F.3d 717

(D.C. Cir. 2011) (en banc), unless and until it is applied "in a particular situation" to a regulated entity. Nat'l Min. Ass'n v. McCarthy, 758 F.3d 243, 253 (D.C. Cir. 2014) (Kavanaugh, J.); Texas v. Equal Emp. Opportunity Comm'n, 933 F.3d 433, 441 (5th Cir. 2019) (similar).

B. Terminating MPP does not violate § 1225.

The district court acknowledged that "DHS does not have to use [the return] authority." Op. 32. The court nevertheless held that terminating MPP violated § 1225, which provides that certain noncitizens "shall be detained" for removal proceedings. 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(A). In the court's view, "where Defendants cannot meet their detention obligations" due to "resource constraints," Op. 44, § 1225(b) "directs DHS ... to return certain aliens to Mexico," Op. 32, so "terminating MPP necessarily leads to the systemic violation of Section 1225 as aliens are released into the United States because Defendants are unable to detain them." Op. 44. That conclusion misconceives the statutory scheme and would upend decades of practice spanning multiple administrations.

To start, the operative complaint challenges the June 1 memorandum, not any policies governing release from detention. See ECF 48 ¶¶ 95-141. Even if the court were right that § 1225 mandated detention, nothing in the statute suggests a direct relationship between that purported detention mandate and the return authority, such that the Secretary is required to return any noncitizen he fails to detain. The return

authority is explicitly discretionary. Supra p. 8. Accordingly, a violation of any detention mandate would be just that—a violation of the detention mandate. Plaintiffs cannot bootstrap their objections to DHS's alleged detention practices into a basis for invalidating the Secretary's separate decision whether to continue using his contiguous-territory-return authority.[2]

In any event, § 1225 does not mandate universal detention. The INA provides DHS with various options for processing noncitizens beyond discretionary returns or detention. DHS "may ... in [its] discretion" release a noncitizen placed in § 1229a proceedings through "parole" "for urgent humanitarian reasons or significant public benefit." 8 U.S.C. § 1182(d)(5)(A) (emphasis added); see 8 C.F.R. §§ 1.2, 235.3(c). And in certain circumstances, "pending a decision on whether the alien is to be removed" and "[e]xcept as provided in [§ 1226(c)]," noncitizens present in the United States may be released on "bond" or "conditional parole," § 1226(a)(2)(A)-(B).

Subject to specific legal constraints, Congress entrusted the decision whether to detain, release, or return a particular noncitizen to the Secretary's discretion by using discretionary language and barring judicial review. 8 U.S.C. § 1182(d)(5)(A)

[2] Given Plaintiffs' claims, the administrative record did not contain evidence concerning release practices and policies. The court independently abused its discretion by relying on "evidence outside the administrative record." Lousiana ex rel. Guste v. Verity, 853 F.2d 322, 327 n.8 (5th Cir. 1988).

(Secretary "may … in his discretion parole") ; id., § 1225(b)(2)(C) ("may return"); Loa-Herrera v. Trominski, 231 F.3d 984, 991 & n.12 (5th Cir. 2000) ("[Secretary's] discretionary judgment regarding the application of [§ 1226]—including the manner in which that discretionary judgment is exercised, and whether the procedural apparatus supplied satisfies regulatory, statutory, and constitutional constraints—is not ... subject to review.") (citing 8 U.S.C. § 1226(e))). The district court's core legal analysis is thus categorically mistaken: the statute does not impose on DHS a binary choice between detention or return to Mexico for noncitizens arriving from Mexico.[3]

Further proof of the error in the district court's detain-or-return reasoning is found in the history of the return provision, and the absurd results that would follow from the court's view. Congress enacted § 1225(b)(2)(C) in 1996, to codify statutory authority for ad hoc returns that the Board had found lacking. In re M-D-C-V-, 28 I.&N. Dec. 18, 25-26 & n.10 (B.I.A. 2020). But MPP—and its broad use of return authority—came into existence only in 2019. AR151. By the district court's logic, Op. 32, every presidential administration for the last 25 years has been systematically violating § 1225 by paroling or otherwise releasing millions of inadmissible applicants for admission rather than returning them to Mexico. And under the injunction, all future administrations will be required to return all eligible noncitizens arriving from Mexico until the government can detain every applicant for admission—a condition that has never existed. Nothing in the INA remotely supports that extreme result.

[3] The Court's characterization of contiguous return as an alternative to detention under § 1225(b)(1), Op. 32, 41-43, is particularly misguided, as noncitizens in ongoing expedited removal proceedings are not eligible for contiguous return, § 1225(b)(2)(B)(ii).

The district court compounded its error by concluding that § 1182 does not permit DHS to parole noncitizens "simply because DHS does not have the detention capacity." Op. 43 n.11. The Court lacked jurisdiction to reach that conclusion, supra 12-13. Regardless, it is the agency, not the court, that determines what is a "significant public benefit," § 1182(d)(5), that warrants parole, 8 C.F.R. §212.5(b)(5) ("parole" for "significant public benefit" includes "[a]liens whose continued detention is not in the public interest as determined by" relevant officers), and that determination has always encompassed resource constraints, see Padilla v. Immigr. & Customs Enf't, 953 F.3d 1134, 1145 (9th Cir. 2020), vacated on other grounds, 141 S. Ct. 1041 (2021) (describing ICE policy allowing parole "in light of available detention resources"); ECF 98-1, ¶¶ 13-14 (same).

C. The Secretary's decision to terminate MPP satisfies the APA.

The Secretary's decision easily satisfies the APA's "highly deferential" standard, Avoyelles Sportsmen's League, Inc. v. Marsh, 715 F.2d 897, 904 (5th Cir. 1983), because it is fully explained and supported by the record, acknowledges the agency's change of position, and is within the range of possible options. The

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Secretary's 7-page decision articulates a clear connection between terminating MPP and achieving the Administration's objectives to address the root causes of migration, improve regional migration management, and expand bilateral efforts to combat smuggling and trafficking networks. The Secretary described how he considered the relevant information, including the prior administration's assessments of MPP, the effectiveness of related efforts to address challenges, and the resources required to implement the program, concluding that "MPP had mixed effectiveness in achieving several of its central goals and that the program experienced significant challenges." AR3; see 192-203, 426-58, 468-487, 543-50, 589-621, 651-53. He also considered alternatives and the impact of terminating MPP. AR5. Ultimately, the Secretary found that, "on balance, any benefits of maintaining … MPP are far outweighed by the benefits of terminating the program." AR6.

That comprehensive analysis amply satisfies the APA's deferential standard of review: "the new policy is permissible under the statute, [] there are good reasons for it, and [] the agency believes it to be better, which the conscious change of course adequately indicates." Fox, 556 U.S. at 515-16. To the extent the Secretary reached different conclusions than those set out in prior MPP assessments, he adequately explained why subsequent developments or different foreign-policy priorities warranted changes. Nothing more is required. Id.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The district court's contrary ruling is deeply flawed. The court stated that DHS "ignored critical factors," such as prior assessments regarding MPP's goal of encouraging noncitizens without meritorious claims to return home. Op. 35-36. But the memorandum, and lengthy record supporting it, show that the Secretary evaluated all "prior DHS assessments of the program," and "the anticipated benefits and goals articulated at the outset of the program and over [its] course." AR3, see also 151, 192-203, 452, 490, 543, 554-56. Rather than ignore "the importance of deterring meritless asylum applications," Op. 36, the Secretary simply exercised his judgment and discretion to address that problem using different policy tools. For example, the Secretary described other "reforms" the Administration is undertaking—including creation of a dedicated docket for certain arriving noncitizens—to improve the processing of asylum applications and "promote compliance and increase appearances throughout proceedings." AR6 (noting "additional anticipated regulatory and policy changes").

The Secretary also noted ways in which MPP had failed to accomplish this particular goal effectively. The Secretary observed that DHS "originally intended the program to more quickly adjudicate legitimate asylum claims and clear asylum backlogs," but that in fact, "backlogs increased." AR4, see AR187, 653. Moreover, the Secretary concluded that the "focus on speed was not always matched with sufficient efforts to ensure that conditions in Mexico enabled migrants to attend their proceedings," and the "approximately 44 percent" of "cases completed through the entry of in absentia removal orders" raised questions for him "about the design and operation of the program." AR4; see AR557-80, 634-38, 660-63. Although MPP was "intended to reduce burdens" on DHS personnel and resources, "the program imposed additional responsibilities that detracted from [DHS's] critically important mission sets." AR4, 452-55, 660-73.

The district court also concluded that the Secretary had failed to consider "warnings by career DHS personnel" that terminating MPP might "lead to a resurgence of illegal aliens attempting to illegally" enter. Op. 37. Again, the record establishes that the Secretary did not ignore that problem; he sought to address it using different strategies that he reasonably believed would "improve border management and reduce migration surges more effectively and more sustainably than MPP." AR5. Moreover, the court's ruling is based entirely on inadmissible hearsay about what prior DHS officials believe other officials may have told the presidential transition team. But the transition team is not the agency, and those statements are "not part of the administrative record." Op. 37. n.10. The actual administrative record showed that over a quarter of MPP enrollees were subsequently reencountered attempting to enter—meaning MPP produced, at least in those cases, additional border encounters. AR4, 660-73.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The court next stated that DHS had failed to consider the States' "fiscal harm from the termination of MPP." Op. 37. But the States submitted no evidence of additional costs since April 2020, when MPP enrollments significantly declined, or since January 2021, when new enrollments were suspended. AR3. The court's insistence that DHS was required to investigate whether border encounters increased after new enrollments were suspended, id., makes little sense given that MPP enrollments declined much earlier due to COVID-19 and Title 42. Regardless, the Secretary did consider "the impact such a decision could have on border management and border communities." AR4-5, 582, 680. And the court's conclusion that the Secretary failed to consider State reliance interests, Op. 37-38, is meritless given that the States have no cognizable reliance interest in a discretionary program, and did not identify any "substantial," long-held reliance interests they possess. See Encino Motorcars v. Navarro, 136 S. Ct. 2117, 2126 (2016).

The district court also held the Secretary had failed to consider "more limited policies" than terminating MPP, Op. 38, but the Secretary expressly "considered various alternatives, including maintaining the status quo or resuming new enrollments in the program," and concluded that "preserving MPP in this manner" would "be a poor use of [DHS] resources" given the identified defects in the program as it operated. AR5. "DHS was not required … to 'consider all policy alternatives in reaching [its] decision,'" and has "considerable flexibility" when deciding how to

"wind-down" a program. Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1914-15 (quoting Motor Vehicle Mfrs. v. State Farm, 463 U.S. 29, 51 (1983)). The court's conclusion that DHS was required to set out "example" alternative versions of MPP, Op. 38, reflects a misunderstanding of APA review.

The district court also erred by finding that the Secretary acted arbitrarily when he concluded that the high rate of in absentia removal orders under MPP raised concerns about MPP, without definitively establishing that those orders "resulted from aliens abandoning meritorious asylum claims." Op. 39-41. But the Secretary reasonably found that MPP did not adequately "ensure that conditions in Mexico enabled migrants to attend their proceedings," which was supported by record evidence showing a substantially lower in absentia rate for non-MPP cases over the same period. AR660-63. The APA "imposes no general obligation on agencies to conduct or commission their own empirical or statistical studies," F.C.C. v. Prometheus Radio, 141 S. Ct. 1150, 1160 (2021), and often "the available data does not settle a regulatory issue and the agency must then exercise its judgment." State Farm, 463 U.S. at 52. If, as here, "the agency's reasons and policy choices conform to minimal standards of rationality, then its actions are reasonable and must be upheld." Texas Oil & Gas Ass'n v. EPA, 161 F.3d 923, 934 (5th Cir. 1998).[4]

[4] The court also ruled it was arbitrary to consider COVID-related immigration court closures because courts had reopened, Op. 41. But infrastructure used for MPP remains shuttered. ECF 98-2, ¶¶ 10-11.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Finally, as explained above, the district court's conclusion that DHS failed to consider section 1225(b)'s supposed requirement to return noncitizens that it does not detain, Op. 41-42, is based on an erroneous legal premise. Regardless, the Secretary considered "various options" "at its disposal," "including detention, alternatives to detention, and case management programs" that "have been shown to be successful in promoting compliance with immigration requirements." AR6; see 8-146, 560, 563, 569-75, 675-76.

II. The balance of equities strongly favors a stay.

The injunction undermines the Executive Branch's constitutional and statutory authority to enforce the immigration laws, and constitutes a major and "unwarranted judicial interference in the conduct of foreign policy." Kiobel v. Royal Dutch Petroleum, 569 U.S. 108, 116 (2013); see Arizona, 567 U.S. at 396 ("Some discretionary decisions [in the enforcement of immigration law] involve policy choices that bear on this Nation's international relations.").

MPP depended on returned individuals being able to reside temporarily in Mexico, which necessitated "close collaboration and negotiation with the Government of Mexico." ECF 64 at 2, ¶ 5. When first implemented, Mexico took "steps critical to [MPP's] functioning," including committing "personnel and infrastructure to receive individuals" and providing essential services. ECF 98-1, ¶ 15. DHS cannot restart MPP without significant cooperation from Mexico. Id.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Requiring DHS to re-implement MPP is thus tantamount telling the United States how to conduct its foreign policy, including with respect to delicate and ongoing discussions with Mexico. Id. ¶¶ 9-15; ECF 98-3, ¶¶ 7-20. The court's statement that DHS can simply unilaterally reinstitute MPP and send non-Mexican nationals to Mexico without its agreement, Op. 49 n.15, is both astonishing and utterly refuted by the record.

Ordering DHS to immediately "implement MPP," Op. 52, would also cause severe damage to ongoing efforts to manage migration and combat criminal networks by requiring diplomatic and DHS resources be shifted to restarting MPP. AR6. DHS has been in the process of unwinding MPP and its infrastructure for months, and restarting it would "involve significant and complicated burdens on border security personnel and resources," undermining other high-priority efforts and critically important DHS missions. AR2-3, 5-7, 587-88; ECF 64 at 5, ¶ 10-11; ECF 98-1, ¶¶ 15-20. Reinstating MPP would "require new and costly investments from both governments to re-establish the infrastructure that sat dormant for more than a year due to COVID-19." ECF 64 at 8-10, ¶¶ 16-18. That undertaking cannot be accomplished in a safe, orderly, and humane manner in a matter of days. And the injunction's requirement that the government build or obtain "sufficient detention capacity to detain all aliens subject to" the district court's extreme view of § 1225(b), and not "releas[e] any aliens because of lack of detention resources," Op. 52, would similarly upend the government's ability to prioritize finite enforcement resources. ECF 98-1, ¶ 5, 9-14.

These extraordinary and unprecedented harms dwarf those of the States, which submitted no evidence that they incurred any additional costs after MPP enrollments declined in April 2020 or since new enrollments ended. Supra p.7. Without evidence of concrete harm, Plaintiffs cannot even establish Article III standing, much less harm from a stay pending appeal.

A stay pending appeal is thus particularly appropriate, as there is no plausible "way to restore the status quo ante" in seven days, Sugar Cane Growers v. Veneman, 289 F.3d 89, 97 (D.C. Cir. 2002), and attempting to do so would cause massive disruption and implicate issues "intricately interwoven with contemporaneous policies in regard to the conduct of foreign relations," Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U.S. 580, 588-89 (1952). For similar reasons, even if this Court agreed with the district court that the agency has not adequately considered relevant factors or explained its decision, remand without vacatur and without an injunction would be the only appropriate remedy. Texas Ass'n of Mfrs. v. U.S. Consumer Prod. Safety Comm'n, 989 F.3d 368, 389 (5th Cir. 2021). "Remand, not vacatur, is generally appropriate when there is at least a serious possibility that the agency will be able to substantiate its decision given an opportunity to do so." Id. Here, "there is a serious possibility that [DHS] will be able to remedy its [supposed APA] failures," id., and so the district court's mandatory injunction, which causes "serious disruptions," is an abuse of discretion and should be stayed. See Cent. & S. W. Servs. v. EPA, 220 F.3d 683, 692 (5th Cir. 2000); see also 8 U.S.C. § 1252(f)(1); Hamama v. Adducci, 912 F.3d 869, 880 (6th Cir. 2018) (holding § 1252(f)(1) bars such injunctive relief).

CONCLUSION

The Court should issue an immediate administrative stay, and then stay the district court's injunction pending completion of appellate proceedings. If the Court is inclined to deny the stay or administrative stay, the Court should enter an administrative stay for at least seven days to give the government an opportunity to seek emergency relief from the Supreme Court.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

INTRODUCTION

This Court should stay, pending completion of appellate proceedings, the district court's extraordinary injunction. That injunction requires the Department of Homeland Security (DHS)—within seven days—to re-implement the Migrant Protection Protocols (MPP), a former government program through which the Secretary of Homeland Security exercised her discretionary statutory authority to return certain noncitizens arriving at the southern border to Mexico pending removal proceedings. Because the injunction takes effect at 12:01 a.m. on Saturday, August 21, 2021, the government respectfully requests an administrative stay by Thursday, August 19, so that this Court can consider the stay motion in an orderly manner. The government also respectfully requests, if this Court is inclined to deny the stay or deny the administrative stay, that the Court enter an administrative stay of no fewer than seven days to give the government an opportunity to seek emergency relief from the Supreme Court.

A stay is warranted because the district court's legal and factual conclusions are deeply flawed, and its injunctive remedy is legally improper, profoundly disruptive to foreign policy, and virtually impossible to implement on the required timeline. In January 2019, DHS instituted MPP with policy guidance implementing statutory authority in 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C), providing that the Secretary "may return" certain noncitizens "arriving on land ... from a foreign territory contiguous to the United States" "to that territory" pending resolution of their removal proceedings. (emphasis added). Following the change in administration, the acting Secretary temporarily suspended new enrollments in MPP. Following a comprehensive review, on June 1, 2021, the Secretary terminated MPP, finding it unjustified by the resources it required and incompatible with the administration's broader strategy and foreign policy objectives at the time. AR1-7.

Despite the Executive's clear authority to determine immigration policy and § 1225's express commitment of the decision whether to return noncitizens to Mexico to the Secretary's discretion, on August 13, 2021, the district court vacated the Secretary's decision. The court also issued a nationwide, permanent injunction requiring DHS "to enforce and implement MPP in good faith until such a time as it has been lawfully rescinded in compliance with the APA and until such a time as the federal government has sufficient detention capacity to detain all aliens subject to mandatory detention under Section [1225] without releasing any aliens because of a lack of detention resources." Op. 52. That injunction is set to take effect at 12:01 a.m. on Saturday, August 21. Id. at 53; see Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(a)(1).

The district court's order is wrong in multiple respects. Section 1225(b)(2)(C) is discretionary: the Secretary may—not must—return noncitizens to Mexico or Canada. Contrary to the district court's conclusion, nothing in the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA) dictates how that discretion must be exercised, let alone suggests that it must be exercised if DHS cannot detain every noncitizen arriving at the border who is placed in removal proceedings. The district court's contrary conclusion would mean that until MPP was created in 2019, every Administration had been in continuous and systematic violation of the INA since the relevant provisions were enacted in 1996. The district court also erred by finding that the Secretary's decision violated the Administrative Procedure Act (APA). The Secretary issued a thorough, seven-page memo—based on a 691-page administrative record—that reviewed MPP's "mixed effectiveness" and acknowledged the competing policy considerations. The Secretary then forthrightly grounded his decision in a policy choice to devote DHS's scarce resources to pursuing measures that he judged to be more effective and consistent with this Administration's priorities in managing the challenges of regional migration. In finding that comprehensive explanation insufficient, the district court contravened settled APA precedent holding that, when the government changes policy, "it suffices that the new policy is permissible under the statute, that there are good reasons for it, and that the agency believes it to be better," F.C.C. v. Fox Television Stations, Inc., 556 U.S. 502, 515 (2009).

A stay is urgently need because the injunction will impose immediate, substantial harms on the United States by causing operational chaos at the international border. It will also severely interfere in foreign affairs by effectively dictating foreign policy with respect to Mexico and Central American nations. This Court should grant an immediate administrative stay while it receives briefing and considers this stay request, and then stay the district court's injunction pending appellate proceedings. Appellate courts confronting similar injunctive orders have recognized that a stay pending appellate proceedings is warranted. See Wolf v. Innovation Law Lab, 140 S. Ct. 1564 (2020); Innovation Law Lab v. McAleenan, 924 F.3d 503, 510 (9th Cir. 2019).

BACKGROUND

Legal Background. The Executive Branch has broad constitutional and statutory power over the administration and enforcement of the nation's immigration laws. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U.S. 537, 543 (1950); see, e.g., 6 U.S.C. § 202(5); 8 U.S.C. § 1103(a)(3). For decades, the Executive has exercised that authority through prosecutorial discretion to prioritize which noncitizens to remove and through what type of proceedings. See Matter of E-R-M- & L-R-M-, 25 I.&N. Dec. 520, 523 (BIA 2011).

First, Congress has authorized DHS to initiate expedited removal proceedings in 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(1) against certain applicants for admission who lack valid entry documents.[1] Alternatively, the Secretary may place a noncitizen seeking admission into full removal proceedings held before an immigration judge with potential appeal to the Board of Immigration Appeals, § 1229a, if that noncitizen is not "clearly and beyond a doubt entitled to be admitted." Id. § 1225(b)(2)(A). The statute leaves to DHS's discretion whether to seek expedited or full removal against noncitizens. E-R-M-, 25 I.&N. Dec. at 523. When DHS places noncitizens into proceedings under § 1229a, Congress has provided that, if the noncitizen is "arriving on land (whether or not at a designated port of arrival) from a foreign territory contiguous to the United States," the Secretary "may return the alien to that territory pending a proceeding under section 1229a." Id. § 1225(b)(2)(C). The statute also authorizes DHS, within certain limits, to choose between detaining applicants for admission pending their removal proceedings and releasing them pending those proceedings. Id. §§ 1182(d)(5), 1225(b)(2)(A), 1226(a).

[1] References to the Attorney General in § 1225 now mean the Secretary. 6 U.S.C. §§ 251, 552(d).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Migrant Protection Protocols. On January 25, 2019, then-Secretary Nielsen instituted MPP, authorizing immigration officers to "exercise[e] [their] prosecutorial discretion regarding whether" to return to Mexico certain classes of noncitizens arriving from Mexico, and providing guidance for making that determination. See Administrative Record (AR) 151. Implementing MPP required the assistance of Mexico, which took a variety of steps to assist the United States and the individuals who were returned under the program. AR152-53. In April, 2020, however, immigration proceedings were suspended in light of the COVID-19 pandemic

(including for noncitizens waiting in Mexico under MPP), and DHS's use of MPP dramatically decreased as many noncitizens encountered at the border were instead expelled under 42 U.S.C. §§ 265, 268 based on an order from the CDC. AR3, 6.

On January 21, 2021, the acting Secretary "suspend[ed] new enrollments in [MPP], pending further review of the program." AR581. President Biden subsequently directed DHS "to promptly review and determine whether to terminate or modify [MPP]." Executive Order 14010, 86 Fed. Reg. 8267 (Feb 2, 2021). And on June 1, 2021, the Secretary announced that he was terminating MPP and explained his decision in a lengthy memorandum. AR1-7.

This Lawsuit. On April 13, 2021, the States of Missouri and Texas filed this suit in the Northern District of Texas, seeking injunctive relief. On August 13, following a one-day bench trial, the district court issued a nationwide injunction requiring DHS "to enforce and implement MPP." Op. 52, Dkt. 94 (Ex. A). The court concluded that the case is justiciable (Op. 21-34); that § 1225(b)(2)(C) mandates returning noncitizens to Mexico whenever DHS lacks the resources to detain them (Op. 32, 41-44); that the Secretary's decision terminating MPP violated the APA (Op. 31-42); and that a nationwide injunction with monthly reporting requirements, rather than remand without vacatur, was appropriate (Op. 45-52). The court delayed the effective date of its ruling to August 21, 2021. Op. 53. The government promptly appealed, and the district court subsequently denied the government's request for a stay pending appeal. ECF 100.

ARGUMENT

An immediate stay pending appeal is warranted. The government is likely to prevail and will be severely and irreparably harmed without a stay; a stay will not substantially harm Plaintiffs; and the public interest supports a stay. See Nken v. Holder, 556 U.S. 418, 425-26 (2009). The Court should also grant an administrative stay while it considers this request. At an absolute minimum, the Court should grant an administrative stay to give the government an opportunity to seek emergency relief from the Supreme Court.

I. Defendants are likely to succeed on appeal.

A. MPP's termination is not reviewable

The district court erred in holding the Secretary's decision is reviewable. Op. 26-34.

At the outset, the States lack standing to pursue their claims. The district court held that the States are suffering cognizable injuries from the termination of MPP, Op. 49, primarily based on speculation about an increase in "the number of aliens released and paroled" who will seek driver's licenses. Id. at 22. But there is no evidence below that either State has issued a single driver's license to any individual who would have been subject to MPP but for its termination, nor did the States substantiate any other costs directly traceable to MPP's termination. Cf. Texas v. U.S., 809 F.3d 134, 155, 160 (5th Cir. 2015) (driver's license theory of standing requires evidence that the States had "to hire employees, purchase equipment, and obtain office space"). Moreover, the alleged harm is not redressable because MPP did not require that anyone be returned, nor could anyone be returned pursuant to MPP without Mexico's agreement. See Lin v. United States, 690 F. App'x 7, 9 (D.C. Cir. 2017) (redressability cannot be shown where relief requires action by "foreign nations not before the court") (collecting cases).

Even if the States had standing, the agency decision is unreviewable. The APA precludes review of certain categories of decisions traditionally regarded as "committed to agency discretion," Lincoln v. Vigil, 508 U.S. 182, 191 (1993)); 5 U.S.C. § 701(a)(2), and the INA similarly prohibits review of any "decision or action" of the Secretary "the authority for which is specified under this subchapter to be in [his] discretion," 8 U.S.C. § 1252(a)(2)(B)(ii). Both of those provisions separately shield from review the Secretary's decision whether to use the contiguous-territory-return authority, which is entirely discretionary: the Secretary "may return" certain noncitizens to a contiguous territory. 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C) (emphasis added). Congress's use of the term "may" "connotes discretion." Jama v. ICE, 543 U.S. 335, 346 (2005). "[T]he statutory scheme … provides absolutely no guidance as to how that discretion is to be exercised." Texas v. United States, 809

F.3d 164, 168 (5th Cir. 2015). Even the district court acknowledged it could not dictate to the Secretary whether to return an individual noncitizen. Op. 51. And for the same reason, the court cannot dictate that the Secretary must "authorize line-level officers to [return noncitizens to Mexico]." Contra id.

In addition, whether to use § 1225(b)(2)(C)'s "return" authority in an individual case or class of cases represents an exercise of enforcement discretion, because it involves a "complicated balancing" of factors "peculiarly within [the Executive's] expertise," such as how to best expend limited "agency resources" and whether a "particular enforcement action … fits the agency's overall policies." Heckler v. Chaney, 470 U.S. 821, 831 (1985). The concerns justifying prosecutorial discretion are "greatly magnified in the [immigration] context," Crane v. Johnson, 783 F.3d 244, 247 (5th Cir. 2015), which implicates the "dynamic nature of relations with other countries" and the need for enforcement policies to be "consistent with this Nation's foreign policy," Arizona v. United States, 567 U.S. 387, 397 (2012). Here, the Secretary weighed these concerns and determined that other strategies would be more effective and better align with foreign policy goals, AR1-7, and it was improper for the district court to displace his judgment.

The district court concluded that "the decision to terminate MPP 'is more than a non-enforcement policy.'" Op. 31 (quoting DHS v. Regents of the Univ. of California, 140 S. Ct. 1891, 1905 (2020)). But decisions on how and where to secure

noncitizens during removal proceedings, and whether to detain them at all, are quintessential enforcement decisions inextricably intertwined with the decision to pursue removal. Gupta v. McGahey, 709 F.3d 1062, 1065 (11th Cir. 2013). And unlike the DACA program at issue in Regents, the Secretary's decision not to subject applicants for admission to contiguous-territory return does not itself confer any affirmative legal benefits or status.

The district court also erred in concluding that § 1225(b) provides a standard that the court could apply. Op. 32. In the court's view, because § 1225(b)(2)(A) references detention of noncitizens placed in § 1229a proceedings, "DHS must use its authority to return aliens to Mexico when an influx of aliens exceeds DHS's detention capacity." Op. 32. But that understanding of the statute is patently incorrect, as explained below. Infra p. 12.

Finally, the decision to terminate MPP is not a reviewable final agency action, 5 U.S.C. § 704, because it does not determine "rights or obligations" or produce "legal consequences." Bennett v. Spear, 520 U.S. 154, 178 (1997). The June 2021 memorandum ending MPP, like the January 2019 memorandum establishing "MPP[,] qualifies as a general statement of policy." Innovation Law Lab v. McAleenan, 924 F.3d 503, 509 (9th Cir. 2019). A "general statement of policy … is not a 'final agency action,' rendering it unreviewable," Cohen v. United States, 578 F.3d 1, 6 (D.C. Cir. 2009), opinion vacated in part on other grounds, 650 F.3d 717

(D.C. Cir. 2011) (en banc), unless and until it is applied "in a particular situation" to a regulated entity. Nat'l Min. Ass'n v. McCarthy, 758 F.3d 243, 253 (D.C. Cir. 2014) (Kavanaugh, J.); Texas v. Equal Emp. Opportunity Comm'n, 933 F.3d 433, 441 (5th Cir. 2019) (similar).

B. Terminating MPP does not violate § 1225.

The district court acknowledged that "DHS does not have to use [the return] authority." Op. 32. The court nevertheless held that terminating MPP violated § 1225, which provides that certain noncitizens "shall be detained" for removal proceedings. 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(A). In the court's view, "where Defendants cannot meet their detention obligations" due to "resource constraints," Op. 44, § 1225(b) "directs DHS ... to return certain aliens to Mexico," Op. 32, so "terminating MPP necessarily leads to the systemic violation of Section 1225 as aliens are released into the United States because Defendants are unable to detain them." Op. 44. That conclusion misconceives the statutory scheme and would upend decades of practice spanning multiple administrations.

To start, the operative complaint challenges the June 1 memorandum, not any policies governing release from detention. See ECF 48 ¶¶ 95-141. Even if the court were right that § 1225 mandated detention, nothing in the statute suggests a direct relationship between that purported detention mandate and the return authority, such that the Secretary is required to return any noncitizen he fails to detain. The return

authority is explicitly discretionary. Supra p. 8. Accordingly, a violation of any detention mandate would be just that—a violation of the detention mandate. Plaintiffs cannot bootstrap their objections to DHS's alleged detention practices into a basis for invalidating the Secretary's separate decision whether to continue using his contiguous-territory-return authority.[2]

In any event, § 1225 does not mandate universal detention. The INA provides DHS with various options for processing noncitizens beyond discretionary returns or detention. DHS "may ... in [its] discretion" release a noncitizen placed in § 1229a proceedings through "parole" "for urgent humanitarian reasons or significant public benefit." 8 U.S.C. § 1182(d)(5)(A) (emphasis added); see 8 C.F.R. §§ 1.2, 235.3(c). And in certain circumstances, "pending a decision on whether the alien is to be removed" and "[e]xcept as provided in [§ 1226(c)]," noncitizens present in the United States may be released on "bond" or "conditional parole," § 1226(a)(2)(A)-(B).

Subject to specific legal constraints, Congress entrusted the decision whether to detain, release, or return a particular noncitizen to the Secretary's discretion by using discretionary language and barring judicial review. 8 U.S.C. § 1182(d)(5)(A)

[2] Given Plaintiffs' claims, the administrative record did not contain evidence concerning release practices and policies. The court independently abused its discretion by relying on "evidence outside the administrative record." Lousiana ex rel. Guste v. Verity, 853 F.2d 322, 327 n.8 (5th Cir. 1988).

(Secretary "may … in his discretion parole") ; id., § 1225(b)(2)(C) ("may return"); Loa-Herrera v. Trominski, 231 F.3d 984, 991 & n.12 (5th Cir. 2000) ("[Secretary's] discretionary judgment regarding the application of [§ 1226]—including the manner in which that discretionary judgment is exercised, and whether the procedural apparatus supplied satisfies regulatory, statutory, and constitutional constraints—is not ... subject to review.") (citing 8 U.S.C. § 1226(e))). The district court's core legal analysis is thus categorically mistaken: the statute does not impose on DHS a binary choice between detention or return to Mexico for noncitizens arriving from Mexico.[3]

Further proof of the error in the district court's detain-or-return reasoning is found in the history of the return provision, and the absurd results that would follow from the court's view. Congress enacted § 1225(b)(2)(C) in 1996, to codify statutory authority for ad hoc returns that the Board had found lacking. In re M-D-C-V-, 28 I.&N. Dec. 18, 25-26 & n.10 (B.I.A. 2020). But MPP—and its broad use of return authority—came into existence only in 2019. AR151. By the district court's logic, Op. 32, every presidential administration for the last 25 years has been systematically violating § 1225 by paroling or otherwise releasing millions of inadmissible applicants for admission rather than returning them to Mexico. And under the injunction, all future administrations will be required to return all eligible noncitizens arriving from Mexico until the government can detain every applicant for admission—a condition that has never existed. Nothing in the INA remotely supports that extreme result.

[3] The Court's characterization of contiguous return as an alternative to detention under § 1225(b)(1), Op. 32, 41-43, is particularly misguided, as noncitizens in ongoing expedited removal proceedings are not eligible for contiguous return, § 1225(b)(2)(B)(ii).

The district court compounded its error by concluding that § 1182 does not permit DHS to parole noncitizens "simply because DHS does not have the detention capacity." Op. 43 n.11. The Court lacked jurisdiction to reach that conclusion, supra 12-13. Regardless, it is the agency, not the court, that determines what is a "significant public benefit," § 1182(d)(5), that warrants parole, 8 C.F.R. §212.5(b)(5) ("parole" for "significant public benefit" includes "[a]liens whose continued detention is not in the public interest as determined by" relevant officers), and that determination has always encompassed resource constraints, see Padilla v. Immigr. & Customs Enf't, 953 F.3d 1134, 1145 (9th Cir. 2020), vacated on other grounds, 141 S. Ct. 1041 (2021) (describing ICE policy allowing parole "in light of available detention resources"); ECF 98-1, ¶¶ 13-14 (same).

C. The Secretary's decision to terminate MPP satisfies the APA.

The Secretary's decision easily satisfies the APA's "highly deferential" standard, Avoyelles Sportsmen's League, Inc. v. Marsh, 715 F.2d 897, 904 (5th Cir. 1983), because it is fully explained and supported by the record, acknowledges the agency's change of position, and is within the range of possible options. The

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Secretary's 7-page decision articulates a clear connection between terminating MPP and achieving the Administration's objectives to address the root causes of migration, improve regional migration management, and expand bilateral efforts to combat smuggling and trafficking networks. The Secretary described how he considered the relevant information, including the prior administration's assessments of MPP, the effectiveness of related efforts to address challenges, and the resources required to implement the program, concluding that "MPP had mixed effectiveness in achieving several of its central goals and that the program experienced significant challenges." AR3; see 192-203, 426-58, 468-487, 543-50, 589-621, 651-53. He also considered alternatives and the impact of terminating MPP. AR5. Ultimately, the Secretary found that, "on balance, any benefits of maintaining … MPP are far outweighed by the benefits of terminating the program." AR6.

That comprehensive analysis amply satisfies the APA's deferential standard of review: "the new policy is permissible under the statute, [] there are good reasons for it, and [] the agency believes it to be better, which the conscious change of course adequately indicates." Fox, 556 U.S. at 515-16. To the extent the Secretary reached different conclusions than those set out in prior MPP assessments, he adequately explained why subsequent developments or different foreign-policy priorities warranted changes. Nothing more is required. Id.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The district court's contrary ruling is deeply flawed. The court stated that DHS "ignored critical factors," such as prior assessments regarding MPP's goal of encouraging noncitizens without meritorious claims to return home. Op. 35-36. But the memorandum, and lengthy record supporting it, show that the Secretary evaluated all "prior DHS assessments of the program," and "the anticipated benefits and goals articulated at the outset of the program and over [its] course." AR3, see also 151, 192-203, 452, 490, 543, 554-56. Rather than ignore "the importance of deterring meritless asylum applications," Op. 36, the Secretary simply exercised his judgment and discretion to address that problem using different policy tools. For example, the Secretary described other "reforms" the Administration is undertaking—including creation of a dedicated docket for certain arriving noncitizens—to improve the processing of asylum applications and "promote compliance and increase appearances throughout proceedings." AR6 (noting "additional anticipated regulatory and policy changes").

The Secretary also noted ways in which MPP had failed to accomplish this particular goal effectively. The Secretary observed that DHS "originally intended the program to more quickly adjudicate legitimate asylum claims and clear asylum backlogs," but that in fact, "backlogs increased." AR4, see AR187, 653. Moreover, the Secretary concluded that the "focus on speed was not always matched with sufficient efforts to ensure that conditions in Mexico enabled migrants to attend their proceedings," and the "approximately 44 percent" of "cases completed through the entry of in absentia removal orders" raised questions for him "about the design and operation of the program." AR4; see AR557-80, 634-38, 660-63. Although MPP was "intended to reduce burdens" on DHS personnel and resources, "the program imposed additional responsibilities that detracted from [DHS's] critically important mission sets." AR4, 452-55, 660-73.

The district court also concluded that the Secretary had failed to consider "warnings by career DHS personnel" that terminating MPP might "lead to a resurgence of illegal aliens attempting to illegally" enter. Op. 37. Again, the record establishes that the Secretary did not ignore that problem; he sought to address it using different strategies that he reasonably believed would "improve border management and reduce migration surges more effectively and more sustainably than MPP." AR5. Moreover, the court's ruling is based entirely on inadmissible hearsay about what prior DHS officials believe other officials may have told the presidential transition team. But the transition team is not the agency, and those statements are "not part of the administrative record." Op. 37. n.10. The actual administrative record showed that over a quarter of MPP enrollees were subsequently reencountered attempting to enter—meaning MPP produced, at least in those cases, additional border encounters. AR4, 660-73.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The court next stated that DHS had failed to consider the States' "fiscal harm from the termination of MPP." Op. 37. But the States submitted no evidence of additional costs since April 2020, when MPP enrollments significantly declined, or since January 2021, when new enrollments were suspended. AR3. The court's insistence that DHS was required to investigate whether border encounters increased after new enrollments were suspended, id., makes little sense given that MPP enrollments declined much earlier due to COVID-19 and Title 42. Regardless, the Secretary did consider "the impact such a decision could have on border management and border communities." AR4-5, 582, 680. And the court's conclusion that the Secretary failed to consider State reliance interests, Op. 37-38, is meritless given that the States have no cognizable reliance interest in a discretionary program, and did not identify any "substantial," long-held reliance interests they possess. See Encino Motorcars v. Navarro, 136 S. Ct. 2117, 2126 (2016).

The district court also held the Secretary had failed to consider "more limited policies" than terminating MPP, Op. 38, but the Secretary expressly "considered various alternatives, including maintaining the status quo or resuming new enrollments in the program," and concluded that "preserving MPP in this manner" would "be a poor use of [DHS] resources" given the identified defects in the program as it operated. AR5. "DHS was not required … to 'consider all policy alternatives in reaching [its] decision,'" and has "considerable flexibility" when deciding how to

"wind-down" a program. Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1914-15 (quoting Motor Vehicle Mfrs. v. State Farm, 463 U.S. 29, 51 (1983)). The court's conclusion that DHS was required to set out "example" alternative versions of MPP, Op. 38, reflects a misunderstanding of APA review.

The district court also erred by finding that the Secretary acted arbitrarily when he concluded that the high rate of in absentia removal orders under MPP raised concerns about MPP, without definitively establishing that those orders "resulted from aliens abandoning meritorious asylum claims." Op. 39-41. But the Secretary reasonably found that MPP did not adequately "ensure that conditions in Mexico enabled migrants to attend their proceedings," which was supported by record evidence showing a substantially lower in absentia rate for non-MPP cases over the same period. AR660-63. The APA "imposes no general obligation on agencies to conduct or commission their own empirical or statistical studies," F.C.C. v. Prometheus Radio, 141 S. Ct. 1150, 1160 (2021), and often "the available data does not settle a regulatory issue and the agency must then exercise its judgment." State Farm, 463 U.S. at 52. If, as here, "the agency's reasons and policy choices conform to minimal standards of rationality, then its actions are reasonable and must be upheld." Texas Oil & Gas Ass'n v. EPA, 161 F.3d 923, 934 (5th Cir. 1998).[4]

[4] The court also ruled it was arbitrary to consider COVID-related immigration court closures because courts had reopened, Op. 41. But infrastructure used for MPP remains shuttered. ECF 98-2, ¶¶ 10-11.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Finally, as explained above, the district court's conclusion that DHS failed to consider section 1225(b)'s supposed requirement to return noncitizens that it does not detain, Op. 41-42, is based on an erroneous legal premise. Regardless, the Secretary considered "various options" "at its disposal," "including detention, alternatives to detention, and case management programs" that "have been shown to be successful in promoting compliance with immigration requirements." AR6; see 8-146, 560, 563, 569-75, 675-76.

II. The balance of equities strongly favors a stay.

The injunction undermines the Executive Branch's constitutional and statutory authority to enforce the immigration laws, and constitutes a major and "unwarranted judicial interference in the conduct of foreign policy." Kiobel v. Royal Dutch Petroleum, 569 U.S. 108, 116 (2013); see Arizona, 567 U.S. at 396 ("Some discretionary decisions [in the enforcement of immigration law] involve policy choices that bear on this Nation's international relations.").

MPP depended on returned individuals being able to reside temporarily in Mexico, which necessitated "close collaboration and negotiation with the Government of Mexico." ECF 64 at 2, ¶ 5. When first implemented, Mexico took "steps critical to [MPP's] functioning," including committing "personnel and infrastructure to receive individuals" and providing essential services. ECF 98-1, ¶ 15. DHS cannot restart MPP without significant cooperation from Mexico. Id.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Requiring DHS to re-implement MPP is thus tantamount telling the United States how to conduct its foreign policy, including with respect to delicate and ongoing discussions with Mexico. Id. ¶¶ 9-15; ECF 98-3, ¶¶ 7-20. The court's statement that DHS can simply unilaterally reinstitute MPP and send non-Mexican nationals to Mexico without its agreement, Op. 49 n.15, is both astonishing and utterly refuted by the record.

Ordering DHS to immediately "implement MPP," Op. 52, would also cause severe damage to ongoing efforts to manage migration and combat criminal networks by requiring diplomatic and DHS resources be shifted to restarting MPP. AR6. DHS has been in the process of unwinding MPP and its infrastructure for months, and restarting it would "involve significant and complicated burdens on border security personnel and resources," undermining other high-priority efforts and critically important DHS missions. AR2-3, 5-7, 587-88; ECF 64 at 5, ¶ 10-11; ECF 98-1, ¶¶ 15-20. Reinstating MPP would "require new and costly investments from both governments to re-establish the infrastructure that sat dormant for more than a year due to COVID-19." ECF 64 at 8-10, ¶¶ 16-18. That undertaking cannot be accomplished in a safe, orderly, and humane manner in a matter of days. And the injunction's requirement that the government build or obtain "sufficient detention capacity to detain all aliens subject to" the district court's extreme view of § 1225(b), and not "releas[e] any aliens because of lack of detention resources," Op. 52, would

similarly upend the government's ability to prioritize finite enforcement resources. ECF 98-1, ¶ 5, 9-14.

These extraordinary and unprecedented harms dwarf those of the States, which submitted no evidence that they incurred any additional costs after MPP enrollments declined in April 2020 or since new enrollments ended. Supra p.7. Without evidence of concrete harm, Plaintiffs cannot even establish Article III standing, much less harm from a stay pending appeal.

A stay pending appeal is thus particularly appropriate, as there is no plausible "way to restore the status quo ante" in seven days, Sugar Cane Growers v. Veneman, 289 F.3d 89, 97 (D.C. Cir. 2002), and attempting to do so would cause massive disruption and implicate issues "intricately interwoven with contemporaneous policies in regard to the conduct of foreign relations," Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U.S. 580, 588-89 (1952). For similar reasons, even if this Court agreed with the district court that the agency has not adequately considered relevant factors or explained its decision, remand without vacatur and without an injunction would be the only appropriate remedy. Texas Ass'n of Mfrs. v. U.S. Consumer Prod. Safety Comm'n, 989 F.3d 368, 389 (5th Cir. 2021). "Remand, not vacatur, is generally appropriate when there is at least a serious possibility that the agency will be able to substantiate its decision given an opportunity to do so." Id. Here, "there is a serious possibility that [DHS] will be able to remedy its [supposed APA] failures," id., and so the district court's mandatory injunction, which causes "serious disruptions," is an abuse of discretion and should be stayed. See Cent. & S. W. Servs. v. EPA, 220 F.3d 683, 692 (5th Cir. 2000); see also 8 U.S.C. § 1252(f)(1); Hamama v. Adducci, 912 F.3d 869, 880 (6th Cir. 2018) (holding § 1252(f)(1) bars such injunctive relief).

CONCLUSION

The Court should issue an immediate administrative stay, and then stay the district court's injunction pending completion of appellate proceedings. If the Court is inclined to deny the stay or administrative stay, the Court should enter an administrative stay for at least seven days to give the government an opportunity to seek emergency relief from the Supreme Court.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

INTRODUCTION

This Court should stay, pending completion of appellate proceedings, the district court's extraordinary injunction. That injunction requires the Department of Homeland Security (DHS)—within seven days—to re-implement the Migrant Protection Protocols (MPP), a former government program through which the Secretary of Homeland Security exercised her discretionary statutory authority to return certain noncitizens arriving at the southern border to Mexico pending removal proceedings. Because the injunction takes effect at 12:01 a.m. on Saturday, August 21, 2021, the government respectfully requests an administrative stay by Thursday, August 19, so that this Court can consider the stay motion in an orderly manner. The government also respectfully requests, if this Court is inclined to deny the stay or deny the administrative stay, that the Court enter an administrative stay of no fewer than seven days to give the government an opportunity to seek emergency relief from the Supreme Court.

A stay is warranted because the district court's legal and factual conclusions are deeply flawed, and its injunctive remedy is legally improper, profoundly disruptive to foreign policy, and virtually impossible to implement on the required timeline. In January 2019, DHS instituted MPP with policy guidance implementing statutory authority in 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C), providing that the Secretary "may return" certain noncitizens "arriving on land ... from a foreign territory contiguous to the United States" "to that territory" pending resolution of their removal proceedings. (emphasis added). Following the change in administration, the acting Secretary temporarily suspended new enrollments in MPP. Following a comprehensive review, on June 1, 2021, the Secretary terminated MPP, finding it unjustified by the resources it required and incompatible with the administration's broader strategy and foreign policy objectives at the time. AR1-7.

Despite the Executive's clear authority to determine immigration policy and § 1225's express commitment of the decision whether to return noncitizens to Mexico to the Secretary's discretion, on August 13, 2021, the district court vacated the Secretary's decision. The court also issued a nationwide, permanent injunction requiring DHS "to enforce and implement MPP in good faith until such a time as it has been lawfully rescinded in compliance with the APA and until such a time as the federal government has sufficient detention capacity to detain all aliens subject to mandatory detention under Section [1225] without releasing any aliens because of a lack of detention resources." Op. 52. That injunction is set to take effect at 12:01 a.m. on Saturday, August 21. Id. at 53; see Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(a)(1).

The district court's order is wrong in multiple respects. Section 1225(b)(2)(C) is discretionary: the Secretary may—not must—return noncitizens to Mexico or Canada. Contrary to the district court's conclusion, nothing in the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA) dictates how that discretion must be exercised, let alone suggests that it must be exercised if DHS cannot detain every noncitizen arriving at the border who is placed in removal proceedings. The district court's contrary conclusion would mean that until MPP was created in 2019, every Administration had been in continuous and systematic violation of the INA since the relevant provisions were enacted in 1996. The district court also erred by finding that the Secretary's decision violated the Administrative Procedure Act (APA). The Secretary issued a thorough, seven-page memo—based on a 691-page administrative record—that reviewed MPP's "mixed effectiveness" and acknowledged the competing policy considerations. The Secretary then forthrightly grounded his decision in a policy choice to devote DHS's scarce resources to pursuing measures that he judged to be more effective and consistent with this Administration's priorities in managing the challenges of regional migration. In finding that comprehensive explanation insufficient, the district court contravened settled APA precedent holding that, when the government changes policy, "it suffices that the new policy is permissible under the statute, that there are good reasons for it, and that the agency believes it to be better," F.C.C. v. Fox Television Stations, Inc., 556 U.S. 502, 515 (2009).

A stay is urgently need because the injunction will impose immediate, substantial harms on the United States by causing operational chaos at the international border. It will also severely interfere in foreign affairs by effectively dictating foreign policy with respect to Mexico and Central American nations. This Court should grant an immediate administrative stay while it receives briefing and considers this stay request, and then stay the district court's injunction pending appellate proceedings. Appellate courts confronting similar injunctive orders have recognized that a stay pending appellate proceedings is warranted. See Wolf v. Innovation Law Lab, 140 S. Ct. 1564 (2020); Innovation Law Lab v. McAleenan, 924 F.3d 503, 510 (9th Cir. 2019).

BACKGROUND

Legal Background. The Executive Branch has broad constitutional and statutory power over the administration and enforcement of the nation's immigration laws. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U.S. 537, 543 (1950); see, e.g., 6 U.S.C. § 202(5); 8 U.S.C. § 1103(a)(3). For decades, the Executive has exercised that authority through prosecutorial discretion to prioritize which noncitizens to remove and through what type of proceedings. See Matter of E-R-M- & L-R-M-, 25 I.&N. Dec. 520, 523 (BIA 2011).

First, Congress has authorized DHS to initiate expedited removal proceedings in 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(1) against certain applicants for admission who lack valid entry documents.[1] Alternatively, the Secretary may place a noncitizen seeking admission into full removal proceedings held before an immigration judge with potential appeal to the Board of Immigration Appeals, § 1229a, if that noncitizen is not "clearly and beyond a doubt entitled to be admitted." Id. § 1225(b)(2)(A). The statute leaves to DHS's discretion whether to seek expedited or full removal against noncitizens. E-R-M-, 25 I.&N. Dec. at 523. When DHS places noncitizens into proceedings under § 1229a, Congress has provided that, if the noncitizen is "arriving on land (whether or not at a designated port of arrival) from a foreign territory contiguous to the United States," the Secretary "may return the alien to that territory pending a proceeding under section 1229a." Id. § 1225(b)(2)(C). The statute also authorizes DHS, within certain limits, to choose between detaining applicants for admission pending their removal proceedings and releasing them pending those proceedings. Id. §§ 1182(d)(5), 1225(b)(2)(A), 1226(a).

Migrant Protection Protocols. On January 25, 2019, then-Secretary Nielsen instituted MPP, authorizing immigration officers to "exercise[e] [their] prosecutorial discretion regarding whether" to return to Mexico certain classes of noncitizens arriving from Mexico, and providing guidance for making that determination. See Administrative Record (AR) 151. Implementing MPP required the assistance of Mexico, which took a variety of steps to assist the United States and the individuals who were returned under the program. AR152-53. In April, 2020, however, immigration proceedings were suspended in light of the COVID-19 pandemic

(including for noncitizens waiting in Mexico under MPP), and DHS's use of MPP dramatically decreased as many noncitizens encountered at the border were instead expelled under 42 U.S.C. §§ 265, 268 based on an order from the CDC. AR3, 6.

On January 21, 2021, the acting Secretary "suspend[ed] new enrollments in [MPP], pending further review of the program." AR581. President Biden subsequently directed DHS "to promptly review and determine whether to terminate or modify [MPP]." Executive Order 14010, 86 Fed. Reg. 8267 (Feb 2, 2021). And on June 1, 2021, the Secretary announced that he was terminating MPP and explained his decision in a lengthy memorandum. AR1-7.

This Lawsuit. On April 13, 2021, the States of Missouri and Texas filed this suit in the Northern District of Texas, seeking injunctive relief. On August 13, following a one-day bench trial, the district court issued a nationwide injunction requiring DHS "to enforce and implement MPP." Op. 52, Dkt. 94 (Ex. A). The court concluded that the case is justiciable (Op. 21-34); that § 1225(b)(2)(C) mandates returning noncitizens to Mexico whenever DHS lacks the resources to detain them (Op. 32, 41-44); that the Secretary's decision terminating MPP violated the APA (Op. 31-42); and that a nationwide injunction with monthly reporting requirements, rather than remand without vacatur, was appropriate (Op. 45-52). The court delayed the effective date of its ruling to August 21, 2021. Op. 53. The government promptly appealed, and the district court subsequently denied the government's request for a stay pending appeal. ECF 100.

ARGUMENT

An immediate stay pending appeal is warranted. The government is likely to prevail and will be severely and irreparably harmed without a stay; a stay will not substantially harm Plaintiffs; and the public interest supports a stay. See Nken v. Holder, 556 U.S. 418, 425-26 (2009). The Court should also grant an administrative stay while it considers this request. At an absolute minimum, the Court should grant an administrative stay to give the government an opportunity to seek emergency relief from the Supreme Court.

I. Defendants are likely to succeed on appeal.

A. MPP's termination is not reviewable

The district court erred in holding the Secretary's decision is reviewable. Op. 26-34.

At the outset, the States lack standing to pursue their claims. The district court held that the States are suffering cognizable injuries from the termination of MPP, Op. 49, primarily based on speculation about an increase in "the number of aliens released and paroled" who will seek driver's licenses. Id. at 22. But there is no evidence below that either State has issued a single driver's license to any individual who would have been subject to MPP but for its termination, nor did the States substantiate any other costs directly traceable to MPP's termination. Cf. Texas v. U.S., 809 F.3d 134, 155, 160 (5th Cir. 2015) (driver's license theory of standing requires evidence that the States had "to hire employees, purchase equipment, and obtain office space"). Moreover, the alleged harm is not redressable because MPP did not require that anyone be returned, nor could anyone be returned pursuant to MPP without Mexico's agreement. See Lin v. United States, 690 F. App'x 7, 9 (D.C. Cir. 2017) (redressability cannot be shown where relief requires action by "foreign nations not before the court") (collecting cases).

Even if the States had standing, the agency decision is unreviewable. The APA precludes review of certain categories of decisions traditionally regarded as "committed to agency discretion," Lincoln v. Vigil, 508 U.S. 182, 191 (1993)); 5 U.S.C. § 701(a)(2), and the INA similarly prohibits review of any "decision or action" of the Secretary "the authority for which is specified under this subchapter to be in [his] discretion," 8 U.S.C. § 1252(a)(2)(B)(ii). Both of those provisions separately shield from review the Secretary's decision whether to use the contiguous-territory-return authority, which is entirely discretionary: the Secretary "may return" certain noncitizens to a contiguous territory. 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C) (emphasis added). Congress's use of the term "may" "connotes discretion." Jama v. ICE, 543 U.S. 335, 346 (2005). "[T]he statutory scheme … provides absolutely no guidance as to how that discretion is to be exercised." Texas v. United States, 809

F.3d 164, 168 (5th Cir. 2015). Even the district court acknowledged it could not dictate to the Secretary whether to return an individual noncitizen. Op. 51. And for the same reason, the court cannot dictate that the Secretary must "authorize line-level officers to [return noncitizens to Mexico]." Contra id.

In addition, whether to use § 1225(b)(2)(C)'s "return" authority in an individual case or class of cases represents an exercise of enforcement discretion, because it involves a "complicated balancing" of factors "peculiarly within [the Executive's] expertise," such as how to best expend limited "agency resources" and whether a "particular enforcement action … fits the agency's overall policies." Heckler v. Chaney, 470 U.S. 821, 831 (1985). The concerns justifying prosecutorial discretion are "greatly magnified in the [immigration] context," Crane v. Johnson, 783 F.3d 244, 247 (5th Cir. 2015), which implicates the "dynamic nature of relations with other countries" and the need for enforcement policies to be "consistent with this Nation's foreign policy," Arizona v. United States, 567 U.S. 387, 397 (2012). Here, the Secretary weighed these concerns and determined that other strategies would be more effective and better align with foreign policy goals, AR1-7, and it was improper for the district court to displace his judgment.

The district court concluded that "the decision to terminate MPP 'is more than a non-enforcement policy.'" Op. 31 (quoting DHS v. Regents of the Univ. of California, 140 S. Ct. 1891, 1905 (2020)). But decisions on how and where to secure

noncitizens during removal proceedings, and whether to detain them at all, are quintessential enforcement decisions inextricably intertwined with the decision to pursue removal. Gupta v. McGahey, 709 F.3d 1062, 1065 (11th Cir. 2013). And unlike the DACA program at issue in Regents, the Secretary's decision not to subject applicants for admission to contiguous-territory return does not itself confer any affirmative legal benefits or status.

The district court also erred in concluding that § 1225(b) provides a standard that the court could apply. Op. 32. In the court's view, because § 1225(b)(2)(A) references detention of noncitizens placed in § 1229a proceedings, "DHS must use its authority to return aliens to Mexico when an influx of aliens exceeds DHS's detention capacity." Op. 32. But that understanding of the statute is patently incorrect, as explained below. Infra p. 12.

Finally, the decision to terminate MPP is not a reviewable final agency action, 5 U.S.C. § 704, because it does not determine "rights or obligations" or produce "legal consequences." Bennett v. Spear, 520 U.S. 154, 178 (1997). The June 2021 memorandum ending MPP, like the January 2019 memorandum establishing "MPP[,] qualifies as a general statement of policy." Innovation Law Lab v. McAleenan, 924 F.3d 503, 509 (9th Cir. 2019). A "general statement of policy … is not a 'final agency action,' rendering it unreviewable," Cohen v. United States, 578 F.3d 1, 6 (D.C. Cir. 2009), opinion vacated in part on other grounds, 650 F.3d 717

(D.C. Cir. 2011) (en banc), unless and until it is applied "in a particular situation" to a regulated entity. Nat'l Min. Ass'n v. McCarthy, 758 F.3d 243, 253 (D.C. Cir. 2014) (Kavanaugh, J.); Texas v. Equal Emp. Opportunity Comm'n, 933 F.3d 433, 441 (5th Cir. 2019) (similar).

B. Terminating MPP does not violate § 1225.

The district court acknowledged that "DHS does not have to use [the return] authority." Op. 32. The court nevertheless held that terminating MPP violated § 1225, which provides that certain noncitizens "shall be detained" for removal proceedings. 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(A). In the court's view, "where Defendants cannot meet their detention obligations" due to "resource constraints," Op. 44, § 1225(b) "directs DHS ... to return certain aliens to Mexico," Op. 32, so "terminating MPP necessarily leads to the systemic violation of Section 1225 as aliens are released into the United States because Defendants are unable to detain them." Op. 44. That conclusion misconceives the statutory scheme and would upend decades of practice spanning multiple administrations.

To start, the operative complaint challenges the June 1 memorandum, not any policies governing release from detention. See ECF 48 ¶¶ 95-141. Even if the court were right that § 1225 mandated detention, nothing in the statute suggests a direct relationship between that purported detention mandate and the return authority, such that the Secretary is required to return any noncitizen he fails to detain. The return

authority is explicitly discretionary. Supra p. 8. Accordingly, a violation of any detention mandate would be just that—a violation of the detention mandate. Plaintiffs cannot bootstrap their objections to DHS's alleged detention practices into a basis for invalidating the Secretary's separate decision whether to continue using his contiguous-territory-return authority.[2]

In any event, § 1225 does not mandate universal detention. The INA provides DHS with various options for processing noncitizens beyond discretionary returns or detention. DHS "may ... in [its] discretion" release a noncitizen placed in § 1229a proceedings through "parole" "for urgent humanitarian reasons or significant public benefit." 8 U.S.C. § 1182(d)(5)(A) (emphasis added); see 8 C.F.R. §§ 1.2, 235.3(c). And in certain circumstances, "pending a decision on whether the alien is to be removed" and "[e]xcept as provided in [§ 1226(c)]," noncitizens present in the United States may be released on "bond" or "conditional parole," § 1226(a)(2)(A)-(B).

Subject to specific legal constraints, Congress entrusted the decision whether to detain, release, or return a particular noncitizen to the Secretary's discretion by using discretionary language and barring judicial review. 8 U.S.C. § 1182(d)(5)(A)

[2] Given Plaintiffs' claims, the administrative record did not contain evidence concerning release practices and policies. The court independently abused its discretion by relying on "evidence outside the administrative record." Lousiana ex rel. Guste v. Verity, 853 F.2d 322, 327 n.8 (5th Cir. 1988).

(Secretary "may … in his discretion parole") ; id., § 1225(b)(2)(C) ("may return"); Loa-Herrera v. Trominski, 231 F.3d 984, 991 & n.12 (5th Cir. 2000) ("[Secretary's] discretionary judgment regarding the application of [§ 1226]—including the manner in which that discretionary judgment is exercised, and whether the procedural apparatus supplied satisfies regulatory, statutory, and constitutional constraints—is not ... subject to review.") (citing 8 U.S.C. § 1226(e))). The district court's core legal analysis is thus categorically mistaken: the statute does not impose on DHS a binary choice between detention or return to Mexico for noncitizens arriving from Mexico.[3]

Further proof of the error in the district court's detain-or-return reasoning is found in the history of the return provision, and the absurd results that would follow from the court's view. Congress enacted § 1225(b)(2)(C) in 1996, to codify statutory authority for ad hoc returns that the Board had found lacking. In re M-D-C-V-, 28 I.&N. Dec. 18, 25-26 & n.10 (B.I.A. 2020). But MPP—and its broad use of return authority—came into existence only in 2019. AR151. By the district court's logic, Op. 32, every presidential administration for the last 25 years has been systematically violating § 1225 by paroling or otherwise releasing millions of inadmissible applicants for admission rather than returning them to Mexico. And under the injunction, all future administrations will be required to return all eligible noncitizens arriving from Mexico until the government can detain every applicant for admission—a condition that has never existed. Nothing in the INA remotely supports that extreme result.

[3] The Court's characterization of contiguous return as an alternative to detention under § 1225(b)(1), Op. 32, 41-43, is particularly misguided, as noncitizens in ongoing expedited removal proceedings are not eligible for contiguous return, § 1225(b)(2)(B)(ii).

The district court compounded its error by concluding that § 1182 does not permit DHS to parole noncitizens "simply because DHS does not have the detention capacity." Op. 43 n.11. The Court lacked jurisdiction to reach that conclusion, supra 12-13. Regardless, it is the agency, not the court, that determines what is a "significant public benefit," § 1182(d)(5), that warrants parole, 8 C.F.R. §212.5(b)(5) ("parole" for "significant public benefit" includes "[a]liens whose continued detention is not in the public interest as determined by" relevant officers), and that determination has always encompassed resource constraints, see Padilla v. Immigr. & Customs Enf't, 953 F.3d 1134, 1145 (9th Cir. 2020), vacated on other grounds, 141 S. Ct. 1041 (2021) (describing ICE policy allowing parole "in light of available detention resources"); ECF 98-1, ¶¶ 13-14 (same).

C. The Secretary's decision to terminate MPP satisfies the APA.

The Secretary's decision easily satisfies the APA's "highly deferential" standard, Avoyelles Sportsmen's League, Inc. v. Marsh, 715 F.2d 897, 904 (5th Cir. 1983), because it is fully explained and supported by the record, acknowledges the agency's change of position, and is within the range of possible options. The

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Secretary's 7-page decision articulates a clear connection between terminating MPP and achieving the Administration's objectives to address the root causes of migration, improve regional migration management, and expand bilateral efforts to combat smuggling and trafficking networks. The Secretary described how he considered the relevant information, including the prior administration's assessments of MPP, the effectiveness of related efforts to address challenges, and the resources required to implement the program, concluding that "MPP had mixed effectiveness in achieving several of its central goals and that the program experienced significant challenges." AR3; see 192-203, 426-58, 468-487, 543-50, 589-621, 651-53. He also considered alternatives and the impact of terminating MPP. AR5. Ultimately, the Secretary found that, "on balance, any benefits of maintaining … MPP are far outweighed by the benefits of terminating the program." AR6.

That comprehensive analysis amply satisfies the APA's deferential standard of review: "the new policy is permissible under the statute, [] there are good reasons for it, and [] the agency believes it to be better, which the conscious change of course adequately indicates." Fox, 556 U.S. at 515-16. To the extent the Secretary reached different conclusions than those set out in prior MPP assessments, he adequately explained why subsequent developments or different foreign-policy priorities warranted changes. Nothing more is required. Id.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The district court's contrary ruling is deeply flawed. The court stated that DHS "ignored critical factors," such as prior assessments regarding MPP's goal of encouraging noncitizens without meritorious claims to return home. Op. 35-36. But the memorandum, and lengthy record supporting it, show that the Secretary evaluated all "prior DHS assessments of the program," and "the anticipated benefits and goals articulated at the outset of the program and over [its] course." AR3, see also 151, 192-203, 452, 490, 543, 554-56. Rather than ignore "the importance of deterring meritless asylum applications," Op. 36, the Secretary simply exercised his judgment and discretion to address that problem using different policy tools. For example, the Secretary described other "reforms" the Administration is undertaking—including creation of a dedicated docket for certain arriving noncitizens—to improve the processing of asylum applications and "promote compliance and increase appearances throughout proceedings." AR6 (noting "additional anticipated regulatory and policy changes").

The Secretary also noted ways in which MPP had failed to accomplish this particular goal effectively. The Secretary observed that DHS "originally intended the program to more quickly adjudicate legitimate asylum claims and clear asylum backlogs," but that in fact, "backlogs increased." AR4, see AR187, 653. Moreover, the Secretary concluded that the "focus on speed was not always matched with sufficient efforts to ensure that conditions in Mexico enabled migrants to attend their proceedings," and the "approximately 44 percent" of "cases completed through the entry of in absentia removal orders" raised questions for him "about the design and operation of the program." AR4; see AR557-80, 634-38, 660-63. Although MPP was "intended to reduce burdens" on DHS personnel and resources, "the program imposed additional responsibilities that detracted from [DHS's] critically important mission sets." AR4, 452-55, 660-73.

The district court also concluded that the Secretary had failed to consider "warnings by career DHS personnel" that terminating MPP might "lead to a resurgence of illegal aliens attempting to illegally" enter. Op. 37. Again, the record establishes that the Secretary did not ignore that problem; he sought to address it using different strategies that he reasonably believed would "improve border management and reduce migration surges more effectively and more sustainably than MPP." AR5. Moreover, the court's ruling is based entirely on inadmissible hearsay about what prior DHS officials believe other officials may have told the presidential transition team. But the transition team is not the agency, and those statements are "not part of the administrative record." Op. 37. n.10. The actual administrative record showed that over a quarter of MPP enrollees were subsequently reencountered attempting to enter—meaning MPP produced, at least in those cases, additional border encounters. AR4, 660-73.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The court next stated that DHS had failed to consider the States' "fiscal harm from the termination of MPP." Op. 37. But the States submitted no evidence of additional costs since April 2020, when MPP enrollments significantly declined, or since January 2021, when new enrollments were suspended. AR3. The court's insistence that DHS was required to investigate whether border encounters increased after new enrollments were suspended, id., makes little sense given that MPP enrollments declined much earlier due to COVID-19 and Title 42. Regardless, the Secretary did consider "the impact such a decision could have on border management and border communities." AR4-5, 582, 680. And the court's conclusion that the Secretary failed to consider State reliance interests, Op. 37-38, is meritless given that the States have no cognizable reliance interest in a discretionary program, and did not identify any "substantial," long-held reliance interests they possess. See Encino Motorcars v. Navarro, 136 S. Ct. 2117, 2126 (2016).

The district court also held the Secretary had failed to consider "more limited policies" than terminating MPP, Op. 38, but the Secretary expressly "considered various alternatives, including maintaining the status quo or resuming new enrollments in the program," and concluded that "preserving MPP in this manner" would "be a poor use of [DHS] resources" given the identified defects in the program as it operated. AR5. "DHS was not required … to 'consider all policy alternatives in reaching [its] decision,'" and has "considerable flexibility" when deciding how to

"wind-down" a program. Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1914-15 (quoting Motor Vehicle Mfrs. v. State Farm, 463 U.S. 29, 51 (1983)). The court's conclusion that DHS was required to set out "example" alternative versions of MPP, Op. 38, reflects a misunderstanding of APA review.

The district court also erred by finding that the Secretary acted arbitrarily when he concluded that the high rate of in absentia removal orders under MPP raised concerns about MPP, without definitively establishing that those orders "resulted from aliens abandoning meritorious asylum claims." Op. 39-41. But the Secretary reasonably found that MPP did not adequately "ensure that conditions in Mexico enabled migrants to attend their proceedings," which was supported by record evidence showing a substantially lower in absentia rate for non-MPP cases over the same period. AR660-63. The APA "imposes no general obligation on agencies to conduct or commission their own empirical or statistical studies," F.C.C. v. Prometheus Radio, 141 S. Ct. 1150, 1160 (2021), and often "the available data does not settle a regulatory issue and the agency must then exercise its judgment." State Farm, 463 U.S. at 52. If, as here, "the agency's reasons and policy choices conform to minimal standards of rationality, then its actions are reasonable and must be upheld." Texas Oil & Gas Ass'n v. EPA, 161 F.3d 923, 934 (5th Cir. 1998).[4]

[4] The court also ruled it was arbitrary to consider COVID-related immigration court closures because courts had reopened, Op. 41. But infrastructure used for MPP remains shuttered. ECF 98-2, ¶¶ 10-11.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Finally, as explained above, the district court's conclusion that DHS failed to consider section 1225(b)'s supposed requirement to return noncitizens that it does not detain, Op. 41-42, is based on an erroneous legal premise. Regardless, the Secretary considered "various options" "at its disposal," "including detention, alternatives to detention, and case management programs" that "have been shown to be successful in promoting compliance with immigration requirements." AR6; see 8-146, 560, 563, 569-75, 675-76.

II. The balance of equities strongly favors a stay.

The injunction undermines the Executive Branch's constitutional and statutory authority to enforce the immigration laws, and constitutes a major and "unwarranted judicial interference in the conduct of foreign policy." Kiobel v. Royal Dutch Petroleum, 569 U.S. 108, 116 (2013); see Arizona, 567 U.S. at 396 ("Some discretionary decisions [in the enforcement of immigration law] involve policy choices that bear on this Nation's international relations.").

MPP depended on returned individuals being able to reside temporarily in Mexico, which necessitated "close collaboration and negotiation with the Government of Mexico." ECF 64 at 2, ¶ 5. When first implemented, Mexico took "steps critical to [MPP's] functioning," including committing "personnel and infrastructure to receive individuals" and providing essential services. ECF 98-1, ¶ 15. DHS cannot restart MPP without significant cooperation from Mexico. Id.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Requiring DHS to re-implement MPP is thus tantamount telling the United States how to conduct its foreign policy, including with respect to delicate and ongoing discussions with Mexico. Id. ¶¶ 9-15; ECF 98-3, ¶¶ 7-20. The court's statement that DHS can simply unilaterally reinstitute MPP and send non-Mexican nationals to Mexico without its agreement, Op. 49 n.15, is both astonishing and utterly refuted by the record.

Ordering DHS to immediately "implement MPP," Op. 52, would also cause severe damage to ongoing efforts to manage migration and combat criminal networks by requiring diplomatic and DHS resources be shifted to restarting MPP. AR6. DHS has been in the process of unwinding MPP and its infrastructure for months, and restarting it would "involve significant and complicated burdens on border security personnel and resources," undermining other high-priority efforts and critically important DHS missions. AR2-3, 5-7, 587-88; ECF 64 at 5, ¶ 10-11; ECF 98-1, ¶¶ 15-20. Reinstating MPP would "require new and costly investments from both governments to re-establish the infrastructure that sat dormant for more than a year due to COVID-19." ECF 64 at 8-10, ¶¶ 16-18. That undertaking cannot be accomplished in a safe, orderly, and humane manner in a matter of days. And the injunction's requirement that the government build or obtain "sufficient detention capacity to detain all aliens subject to" the district court's extreme view of § 1225(b), and not "releas[e] any aliens because of lack of detention resources," Op. 52, would similarly upend the government's ability to prioritize finite enforcement resources. ECF 98-1, ¶ 5, 9-14.

These extraordinary and unprecedented harms dwarf those of the States, which submitted no evidence that they incurred any additional costs after MPP enrollments declined in April 2020 or since new enrollments ended. Supra p.7. Without evidence of concrete harm, Plaintiffs cannot even establish Article III standing, much less harm from a stay pending appeal.

A stay pending appeal is thus particularly appropriate, as there is no plausible "way to restore the status quo ante" in seven days, Sugar Cane Growers v. Veneman, 289 F.3d 89, 97 (D.C. Cir. 2002), and attempting to do so would cause massive disruption and implicate issues "intricately interwoven with contemporaneous policies in regard to the conduct of foreign relations," Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U.S. 580, 588-89 (1952). For similar reasons, even if this Court agreed with the district court that the agency has not adequately considered relevant factors or explained its decision, remand without vacatur and without an injunction would be the only appropriate remedy. Texas Ass'n of Mfrs. v. U.S. Consumer Prod. Safety Comm'n, 989 F.3d 368, 389 (5th Cir. 2021). "Remand, not vacatur, is generally appropriate when there is at least a serious possibility that the agency will be able to substantiate its decision given an opportunity to do so." Id. Here, "there is a serious possibility that [DHS] will be able to remedy its [supposed APA] failures," id., and so the district court's mandatory injunction, which causes "serious disruptions," is an abuse of discretion and should be stayed. See Cent. & S. W. Servs. v. EPA, 220 F.3d 683, 692 (5th Cir. 2000); see also 8 U.S.C. § 1252(f)(1); Hamama v. Adducci, 912 F.3d 869, 880 (6th Cir. 2018) (holding § 1252(f)(1) bars such injunctive relief).

CONCLUSION

The Court should issue an immediate administrative stay, and then stay the district court's injunction pending completion of appellate proceedings. If the Court is inclined to deny the stay or administrative stay, the Court should enter an administrative stay for at least seven days to give the government an opportunity to seek emergency relief from the Supreme Court.

INTRODUCTION

This Court should stay, pending completion of appellate proceedings, the district court's extraordinary injunction. That injunction requires the Department of Homeland Security (DHS)—within seven days—to re-implement the Migrant Protection Protocols (MPP), a former government program through which the Secretary of Homeland Security exercised her discretionary statutory authority to return certain noncitizens arriving at the southern border to Mexico pending removal proceedings. Because the injunction takes effect at 12:01 a.m. on Saturday, August 21, 2021, the government respectfully requests an administrative stay by Thursday, August 19, so that this Court can consider the stay motion in an orderly manner. The government also respectfully requests, if this Court is inclined to deny the stay or deny the administrative stay, that the Court enter an administrative stay of no fewer than seven days to give the government an opportunity to seek emergency relief from the Supreme Court.

A stay is warranted because the district court's legal and factual conclusions are deeply flawed, and its injunctive remedy is legally improper, profoundly disruptive to foreign policy, and virtually impossible to implement on the required timeline. In January 2019, DHS instituted MPP with policy guidance implementing statutory authority in 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C), providing that the Secretary "may return" certain noncitizens "arriving on land ... from a foreign territory contiguous to the United States" "to that territory" pending resolution of their removal proceedings. (emphasis added). Following the change in administration, the acting Secretary temporarily suspended new enrollments in MPP. Following a comprehensive review, on June 1, 2021, the Secretary terminated MPP, finding it unjustified by the resources it required and incompatible with the administration's broader strategy and foreign policy objectives at the time. AR1-7.

Despite the Executive's clear authority to determine immigration policy and § 1225's express commitment of the decision whether to return noncitizens to Mexico to the Secretary's discretion, on August 13, 2021, the district court vacated the Secretary's decision. The court also issued a nationwide, permanent injunction requiring DHS "to enforce and implement MPP in good faith until such a time as it has been lawfully rescinded in compliance with the APA and until such a time as the federal government has sufficient detention capacity to detain all aliens subject to mandatory detention under Section [1225] without releasing any aliens because of a lack of detention resources." Op. 52. That injunction is set to take effect at 12:01 a.m. on Saturday, August 21. Id. at 53; see Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(a)(1).

The district court's order is wrong in multiple respects. Section 1225(b)(2)(C) is discretionary: the Secretary may—not must—return noncitizens to Mexico or Canada. Contrary to the district court's conclusion, nothing in the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA) dictates how that discretion must be exercised, let alone suggests that it must be exercised if DHS cannot detain every noncitizen arriving at the border who is placed in removal proceedings. The district court's contrary conclusion would mean that until MPP was created in 2019, every Administration had been in continuous and systematic violation of the INA since the relevant provisions were enacted in 1996. The district court also erred by finding that the Secretary's decision violated the Administrative Procedure Act (APA). The Secretary issued a thorough, seven-page memo—based on a 691-page administrative record—that reviewed MPP's "mixed effectiveness" and acknowledged the competing policy considerations. The Secretary then forthrightly grounded his decision in a policy choice to devote DHS's scarce resources to pursuing measures that he judged to be more effective and consistent with this Administration's priorities in managing the challenges of regional migration. In finding that comprehensive explanation insufficient, the district court contravened settled APA precedent holding that, when the government changes policy, "it suffices that the new policy is permissible under the statute, that there are good reasons for it, and that the agency believes it to be better," F.C.C. v. Fox Television Stations, Inc., 556 U.S. 502, 515 (2009).

A stay is urgently need because the injunction will impose immediate, substantial harms on the United States by causing operational chaos at the international border. It will also severely interfere in foreign affairs by effectively dictating foreign policy with respect to Mexico and Central American nations. This Court should grant an immediate administrative stay while it receives briefing and considers this stay request, and then stay the district court's injunction pending appellate proceedings. Appellate courts confronting similar injunctive orders have recognized that a stay pending appellate proceedings is warranted. See Wolf v. Innovation Law Lab, 140 S. Ct. 1564 (2020); Innovation Law Lab v. McAleenan, 924 F.3d 503, 510 (9th Cir. 2019).

BACKGROUND

Legal Background. The Executive Branch has broad constitutional and statutory power over the administration and enforcement of the nation's immigration laws. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U.S. 537, 543 (1950); see, e.g., 6 U.S.C. § 202(5); 8 U.S.C. § 1103(a)(3). For decades, the Executive has exercised that authority through prosecutorial discretion to prioritize which noncitizens to remove and through what type of proceedings. See Matter of E-R-M- & L-R-M-, 25 I.&N. Dec. 520, 523 (BIA 2011).

First, Congress has authorized DHS to initiate expedited removal proceedings in 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(1) against certain applicants for admission who lack valid entry documents.[1] Alternatively, the Secretary may place a noncitizen seeking admission into full removal proceedings held before an immigration judge with potential appeal to the Board of Immigration Appeals, § 1229a, if that noncitizen is not "clearly and beyond a doubt entitled to be admitted." Id. § 1225(b)(2)(A). The statute leaves to DHS's discretion whether to seek expedited or full removal against noncitizens. E-R-M-, 25 I.&N. Dec. at 523. When DHS places noncitizens into proceedings under § 1229a, Congress has provided that, if the noncitizen is "arriving on land (whether or not at a designated port of arrival) from a foreign territory contiguous to the United States," the Secretary "may return the alien to that territory pending a proceeding under section 1229a." Id. § 1225(b)(2)(C). The statute also authorizes DHS, within certain limits, to choose between detaining applicants for admission pending their removal proceedings and releasing them pending those proceedings. Id. §§ 1182(d)(5), 1225(b)(2)(A), 1226(a).

Migrant Protection Protocols. On January 25, 2019, then-Secretary Nielsen instituted MPP, authorizing immigration officers to "exercise[e] [their] prosecutorial discretion regarding whether" to return to Mexico certain classes of noncitizens arriving from Mexico, and providing guidance for making that determination. See Administrative Record (AR) 151. Implementing MPP required the assistance of Mexico, which took a variety of steps to assist the United States and the individuals who were returned under the program. AR152-53. In April, 2020, however, immigration proceedings were suspended in light of the COVID-19 pandemic

(including for noncitizens waiting in Mexico under MPP), and DHS's use of MPP dramatically decreased as many noncitizens encountered at the border were instead expelled under 42 U.S.C. §§ 265, 268 based on an order from the CDC. AR3, 6.

On January 21, 2021, the acting Secretary "suspend[ed] new enrollments in [MPP], pending further review of the program." AR581. President Biden subsequently directed DHS "to promptly review and determine whether to terminate or modify [MPP]." Executive Order 14010, 86 Fed. Reg. 8267 (Feb 2, 2021). And on June 1, 2021, the Secretary announced that he was terminating MPP and explained his decision in a lengthy memorandum. AR1-7.

This Lawsuit. On April 13, 2021, the States of Missouri and Texas filed this suit in the Northern District of Texas, seeking injunctive relief. On August 13, following a one-day bench trial, the district court issued a nationwide injunction requiring DHS "to enforce and implement MPP." Op. 52, Dkt. 94 (Ex. A). The court concluded that the case is justiciable (Op. 21-34); that § 1225(b)(2)(C) mandates returning noncitizens to Mexico whenever DHS lacks the resources to detain them (Op. 32, 41-44); that the Secretary's decision terminating MPP violated the APA (Op. 31-42); and that a nationwide injunction with monthly reporting requirements, rather than remand without vacatur, was appropriate (Op. 45-52). The court delayed the effective date of its ruling to August 21, 2021. Op. 53. The government promptly appealed, and the district court subsequently denied the government's request for a stay pending appeal. ECF 100.

ARGUMENT

An immediate stay pending appeal is warranted. The government is likely to prevail and will be severely and irreparably harmed without a stay; a stay will not substantially harm Plaintiffs; and the public interest supports a stay. See Nken v. Holder, 556 U.S. 418, 425-26 (2009). The Court should also grant an administrative stay while it considers this request. At an absolute minimum, the Court should grant an administrative stay to give the government an opportunity to seek emergency relief from the Supreme Court.

I. Defendants are likely to succeed on appeal.

A. MPP's termination is not reviewable

The district court erred in holding the Secretary's decision is reviewable. Op. 26-34.

At the outset, the States lack standing to pursue their claims. The district court held that the States are suffering cognizable injuries from the termination of MPP, Op. 49, primarily based on speculation about an increase in "the number of aliens released and paroled" who will seek driver's licenses. Id. at 22. But there is no evidence below that either State has issued a single driver's license to any individual who would have been subject to MPP but for its termination, nor did the States substantiate any other costs directly traceable to MPP's termination. Cf. Texas v. U.S., 809 F.3d 134, 155, 160 (5th Cir. 2015) (driver's license theory of standing requires evidence that the States had "to hire employees, purchase equipment, and obtain office space"). Moreover, the alleged harm is not redressable because MPP did not require that anyone be returned, nor could anyone be returned pursuant to MPP without Mexico's agreement. See Lin v. United States, 690 F. App'x 7, 9 (D.C. Cir. 2017) (redressability cannot be shown where relief requires action by "foreign nations not before the court") (collecting cases).

Even if the States had standing, the agency decision is unreviewable. The APA precludes review of certain categories of decisions traditionally regarded as "committed to agency discretion," Lincoln v. Vigil, 508 U.S. 182, 191 (1993)); 5 U.S.C. § 701(a)(2), and the INA similarly prohibits review of any "decision or action" of the Secretary "the authority for which is specified under this subchapter to be in [his] discretion," 8 U.S.C. § 1252(a)(2)(B)(ii). Both of those provisions separately shield from review the Secretary's decision whether to use the contiguous-territory-return authority, which is entirely discretionary: the Secretary "may return" certain noncitizens to a contiguous territory. 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C) (emphasis added). Congress's use of the term "may" "connotes discretion." Jama v. ICE, 543 U.S. 335, 346 (2005). "[T]he statutory scheme … provides absolutely no guidance as to how that discretion is to be exercised." Texas v. United States, 809

F.3d 164, 168 (5th Cir. 2015). Even the district court acknowledged it could not dictate to the Secretary whether to return an individual noncitizen. Op. 51. And for the same reason, the court cannot dictate that the Secretary must "authorize line-level officers to [return noncitizens to Mexico]." Contra id.

In addition, whether to use § 1225(b)(2)(C)'s "return" authority in an individual case or class of cases represents an exercise of enforcement discretion, because it involves a "complicated balancing" of factors "peculiarly within [the Executive's] expertise," such as how to best expend limited "agency resources" and whether a "particular enforcement action … fits the agency's overall policies." Heckler v. Chaney, 470 U.S. 821, 831 (1985). The concerns justifying prosecutorial discretion are "greatly magnified in the [immigration] context," Crane v. Johnson, 783 F.3d 244, 247 (5th Cir. 2015), which implicates the "dynamic nature of relations with other countries" and the need for enforcement policies to be "consistent with this Nation's foreign policy," Arizona v. United States, 567 U.S. 387, 397 (2012). Here, the Secretary weighed these concerns and determined that other strategies would be more effective and better align with foreign policy goals, AR1-7, and it was improper for the district court to displace his judgment.

The district court concluded that "the decision to terminate MPP 'is more than a non-enforcement policy.'" Op. 31 (quoting DHS v. Regents of the Univ. of California, 140 S. Ct. 1891, 1905 (2020)). But decisions on how and where to secure

noncitizens during removal proceedings, and whether to detain them at all, are quintessential enforcement decisions inextricably intertwined with the decision to pursue removal. Gupta v. McGahey, 709 F.3d 1062, 1065 (11th Cir. 2013). And unlike the DACA program at issue in Regents, the Secretary's decision not to subject applicants for admission to contiguous-territory return does not itself confer any affirmative legal benefits or status.

The district court also erred in concluding that § 1225(b) provides a standard that the court could apply. Op. 32. In the court's view, because § 1225(b)(2)(A) references detention of noncitizens placed in § 1229a proceedings, "DHS must use its authority to return aliens to Mexico when an influx of aliens exceeds DHS's detention capacity." Op. 32. But that understanding of the statute is patently incorrect, as explained below. Infra p. 12.

Finally, the decision to terminate MPP is not a reviewable final agency action, 5 U.S.C. § 704, because it does not determine "rights or obligations" or produce "legal consequences." Bennett v. Spear, 520 U.S. 154, 178 (1997). The June 2021 memorandum ending MPP, like the January 2019 memorandum establishing "MPP[,] qualifies as a general statement of policy." Innovation Law Lab v. McAleenan, 924 F.3d 503, 509 (9th Cir. 2019). A "general statement of policy … is not a 'final agency action,' rendering it unreviewable," Cohen v. United States, 578 F.3d 1, 6 (D.C. Cir. 2009), opinion vacated in part on other grounds, 650 F.3d 717

(D.C. Cir. 2011) (en banc), unless and until it is applied "in a particular situation" to a regulated entity. Nat'l Min. Ass'n v. McCarthy, 758 F.3d 243, 253 (D.C. Cir. 2014) (Kavanaugh, J.); Texas v. Equal Emp. Opportunity Comm'n, 933 F.3d 433, 441 (5th Cir. 2019) (similar).

B. Terminating MPP does not violate § 1225.

The district court acknowledged that "DHS does not have to use [the return] authority." Op. 32. The court nevertheless held that terminating MPP violated § 1225, which provides that certain noncitizens "shall be detained" for removal proceedings. 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(A). In the court's view, "where Defendants cannot meet their detention obligations" due to "resource constraints," Op. 44, § 1225(b) "directs DHS ... to return certain aliens to Mexico," Op. 32, so "terminating MPP necessarily leads to the systemic violation of Section 1225 as aliens are released into the United States because Defendants are unable to detain them." Op. 44. That conclusion misconceives the statutory scheme and would upend decades of practice spanning multiple administrations.

To start, the operative complaint challenges the June 1 memorandum, not any policies governing release from detention. See ECF 48 ¶¶ 95-141. Even if the court were right that § 1225 mandated detention, nothing in the statute suggests a direct relationship between that purported detention mandate and the return authority, such that the Secretary is required to return any noncitizen he fails to detain. The return

authority is explicitly discretionary. Supra p. 8. Accordingly, a violation of any detention mandate would be just that—a violation of the detention mandate. Plaintiffs cannot bootstrap their objections to DHS's alleged detention practices into a basis for invalidating the Secretary's separate decision whether to continue using his contiguous-territory-return authority.[2]

In any event, § 1225 does not mandate universal detention. The INA provides DHS with various options for processing noncitizens beyond discretionary returns or detention. DHS "may ... in [its] discretion" release a noncitizen placed in § 1229a proceedings through "parole" "for urgent humanitarian reasons or significant public benefit." 8 U.S.C. § 1182(d)(5)(A) (emphasis added); see 8 C.F.R. §§ 1.2, 235.3(c). And in certain circumstances, "pending a decision on whether the alien is to be removed" and "[e]xcept as provided in [§ 1226(c)]," noncitizens present in the United States may be released on "bond" or "conditional parole," § 1226(a)(2)(A)-(B).

Subject to specific legal constraints, Congress entrusted the decision whether to detain, release, or return a particular noncitizen to the Secretary's discretion by using discretionary language and barring judicial review. 8 U.S.C. § 1182(d)(5)(A)

[2] Given Plaintiffs' claims, the administrative record did not contain evidence concerning release practices and policies. The court independently abused its discretion by relying on "evidence outside the administrative record." Lousiana ex rel. Guste v. Verity, 853 F.2d 322, 327 n.8 (5th Cir. 1988).

(Secretary "may … in his discretion parole") ; id., § 1225(b)(2)(C) ("may return"); Loa-Herrera v. Trominski, 231 F.3d 984, 991 & n.12 (5th Cir. 2000) ("[Secretary's] discretionary judgment regarding the application of [§ 1226]—including the manner in which that discretionary judgment is exercised, and whether the procedural apparatus supplied satisfies regulatory, statutory, and constitutional constraints—is not ... subject to review.") (citing 8 U.S.C. § 1226(e))). The district court's core legal analysis is thus categorically mistaken: the statute does not impose on DHS a binary choice between detention or return to Mexico for noncitizens arriving from Mexico.[3]

Further proof of the error in the district court's detain-or-return reasoning is found in the history of the return provision, and the absurd results that would follow from the court's view. Congress enacted § 1225(b)(2)(C) in 1996, to codify statutory authority for ad hoc returns that the Board had found lacking. In re M-D-C-V-, 28 I.&N. Dec. 18, 25-26 & n.10 (B.I.A. 2020). But MPP—and its broad use of return authority—came into existence only in 2019. AR151. By the district court's logic, Op. 32, every presidential administration for the last 25 years has been systematically violating § 1225 by paroling or otherwise releasing millions of inadmissible applicants for admission rather than returning them to Mexico. And under the injunction, all future administrations will be required to return all eligible noncitizens arriving from Mexico until the government can detain every applicant for admission—a condition that has never existed. Nothing in the INA remotely supports that extreme result.

[3] The Court's characterization of contiguous return as an alternative to detention under § 1225(b)(1), Op. 32, 41-43, is particularly misguided, as noncitizens in ongoing expedited removal proceedings are not eligible for contiguous return, § 1225(b)(2)(B)(ii).

The district court compounded its error by concluding that § 1182 does not permit DHS to parole noncitizens "simply because DHS does not have the detention capacity." Op. 43 n.11. The Court lacked jurisdiction to reach that conclusion, supra 12-13. Regardless, it is the agency, not the court, that determines what is a "significant public benefit," § 1182(d)(5), that warrants parole, 8 C.F.R. §212.5(b)(5) ("parole" for "significant public benefit" includes "[a]liens whose continued detention is not in the public interest as determined by" relevant officers), and that determination has always encompassed resource constraints, see Padilla v. Immigr. & Customs Enf't, 953 F.3d 1134, 1145 (9th Cir. 2020), vacated on other grounds, 141 S. Ct. 1041 (2021) (describing ICE policy allowing parole "in light of available detention resources"); ECF 98-1, ¶¶ 13-14 (same).

C. The Secretary's decision to terminate MPP satisfies the APA.

The Secretary's decision easily satisfies the APA's "highly deferential" standard, Avoyelles Sportsmen's League, Inc. v. Marsh, 715 F.2d 897, 904 (5th Cir. 1983), because it is fully explained and supported by the record, acknowledges the agency's change of position, and is within the range of possible options. The

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Secretary's 7-page decision articulates a clear connection between terminating MPP and achieving the Administration's objectives to address the root causes of migration, improve regional migration management, and expand bilateral efforts to combat smuggling and trafficking networks. The Secretary described how he considered the relevant information, including the prior administration's assessments of MPP, the effectiveness of related efforts to address challenges, and the resources required to implement the program, concluding that "MPP had mixed effectiveness in achieving several of its central goals and that the program experienced significant challenges." AR3; see 192-203, 426-58, 468-487, 543-50, 589-621, 651-53. He also considered alternatives and the impact of terminating MPP. AR5. Ultimately, the Secretary found that, "on balance, any benefits of maintaining … MPP are far outweighed by the benefits of terminating the program." AR6.

That comprehensive analysis amply satisfies the APA's deferential standard of review: "the new policy is permissible under the statute, [] there are good reasons for it, and [] the agency believes it to be better, which the conscious change of course adequately indicates." Fox, 556 U.S. at 515-16. To the extent the Secretary reached different conclusions than those set out in prior MPP assessments, he adequately explained why subsequent developments or different foreign-policy priorities warranted changes. Nothing more is required. Id.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The district court's contrary ruling is deeply flawed. The court stated that DHS "ignored critical factors," such as prior assessments regarding MPP's goal of encouraging noncitizens without meritorious claims to return home. Op. 35-36. But the memorandum, and lengthy record supporting it, show that the Secretary evaluated all "prior DHS assessments of the program," and "the anticipated benefits and goals articulated at the outset of the program and over [its] course." AR3, see also 151, 192-203, 452, 490, 543, 554-56. Rather than ignore "the importance of deterring meritless asylum applications," Op. 36, the Secretary simply exercised his judgment and discretion to address that problem using different policy tools. For example, the Secretary described other "reforms" the Administration is undertaking—including creation of a dedicated docket for certain arriving noncitizens—to improve the processing of asylum applications and "promote compliance and increase appearances throughout proceedings." AR6 (noting "additional anticipated regulatory and policy changes").

The Secretary also noted ways in which MPP had failed to accomplish this particular goal effectively. The Secretary observed that DHS "originally intended the program to more quickly adjudicate legitimate asylum claims and clear asylum backlogs," but that in fact, "backlogs increased." AR4, see AR187, 653. Moreover, the Secretary concluded that the "focus on speed was not always matched with sufficient efforts to ensure that conditions in Mexico enabled migrants to attend their proceedings," and the "approximately 44 percent" of "cases completed through the entry of in absentia removal orders" raised questions for him "about the design and operation of the program." AR4; see AR557-80, 634-38, 660-63. Although MPP was "intended to reduce burdens" on DHS personnel and resources, "the program imposed additional responsibilities that detracted from [DHS's] critically important mission sets." AR4, 452-55, 660-73.

The district court also concluded that the Secretary had failed to consider "warnings by career DHS personnel" that terminating MPP might "lead to a resurgence of illegal aliens attempting to illegally" enter. Op. 37. Again, the record establishes that the Secretary did not ignore that problem; he sought to address it using different strategies that he reasonably believed would "improve border management and reduce migration surges more effectively and more sustainably than MPP." AR5. Moreover, the court's ruling is based entirely on inadmissible hearsay about what prior DHS officials believe other officials may have told the presidential transition team. But the transition team is not the agency, and those statements are "not part of the administrative record." Op. 37. n.10. The actual administrative record showed that over a quarter of MPP enrollees were subsequently reencountered attempting to enter—meaning MPP produced, at least in those cases, additional border encounters. AR4, 660-73.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The court next stated that DHS had failed to consider the States' "fiscal harm from the termination of MPP." Op. 37. But the States submitted no evidence of additional costs since April 2020, when MPP enrollments significantly declined, or since January 2021, when new enrollments were suspended. AR3. The court's insistence that DHS was required to investigate whether border encounters increased after new enrollments were suspended, id., makes little sense given that MPP enrollments declined much earlier due to COVID-19 and Title 42. Regardless, the Secretary did consider "the impact such a decision could have on border management and border communities." AR4-5, 582, 680. And the court's conclusion that the Secretary failed to consider State reliance interests, Op. 37-38, is meritless given that the States have no cognizable reliance interest in a discretionary program, and did not identify any "substantial," long-held reliance interests they possess. See Encino Motorcars v. Navarro, 136 S. Ct. 2117, 2126 (2016).

The district court also held the Secretary had failed to consider "more limited policies" than terminating MPP, Op. 38, but the Secretary expressly "considered various alternatives, including maintaining the status quo or resuming new enrollments in the program," and concluded that "preserving MPP in this manner" would "be a poor use of [DHS] resources" given the identified defects in the program as it operated. AR5. "DHS was not required … to 'consider all policy alternatives in reaching [its] decision,'" and has "considerable flexibility" when deciding how to

"wind-down" a program. Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1914-15 (quoting Motor Vehicle Mfrs. v. State Farm, 463 U.S. 29, 51 (1983)). The court's conclusion that DHS was required to set out "example" alternative versions of MPP, Op. 38, reflects a misunderstanding of APA review.

The district court also erred by finding that the Secretary acted arbitrarily when he concluded that the high rate of in absentia removal orders under MPP raised concerns about MPP, without definitively establishing that those orders "resulted from aliens abandoning meritorious asylum claims." Op. 39-41. But the Secretary reasonably found that MPP did not adequately "ensure that conditions in Mexico enabled migrants to attend their proceedings," which was supported by record evidence showing a substantially lower in absentia rate for non-MPP cases over the same period. AR660-63. The APA "imposes no general obligation on agencies to conduct or commission their own empirical or statistical studies," F.C.C. v. Prometheus Radio, 141 S. Ct. 1150, 1160 (2021), and often "the available data does not settle a regulatory issue and the agency must then exercise its judgment." State Farm, 463 U.S. at 52. If, as here, "the agency's reasons and policy choices conform to minimal standards of rationality, then its actions are reasonable and must be upheld." Texas Oil & Gas Ass'n v. EPA, 161 F.3d 923, 934 (5th Cir. 1998).[4]

[4] The court also ruled it was arbitrary to consider COVID-related immigration court closures because courts had reopened, Op. 41. But infrastructure used for MPP remains shuttered. ECF 98-2, ¶¶ 10-11.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Finally, as explained above, the district court's conclusion that DHS failed to consider section 1225(b)'s supposed requirement to return noncitizens that it does not detain, Op. 41-42, is based on an erroneous legal premise. Regardless, the Secretary considered "various options" "at its disposal," "including detention, alternatives to detention, and case management programs" that "have been shown to be successful in promoting compliance with immigration requirements." AR6; see 8-146, 560, 563, 569-75, 675-76.

II. The balance of equities strongly favors a stay.

The injunction undermines the Executive Branch's constitutional and statutory authority to enforce the immigration laws, and constitutes a major and "unwarranted judicial interference in the conduct of foreign policy." Kiobel v. Royal Dutch Petroleum, 569 U.S. 108, 116 (2013); see Arizona, 567 U.S. at 396 ("Some discretionary decisions [in the enforcement of immigration law] involve policy choices that bear on this Nation's international relations.").

MPP depended on returned individuals being able to reside temporarily in Mexico, which necessitated "close collaboration and negotiation with the Government of Mexico." ECF 64 at 2, ¶ 5. When first implemented, Mexico took "steps critical to [MPP's] functioning," including committing "personnel and infrastructure to receive individuals" and providing essential services. ECF 98-1, ¶ 15. DHS cannot restart MPP without significant cooperation from Mexico. Id.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Requiring DHS to re-implement MPP is thus tantamount telling the United States how to conduct its foreign policy, including with respect to delicate and ongoing discussions with Mexico. Id. ¶¶ 9-15; ECF 98-3, ¶¶ 7-20. The court's statement that DHS can simply unilaterally reinstitute MPP and send non-Mexican nationals to Mexico without its agreement, Op. 49 n.15, is both astonishing and utterly refuted by the record.

Ordering DHS to immediately "implement MPP," Op. 52, would also cause severe damage to ongoing efforts to manage migration and combat criminal networks by requiring diplomatic and DHS resources be shifted to restarting MPP. AR6. DHS has been in the process of unwinding MPP and its infrastructure for months, and restarting it would "involve significant and complicated burdens on border security personnel and resources," undermining other high-priority efforts and critically important DHS missions. AR2-3, 5-7, 587-88; ECF 64 at 5, ¶ 10-11; ECF 98-1, ¶¶ 15-20. Reinstating MPP would "require new and costly investments from both governments to re-establish the infrastructure that sat dormant for more than a year due to COVID-19." ECF 64 at 8-10, ¶¶ 16-18. That undertaking cannot be accomplished in a safe, orderly, and humane manner in a matter of days. And the injunction's requirement that the government build or obtain "sufficient detention capacity to detain all aliens subject to" the district court's extreme view of § 1225(b), and not "releas[e] any aliens because of lack of detention resources," Op. 52, would similarly upend the government's ability to prioritize finite enforcement resources. ECF 98-1, ¶ 5, 9-14.

These extraordinary and unprecedented harms dwarf those of the States, which submitted no evidence that they incurred any additional costs after MPP enrollments declined in April 2020 or since new enrollments ended. Supra p.7. Without evidence of concrete harm, Plaintiffs cannot even establish Article III standing, much less harm from a stay pending appeal.

A stay pending appeal is thus particularly appropriate, as there is no plausible "way to restore the status quo ante" in seven days, Sugar Cane Growers v. Veneman, 289 F.3d 89, 97 (D.C. Cir. 2002), and attempting to do so would cause massive disruption and implicate issues "intricately interwoven with contemporaneous policies in regard to the conduct of foreign relations," Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U.S. 580, 588-89 (1952). For similar reasons, even if this Court agreed with the district court that the agency has not adequately considered relevant factors or explained its decision, remand without vacatur and without an injunction would be the only appropriate remedy. Texas Ass'n of Mfrs. v. U.S. Consumer Prod. Safety Comm'n, 989 F.3d 368, 389 (5th Cir. 2021). "Remand, not vacatur, is generally appropriate when there is at least a serious possibility that the agency will be able to substantiate its decision given an opportunity to do so." Id. Here, "there is a serious possibility that [DHS] will be able to remedy its [supposed APA] failures," id., and so the district court's mandatory injunction, which causes "serious disruptions," is an abuse of discretion and should be stayed. See Cent. & S. W. Servs. v. EPA, 220 F.3d 683, 692 (5th Cir. 2000); see also 8 U.S.C. § 1252(f)(1); Hamama v. Adducci, 912 F.3d 869, 880 (6th Cir. 2018) (holding § 1252(f)(1) bars such injunctive relief).

CONCLUSION

The Court should issue an immediate administrative stay, and then stay the district court's injunction pending completion of appellate proceedings. If the Court is inclined to deny the stay or administrative stay, the Court should enter an administrative stay for at least seven days to give the government an opportunity to seek emergency relief from the Supreme Court.

INTRODUCTION

This Court should stay, pending completion of appellate proceedings, the district court's extraordinary injunction. That injunction requires the Department of Homeland Security (DHS)—within seven days—to re-implement the Migrant Protection Protocols (MPP), a former government program through which the Secretary of Homeland Security exercised her discretionary statutory authority to return certain noncitizens arriving at the southern border to Mexico pending removal proceedings. Because the injunction takes effect at 12:01 a.m. on Saturday, August 21, 2021, the government respectfully requests an administrative stay by Thursday, August 19, so that this Court can consider the stay motion in an orderly manner. The government also respectfully requests, if this Court is inclined to deny the stay or deny the administrative stay, that the Court enter an administrative stay of no fewer than seven days to give the government an opportunity to seek emergency relief from the Supreme Court.

A stay is warranted because the district court's legal and factual conclusions are deeply flawed, and its injunctive remedy is legally improper, profoundly disruptive to foreign policy, and virtually impossible to implement on the required timeline. In January 2019, DHS instituted MPP with policy guidance implementing statutory authority in 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C), providing that the Secretary "may return" certain noncitizens "arriving on land ... from a foreign territory contiguous to the United States" "to that territory" pending resolution of their removal proceedings. (emphasis added). Following the change in administration, the acting Secretary temporarily suspended new enrollments in MPP. Following a comprehensive review, on June 1, 2021, the Secretary terminated MPP, finding it unjustified by the resources it required and incompatible with the administration's broader strategy and foreign policy objectives at the time. AR1-7.

Despite the Executive's clear authority to determine immigration policy and § 1225's express commitment of the decision whether to return noncitizens to Mexico to the Secretary's discretion, on August 13, 2021, the district court vacated the Secretary's decision. The court also issued a nationwide, permanent injunction requiring DHS "to enforce and implement MPP in good faith until such a time as it has been lawfully rescinded in compliance with the APA and until such a time as the federal government has sufficient detention capacity to detain all aliens subject to mandatory detention under Section [1225] without releasing any aliens because of a lack of detention resources." Op. 52. That injunction is set to take effect at 12:01 a.m. on Saturday, August 21. Id. at 53; see Fed. R. Civ. P. 6(a)(1).

The district court's order is wrong in multiple respects. Section 1225(b)(2)(C) is discretionary: the Secretary may—not must—return noncitizens to Mexico or Canada. Contrary to the district court's conclusion, nothing in the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA) dictates how that discretion must be exercised, let alone suggests that it must be exercised if DHS cannot detain every noncitizen arriving at the border who is placed in removal proceedings. The district court's contrary conclusion would mean that until MPP was created in 2019, every Administration had been in continuous and systematic violation of the INA since the relevant provisions were enacted in 1996. The district court also erred by finding that the Secretary's decision violated the Administrative Procedure Act (APA). The Secretary issued a thorough, seven-page memo—based on a 691-page administrative record—that reviewed MPP's "mixed effectiveness" and acknowledged the competing policy considerations. The Secretary then forthrightly grounded his decision in a policy choice to devote DHS's scarce resources to pursuing measures that he judged to be more effective and consistent with this Administration's priorities in managing the challenges of regional migration. In finding that comprehensive explanation insufficient, the district court contravened settled APA precedent holding that, when the government changes policy, "it suffices that the new policy is permissible under the statute, that there are good reasons for it, and that the agency believes it to be better," F.C.C. v. Fox Television Stations, Inc., 556 U.S. 502, 515 (2009).

A stay is urgently need because the injunction will impose immediate, substantial harms on the United States by causing operational chaos at the international border. It will also severely interfere in foreign affairs by effectively dictating foreign policy with respect to Mexico and Central American nations. This Court should grant an immediate administrative stay while it receives briefing and considers this stay request, and then stay the district court's injunction pending appellate proceedings. Appellate courts confronting similar injunctive orders have recognized that a stay pending appellate proceedings is warranted. See Wolf v. Innovation Law Lab, 140 S. Ct. 1564 (2020); Innovation Law Lab v. McAleenan, 924 F.3d 503, 510 (9th Cir. 2019).

BACKGROUND

Legal Background. The Executive Branch has broad constitutional and statutory power over the administration and enforcement of the nation's immigration laws. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U.S. 537, 543 (1950); see, e.g., 6 U.S.C. § 202(5); 8 U.S.C. § 1103(a)(3). For decades, the Executive has exercised that authority through prosecutorial discretion to prioritize which noncitizens to remove and through what type of proceedings. See Matter of E-R-M- & L-R-M-, 25 I.&N. Dec. 520, 523 (BIA 2011).

First, Congress has authorized DHS to initiate expedited removal proceedings in 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(1) against certain applicants for admission who lack valid entry documents.[1] Alternatively, the Secretary may place a noncitizen seeking admission into full removal proceedings held before an immigration judge with potential appeal to the Board of Immigration Appeals, § 1229a, if that noncitizen is not "clearly and beyond a doubt entitled to be admitted." Id. § 1225(b)(2)(A). The statute leaves to DHS's discretion whether to seek expedited or full removal against noncitizens. E-R-M-, 25 I.&N. Dec. at 523. When DHS places noncitizens into proceedings under § 1229a, Congress has provided that, if the noncitizen is "arriving on land (whether or not at a designated port of arrival) from a foreign territory contiguous to the United States," the Secretary "may return the alien to that territory pending a proceeding under section 1229a." Id. § 1225(b)(2)(C). The statute also authorizes DHS, within certain limits, to choose between detaining applicants for admission pending their removal proceedings and releasing them pending those proceedings. Id. §§ 1182(d)(5), 1225(b)(2)(A), 1226(a).

Migrant Protection Protocols. On January 25, 2019, then-Secretary Nielsen instituted MPP, authorizing immigration officers to "exercise[e] [their] prosecutorial discretion regarding whether" to return to Mexico certain classes of noncitizens arriving from Mexico, and providing guidance for making that determination. See Administrative Record (AR) 151. Implementing MPP required the assistance of Mexico, which took a variety of steps to assist the United States and the individuals who were returned under the program. AR152-53. In April, 2020, however, immigration proceedings were suspended in light of the COVID-19 pandemic

(including for noncitizens waiting in Mexico under MPP), and DHS's use of MPP dramatically decreased as many noncitizens encountered at the border were instead expelled under 42 U.S.C. §§ 265, 268 based on an order from the CDC. AR3, 6.

On January 21, 2021, the acting Secretary "suspend[ed] new enrollments in [MPP], pending further review of the program." AR581. President Biden subsequently directed DHS "to promptly review and determine whether to terminate or modify [MPP]." Executive Order 14010, 86 Fed. Reg. 8267 (Feb 2, 2021). And on June 1, 2021, the Secretary announced that he was terminating MPP and explained his decision in a lengthy memorandum. AR1-7.

This Lawsuit. On April 13, 2021, the States of Missouri and Texas filed this suit in the Northern District of Texas, seeking injunctive relief. On August 13, following a one-day bench trial, the district court issued a nationwide injunction requiring DHS "to enforce and implement MPP." Op. 52, Dkt. 94 (Ex. A). The court concluded that the case is justiciable (Op. 21-34); that § 1225(b)(2)(C) mandates returning noncitizens to Mexico whenever DHS lacks the resources to detain them (Op. 32, 41-44); that the Secretary's decision terminating MPP violated the APA (Op. 31-42); and that a nationwide injunction with monthly reporting requirements, rather than remand without vacatur, was appropriate (Op. 45-52). The court delayed the effective date of its ruling to August 21, 2021. Op. 53. The government promptly appealed, and the district court subsequently denied the government's request for a stay pending appeal. ECF 100.

ARGUMENT

An immediate stay pending appeal is warranted. The government is likely to prevail and will be severely and irreparably harmed without a stay; a stay will not substantially harm Plaintiffs; and the public interest supports a stay. See Nken v. Holder, 556 U.S. 418, 425-26 (2009). The Court should also grant an administrative stay while it considers this request. At an absolute minimum, the Court should grant an administrative stay to give the government an opportunity to seek emergency relief from the Supreme Court.

I. Defendants are likely to succeed on appeal.

A. MPP's termination is not reviewable

The district court erred in holding the Secretary's decision is reviewable. Op. 26-34.

At the outset, the States lack standing to pursue their claims. The district court held that the States are suffering cognizable injuries from the termination of MPP, Op. 49, primarily based on speculation about an increase in "the number of aliens released and paroled" who will seek driver's licenses. Id. at 22. But there is no evidence below that either State has issued a single driver's license to any individual who would have been subject to MPP but for its termination, nor did the States substantiate any other costs directly traceable to MPP's termination. Cf. Texas v. U.S., 809 F.3d 134, 155, 160 (5th Cir. 2015) (driver's license theory of standing requires evidence that the States had "to hire employees, purchase equipment, and obtain office space"). Moreover, the alleged harm is not redressable because MPP did not require that anyone be returned, nor could anyone be returned pursuant to MPP without Mexico's agreement. See Lin v. United States, 690 F. App'x 7, 9 (D.C. Cir. 2017) (redressability cannot be shown where relief requires action by "foreign nations not before the court") (collecting cases).

Even if the States had standing, the agency decision is unreviewable. The APA precludes review of certain categories of decisions traditionally regarded as "committed to agency discretion," Lincoln v. Vigil, 508 U.S. 182, 191 (1993)); 5 U.S.C. § 701(a)(2), and the INA similarly prohibits review of any "decision or action" of the Secretary "the authority for which is specified under this subchapter to be in [his] discretion," 8 U.S.C. § 1252(a)(2)(B)(ii). Both of those provisions separately shield from review the Secretary's decision whether to use the contiguous-territory-return authority, which is entirely discretionary: the Secretary "may return" certain noncitizens to a contiguous territory. 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C) (emphasis added). Congress's use of the term "may" "connotes discretion." Jama v. ICE, 543 U.S. 335, 346 (2005). "[T]he statutory scheme … provides absolutely no guidance as to how that discretion is to be exercised." Texas v. United States, 809

F.3d 164, 168 (5th Cir. 2015). Even the district court acknowledged it could not dictate to the Secretary whether to return an individual noncitizen. Op. 51. And for the same reason, the court cannot dictate that the Secretary must "authorize line-level officers to [return noncitizens to Mexico]." Contra id.

In addition, whether to use § 1225(b)(2)(C)'s "return" authority in an individual case or class of cases represents an exercise of enforcement discretion, because it involves a "complicated balancing" of factors "peculiarly within [the Executive's] expertise," such as how to best expend limited "agency resources" and whether a "particular enforcement action … fits the agency's overall policies." Heckler v. Chaney, 470 U.S. 821, 831 (1985). The concerns justifying prosecutorial discretion are "greatly magnified in the [immigration] context," Crane v. Johnson, 783 F.3d 244, 247 (5th Cir. 2015), which implicates the "dynamic nature of relations with other countries" and the need for enforcement policies to be "consistent with this Nation's foreign policy," Arizona v. United States, 567 U.S. 387, 397 (2012). Here, the Secretary weighed these concerns and determined that other strategies would be more effective and better align with foreign policy goals, AR1-7, and it was improper for the district court to displace his judgment.

The district court concluded that "the decision to terminate MPP 'is more than a non-enforcement policy.'" Op. 31 (quoting DHS v. Regents of the Univ. of California, 140 S. Ct. 1891, 1905 (2020)). But decisions on how and where to secure

noncitizens during removal proceedings, and whether to detain them at all, are quintessential enforcement decisions inextricably intertwined with the decision to pursue removal. Gupta v. McGahey, 709 F.3d 1062, 1065 (11th Cir. 2013). And unlike the DACA program at issue in Regents, the Secretary's decision not to subject applicants for admission to contiguous-territory return does not itself confer any affirmative legal benefits or status.

The district court also erred in concluding that § 1225(b) provides a standard that the court could apply. Op. 32. In the court's view, because § 1225(b)(2)(A) references detention of noncitizens placed in § 1229a proceedings, "DHS must use its authority to return aliens to Mexico when an influx of aliens exceeds DHS's detention capacity." Op. 32. But that understanding of the statute is patently incorrect, as explained below. Infra p. 12.

Finally, the decision to terminate MPP is not a reviewable final agency action, 5 U.S.C. § 704, because it does not determine "rights or obligations" or produce "legal consequences." Bennett v. Spear, 520 U.S. 154, 178 (1997). The June 2021 memorandum ending MPP, like the January 2019 memorandum establishing "MPP[,] qualifies as a general statement of policy." Innovation Law Lab v. McAleenan, 924 F.3d 503, 509 (9th Cir. 2019). A "general statement of policy … is not a 'final agency action,' rendering it unreviewable," Cohen v. United States, 578 F.3d 1, 6 (D.C. Cir. 2009), opinion vacated in part on other grounds, 650 F.3d 717

(D.C. Cir. 2011) (en banc), unless and until it is applied "in a particular situation" to a regulated entity. Nat'l Min. Ass'n v. McCarthy, 758 F.3d 243, 253 (D.C. Cir. 2014) (Kavanaugh, J.); Texas v. Equal Emp. Opportunity Comm'n, 933 F.3d 433, 441 (5th Cir. 2019) (similar).

B. Terminating MPP does not violate § 1225.

The district court acknowledged that "DHS does not have to use [the return] authority." Op. 32. The court nevertheless held that terminating MPP violated § 1225, which provides that certain noncitizens "shall be detained" for removal proceedings. 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(A). In the court's view, "where Defendants cannot meet their detention obligations" due to "resource constraints," Op. 44, § 1225(b) "directs DHS ... to return certain aliens to Mexico," Op. 32, so "terminating MPP necessarily leads to the systemic violation of Section 1225 as aliens are released into the United States because Defendants are unable to detain them." Op. 44. That conclusion misconceives the statutory scheme and would upend decades of practice spanning multiple administrations.

To start, the operative complaint challenges the June 1 memorandum, not any policies governing release from detention. See ECF 48 ¶¶ 95-141. Even if the court were right that § 1225 mandated detention, nothing in the statute suggests a direct relationship between that purported detention mandate and the return authority, such that the Secretary is required to return any noncitizen he fails to detain. The return

authority is explicitly discretionary. Supra p. 8. Accordingly, a violation of any detention mandate would be just that—a violation of the detention mandate. Plaintiffs cannot bootstrap their objections to DHS's alleged detention practices into a basis for invalidating the Secretary's separate decision whether to continue using his contiguous-territory-return authority.[2]

In any event, § 1225 does not mandate universal detention. The INA provides DHS with various options for processing noncitizens beyond discretionary returns or detention. DHS "may ... in [its] discretion" release a noncitizen placed in § 1229a proceedings through "parole" "for urgent humanitarian reasons or significant public benefit." 8 U.S.C. § 1182(d)(5)(A) (emphasis added); see 8 C.F.R. §§ 1.2, 235.3(c). And in certain circumstances, "pending a decision on whether the alien is to be removed" and "[e]xcept as provided in [§ 1226(c)]," noncitizens present in the United States may be released on "bond" or "conditional parole," § 1226(a)(2)(A)-(B).

Subject to specific legal constraints, Congress entrusted the decision whether to detain, release, or return a particular noncitizen to the Secretary's discretion by using discretionary language and barring judicial review. 8 U.S.C. § 1182(d)(5)(A)

[2] Given Plaintiffs' claims, the administrative record did not contain evidence concerning release practices and policies. The court independently abused its discretion by relying on "evidence outside the administrative record." Lousiana ex rel. Guste v. Verity, 853 F.2d 322, 327 n.8 (5th Cir. 1988).

(Secretary "may … in his discretion parole") ; id., § 1225(b)(2)(C) ("may return"); Loa-Herrera v. Trominski, 231 F.3d 984, 991 & n.12 (5th Cir. 2000) ("[Secretary's] discretionary judgment regarding the application of [§ 1226]—including the manner in which that discretionary judgment is exercised, and whether the procedural apparatus supplied satisfies regulatory, statutory, and constitutional constraints—is not ... subject to review.") (citing 8 U.S.C. § 1226(e))). The district court's core legal analysis is thus categorically mistaken: the statute does not impose on DHS a binary choice between detention or return to Mexico for noncitizens arriving from Mexico.[3]

Further proof of the error in the district court's detain-or-return reasoning is found in the history of the return provision, and the absurd results that would follow from the court's view. Congress enacted § 1225(b)(2)(C) in 1996, to codify statutory authority for ad hoc returns that the Board had found lacking. In re M-D-C-V-, 28 I.&N. Dec. 18, 25-26 & n.10 (B.I.A. 2020). But MPP—and its broad use of return authority—came into existence only in 2019. AR151. By the district court's logic, Op. 32, every presidential administration for the last 25 years has been systematically violating § 1225 by paroling or otherwise releasing millions of inadmissible applicants for admission rather than returning them to Mexico. And under the injunction, all future administrations will be required to return all eligible noncitizens arriving from Mexico until the government can detain every applicant for admission—a condition that has never existed. Nothing in the INA remotely supports that extreme result.

[3] The Court's characterization of contiguous return as an alternative to detention under § 1225(b)(1), Op. 32, 41-43, is particularly misguided, as noncitizens in ongoing expedited removal proceedings are not eligible for contiguous return, § 1225(b)(2)(B)(ii).

The district court compounded its error by concluding that § 1182 does not permit DHS to parole noncitizens "simply because DHS does not have the detention capacity." Op. 43 n.11. The Court lacked jurisdiction to reach that conclusion, supra 12-13. Regardless, it is the agency, not the court, that determines what is a "significant public benefit," § 1182(d)(5), that warrants parole, 8 C.F.R. §212.5(b)(5) ("parole" for "significant public benefit" includes "[a]liens whose continued detention is not in the public interest as determined by" relevant officers), and that determination has always encompassed resource constraints, see Padilla v. Immigr. & Customs Enf't, 953 F.3d 1134, 1145 (9th Cir. 2020), vacated on other grounds, 141 S. Ct. 1041 (2021) (describing ICE policy allowing parole "in light of available detention resources"); ECF 98-1, ¶¶ 13-14 (same).

C. The Secretary's decision to terminate MPP satisfies the APA.

The Secretary's decision easily satisfies the APA's "highly deferential" standard, Avoyelles Sportsmen's League, Inc. v. Marsh, 715 F.2d 897, 904 (5th Cir. 1983), because it is fully explained and supported by the record, acknowledges the agency's change of position, and is within the range of possible options. The

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Secretary's 7-page decision articulates a clear connection between terminating MPP and achieving the Administration's objectives to address the root causes of migration, improve regional migration management, and expand bilateral efforts to combat smuggling and trafficking networks. The Secretary described how he considered the relevant information, including the prior administration's assessments of MPP, the effectiveness of related efforts to address challenges, and the resources required to implement the program, concluding that "MPP had mixed effectiveness in achieving several of its central goals and that the program experienced significant challenges." AR3; see 192-203, 426-58, 468-487, 543-50, 589-621, 651-53. He also considered alternatives and the impact of terminating MPP. AR5. Ultimately, the Secretary found that, "on balance, any benefits of maintaining … MPP are far outweighed by the benefits of terminating the program." AR6.

That comprehensive analysis amply satisfies the APA's deferential standard of review: "the new policy is permissible under the statute, [] there are good reasons for it, and [] the agency believes it to be better, which the conscious change of course adequately indicates." Fox, 556 U.S. at 515-16. To the extent the Secretary reached different conclusions than those set out in prior MPP assessments, he adequately explained why subsequent developments or different foreign-policy priorities warranted changes. Nothing more is required. Id.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The district court's contrary ruling is deeply flawed. The court stated that DHS "ignored critical factors," such as prior assessments regarding MPP's goal of encouraging noncitizens without meritorious claims to return home. Op. 35-36. But the memorandum, and lengthy record supporting it, show that the Secretary evaluated all "prior DHS assessments of the program," and "the anticipated benefits and goals articulated at the outset of the program and over [its] course." AR3, see also 151, 192-203, 452, 490, 543, 554-56. Rather than ignore "the importance of deterring meritless asylum applications," Op. 36, the Secretary simply exercised his judgment and discretion to address that problem using different policy tools. For example, the Secretary described other "reforms" the Administration is undertaking—including creation of a dedicated docket for certain arriving noncitizens—to improve the processing of asylum applications and "promote compliance and increase appearances throughout proceedings." AR6 (noting "additional anticipated regulatory and policy changes").

The Secretary also noted ways in which MPP had failed to accomplish this particular goal effectively. The Secretary observed that DHS "originally intended the program to more quickly adjudicate legitimate asylum claims and clear asylum backlogs," but that in fact, "backlogs increased." AR4, see AR187, 653. Moreover, the Secretary concluded that the "focus on speed was not always matched with sufficient efforts to ensure that conditions in Mexico enabled migrants to attend their proceedings," and the "approximately 44 percent" of "cases completed through the entry of in absentia removal orders" raised questions for him "about the design and operation of the program." AR4; see AR557-80, 634-38, 660-63. Although MPP was "intended to reduce burdens" on DHS personnel and resources, "the program imposed additional responsibilities that detracted from [DHS's] critically important mission sets." AR4, 452-55, 660-73.

The district court also concluded that the Secretary had failed to consider "warnings by career DHS personnel" that terminating MPP might "lead to a resurgence of illegal aliens attempting to illegally" enter. Op. 37. Again, the record establishes that the Secretary did not ignore that problem; he sought to address it using different strategies that he reasonably believed would "improve border management and reduce migration surges more effectively and more sustainably than MPP." AR5. Moreover, the court's ruling is based entirely on inadmissible hearsay about what prior DHS officials believe other officials may have told the presidential transition team. But the transition team is not the agency, and those statements are "not part of the administrative record." Op. 37. n.10. The actual administrative record showed that over a quarter of MPP enrollees were subsequently reencountered attempting to enter—meaning MPP produced, at least in those cases, additional border encounters. AR4, 660-73.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The court next stated that DHS had failed to consider the States' "fiscal harm from the termination of MPP." Op. 37. But the States submitted no evidence of additional costs since April 2020, when MPP enrollments significantly declined, or since January 2021, when new enrollments were suspended. AR3. The court's insistence that DHS was required to investigate whether border encounters increased after new enrollments were suspended, id., makes little sense given that MPP enrollments declined much earlier due to COVID-19 and Title 42. Regardless, the Secretary did consider "the impact such a decision could have on border management and border communities." AR4-5, 582, 680. And the court's conclusion that the Secretary failed to consider State reliance interests, Op. 37-38, is meritless given that the States have no cognizable reliance interest in a discretionary program, and did not identify any "substantial," long-held reliance interests they possess. See Encino Motorcars v. Navarro, 136 S. Ct. 2117, 2126 (2016).

The district court also held the Secretary had failed to consider "more limited policies" than terminating MPP, Op. 38, but the Secretary expressly "considered various alternatives, including maintaining the status quo or resuming new enrollments in the program," and concluded that "preserving MPP in this manner" would "be a poor use of [DHS] resources" given the identified defects in the program as it operated. AR5. "DHS was not required … to 'consider all policy alternatives in reaching [its] decision,'" and has "considerable flexibility" when deciding how to

"wind-down" a program. Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1914-15 (quoting Motor Vehicle Mfrs. v. State Farm, 463 U.S. 29, 51 (1983)). The court's conclusion that DHS was required to set out "example" alternative versions of MPP, Op. 38, reflects a misunderstanding of APA review.

The district court also erred by finding that the Secretary acted arbitrarily when he concluded that the high rate of in absentia removal orders under MPP raised concerns about MPP, without definitively establishing that those orders "resulted from aliens abandoning meritorious asylum claims." Op. 39-41. But the Secretary reasonably found that MPP did not adequately "ensure that conditions in Mexico enabled migrants to attend their proceedings," which was supported by record evidence showing a substantially lower in absentia rate for non-MPP cases over the same period. AR660-63. The APA "imposes no general obligation on agencies to conduct or commission their own empirical or statistical studies," F.C.C. v. Prometheus Radio, 141 S. Ct. 1150, 1160 (2021), and often "the available data does not settle a regulatory issue and the agency must then exercise its judgment." State Farm, 463 U.S. at 52. If, as here, "the agency's reasons and policy choices conform to minimal standards of rationality, then its actions are reasonable and must be upheld." Texas Oil & Gas Ass'n v. EPA, 161 F.3d 923, 934 (5th Cir. 1998).[4]

[4] The court also ruled it was arbitrary to consider COVID-related immigration court closures because courts had reopened, Op. 41. But infrastructure used for MPP remains shuttered. ECF 98-2, ¶¶ 10-11.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Finally, as explained above, the district court's conclusion that DHS failed to consider section 1225(b)'s supposed requirement to return noncitizens that it does not detain, Op. 41-42, is based on an erroneous legal premise. Regardless, the Secretary considered "various options" "at its disposal," "including detention, alternatives to detention, and case management programs" that "have been shown to be successful in promoting compliance with immigration requirements." AR6; see 8-146, 560, 563, 569-75, 675-76.

II. The balance of equities strongly favors a stay.

The injunction undermines the Executive Branch's constitutional and statutory authority to enforce the immigration laws, and constitutes a major and "unwarranted judicial interference in the conduct of foreign policy." Kiobel v. Royal Dutch Petroleum, 569 U.S. 108, 116 (2013); see Arizona, 567 U.S. at 396 ("Some discretionary decisions [in the enforcement of immigration law] involve policy choices that bear on this Nation's international relations.").

MPP depended on returned individuals being able to reside temporarily in Mexico, which necessitated "close collaboration and negotiation with the Government of Mexico." ECF 64 at 2, ¶ 5. When first implemented, Mexico took "steps critical to [MPP's] functioning," including committing "personnel and infrastructure to receive individuals" and providing essential services. ECF 98-1, ¶ 15. DHS cannot restart MPP without significant cooperation from Mexico. Id.

Requiring DHS to re-implement MPP is thus tantamount telling the United States how to conduct its foreign policy, including with respect to delicate and ongoing discussions with Mexico. Id. ¶¶ 9-15; ECF 98-3, ¶¶ 7-20. The court's statement that DHS can simply unilaterally reinstitute MPP and send non-Mexican nationals to Mexico without its agreement, Op. 49 n.15, is both astonishing and utterly refuted by the record.

Ordering DHS to immediately "implement MPP," Op. 52, would also cause severe damage to ongoing efforts to manage migration and combat criminal networks by requiring diplomatic and DHS resources be shifted to restarting MPP. AR6. DHS has been in the process of unwinding MPP and its infrastructure for months, and restarting it would "involve significant and complicated burdens on border security personnel and resources," undermining other high-priority efforts and critically important DHS missions. AR2-3, 5-7, 587-88; ECF 64 at 5, ¶ 10-11; ECF 98-1, ¶¶ 15-20. Reinstating MPP would "require new and costly investments from both governments to re-establish the infrastructure that sat dormant for more than a year due to COVID-19." ECF 64 at 8-10, ¶¶ 16-18. That undertaking cannot be accomplished in a safe, orderly, and humane manner in a matter of days. And the injunction's requirement that the government build or obtain "sufficient detention capacity to detain all aliens subject to" the district court's extreme view of § 1225(b), and not "releas[e] any aliens because of lack of detention resources," Op. 52, would similarly upend the government's ability to prioritize finite enforcement resources. ECF 98-1, ¶ 5, 9-14.

These extraordinary and unprecedented harms dwarf those of the States, which submitted no evidence that they incurred any additional costs after MPP enrollments declined in April 2020 or since new enrollments ended. Supra p.7. Without evidence of concrete harm, Plaintiffs cannot even establish Article III standing, much less harm from a stay pending appeal.

A stay pending appeal is thus particularly appropriate, as there is no plausible "way to restore the status quo ante" in seven days, Sugar Cane Growers v. Veneman, 289 F.3d 89, 97 (D.C. Cir. 2002), and attempting to do so would cause massive disruption and implicate issues "intricately interwoven with contemporaneous policies in regard to the conduct of foreign relations," Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U.S. 580, 588-89 (1952). For similar reasons, even if this Court agreed with the district court that the agency has not adequately considered relevant factors or explained its decision, remand without vacatur and without an injunction would be the only appropriate remedy. Texas Ass'n of Mfrs. v. U.S. Consumer Prod. Safety Comm'n, 989 F.3d 368, 389 (5th Cir. 2021). "Remand, not vacatur, is generally appropriate when there is at least a serious possibility that the agency will be able to substantiate its decision given an opportunity to do so." Id. Here, "there is a serious possibility that [DHS] will be able to remedy its [supposed APA] failures," id., and so the district court's mandatory injunction, which causes "serious disruptions," is an abuse of discretion and should be stayed. See Cent. & S. W. Servs. v. EPA, 220 F.3d 683, 692 (5th Cir. 2000); see also 8 U.S.C. § 1252(f)(1); Hamama v. Adducci, 912 F.3d 869, 880 (6th Cir. 2018) (holding § 1252(f)(1) bars such injunctive relief).

CONCLUSION

The Court should issue an immediate administrative stay, and then stay the district court's injunction pending completion of appellate proceedings. If the Court is inclined to deny the stay or administrative stay, the Court should enter an administrative stay for at least seven days to give the government an opportunity to seek emergency relief from the Supreme Court.

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF TEXAS
AMARILLO DIVISION

THE STATE OF TEXAS, THE STATE OF MISSOURI, Plaintiffs, v. JOSEPH R. BIDEN, JR. et al., Defendants.	§ § § § § § § § § §	2:21-CV-067-Z

MEMORANDUM OPINION AND ORDER

The Court enters the below-listed findings of fact and conclusions of law pursuant to Rule 52(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure after a consolidated hearing and trial on the merits on Plaintiff States Texas and Missouri's various claims against the federal Defendants.[1] For the reasons that follow, the Court FINDS and CONCLUDES that Plaintiffs are entitled to relief on their APA and statutory claims against Defendants. The Court will therefore enter judgment in favor of Plaintiffs. The Court also crafts injunctive relief to ensure Plaintiffs receive a full remedy.

I. PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

Only four months old, this case already has a complicated procedural history. Thus, the Court will quickly summarize the record before entering its findings of fact and conclusions of law.

On April 13, 2021, Plaintiffs filed this suit challenging the temporary suspension of the Migrant Protection Protocols ("MPP"). ECF No. 1. MPP was a program implemented by the [1] Defendants are the United States of America; President Biden in his official capacity; the Department of Homeland Security ("DHS") and DHS Secretary Mayorkas in his official capacity; the United States Customs and Border Protection ("CBP") and Acting Commissioner of CBP Troy Miller in his official capacity; the United States Immigration and Customs Enforcement "ICE" and Acting ICE Director Tae Johnson; and the United States Citizenship and Immigration Services ("CIS") and Acting CIS Director Tracy Renaud in her official capacity.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Department of Homeland Security that returned some aliens temporarily to Mexico during the pendency of their removal proceedings. Specifically, Plaintiffs alleged that DHS's "two-sentence, three-line memorandum" that suspended enrollments in the Migrant Protection Protocols pending review of the program was a violation of the APA, 8 U.S.C § 1225, the Constitution, and a binding agreement between Texas and the federal government. See ECF No. 1 at 4; ECF No. 45 (showing the original administrative record to consist solely of the Secretary's January 20 Memorandum without any supporting documentation).

On May 3, Defendants made a motion to transfer this case to the Southern District of Texas. ECF No. 11. On June 3, the Court denied this motion in a written order. See ECF No. 47 at 9 ("Defendants' evidence, taken as a whole, does not establish that the convenience of the parties and witnesses will be enhanced by transferring this case.").

On May 14, Plaintiffs moved for a preliminary injunction. ECF No. 30. But before briefing was concluded, DHS completed its review of MPP and issued a new memorandum (the "June 1 Memorandum") that permanently terminated MPP. ECF No. 46. The Court concluded the June 1 Memorandum mooted Plaintiffs' original complaint but allowed Plaintiffs to amend their complaint and file a new motion seeking to enjoin the June 1 Memorandum. See ECF No. 52 at 3 ("[T]he January 20 Memorandum expired upon the completion of DHS's review of the program.").

Accordingly, Plaintiffs amended their complaint and renewed their motion for a preliminary injunction. See ECF Nos. 48, 53. On June 22, Defendants filed the administrative record. ECF No. 61. Three days later, Defendants filed their response to Plaintiffs' motion. ECF No. 63. Plaintiffs filed their reply on June 30.

But in addition to opposing Plaintiffs' Motion, Defendants also moved to strike the entire appendix attached to Plaintiffs' Motion because it arguably ran afoul of the "record rule." The Court expedited briefing on this motion and denied the motion by written order for the reasons stated in ECF No. 76.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Next, the parties agreed with the Court that this case involved mainly questions of law. Accordingly, the parties favored consolidating the preliminary injunction hearing with the trial on the merits pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 65(a)(2). ECF No. 68. The Court ordered the consolidation, provided notice to the parties, and allowed each party to file a supplemental brief before the hearing. Id.

Lastly, on July 20, two days before the hearing, Defendants filed a notice of a "corrected administrative record." ECF No. 78. By this notice, Defendants added the 2019 DHS assessment of MPP to the administrative record — even though Defendants knew for at least three weeks that the document was not included in the certified administrative record. ECF No. 85 at 2. Plaintiffs moved to strike this last-minute addendum to the administrative record. The Court denied that motion by written order on July 21. ECF No. 85 ("The delay between the government's acquiring knowledge of the missing document and its filing of notice with the Court comes perilously close to undermining the presumption of administrative regularity. But the Court finds the presumption is not overcome in this case.").

On July 22, the Court held a consolidated hearing and bench trial on the merits. The parties filed their proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law on July 27. ECF Nos. 91, 92. The parties also filed supplemental briefs on the scope of relief available to Plaintiffs. ECF Nos. 90, 93. Pursuant to Fed. R. Civ. P. 52(a), the Court may now enter its findings of facts and conclusions of law.

II. EVIDENTIARY OBJECTIONS[2]

1. At the bench trial, Defendants made several objections to Plaintiffs' exhibits which the Court deferred ruling upon. Trial Tr. 8–30. The Court now overrules Defendants' objections under Fed. R. Evid. 401 as the exhibits are relevant to Plaintiffs' claims and overrules Defendants' objections under Fed. R. Evid. 403. "Rule 403 assumes a trial judge is able to discern and weigh the improper inferences that a jury might draw from certain evidence, and then balance those improprieties against probative value and necessity. Certainly, in a bench trial, the same judge can also exclude those improper inferences from his mind in reaching a decision." Gulf States Util. Co. v. Ecodyne Corp., 635 F.2d 517, 519 (5th Cir. Unit A Jan. 1981).

2. The Court overrules Defendants' privilege objections as to Exhibits A10 and C. The content Defendants seek to protect has been in the public record for months. Even if Defendants were unaware of Exhibit A10 and C at the time the exhibits were published, Defendants have been on notice since June 8, 2021, when Plaintiffs filed their Appendix in Support. ECF No. 54. The Court finds Defendants' privilege objections to be untimely and moot.

3. The Court sustains Defendants' hearsay objections under Fed. R. Evid. 802 as to Plaintiffs' Exhibits A-7, A-9, A-11, A-12, A-13, and A-15 to the extent the information within the exhibits is offered for the truth of the matters asserted.

4. The Court overrules Defendants' objections under Fed. R. Evid. 702 as to Plaintiffs' Exhibits D, E, F, F-1, G, G-1, H, H-1, and I. Defendants object to these exhibits, generally arguing Plaintiffs impermissibly offered expert testimony. See ECF No. 92 at 28. Defendants' objections fail to identify with specificity which declarants and which parts of each exhibit were

[2] Citations to Plaintiffs' Appendix in Support, found at ECF No. 54, are labeled App. ###. Citations to the administrative record, found at ECF No. 61, are labeled AR ###.

impermissibly offered. Further, Defendants fail to state with specificity why each declarant is unqualified.

5. Even so, the Court reviewed each declaration and finds Defendants' objections unpersuasive. For example, in reviewing Plaintiffs' Exhibit D, Declaration of Mark Morgan, the Court noted Mark Morgan served as the Acting Commissioner of the United States Customs and Border Patrol from 2019-2021. App. 390. Prior to that service, Mr. Morgan served as the Acting Chief of the United States Immigration and Customs Enforcement. Id. Prior to that assignment, Mr. Morgan served twenty years as an FBI agent. Id. The Court finds Mr. Morgan more than sufficiently qualified to opine and present testimony in the form of a declaration regarding immigration laws, policies, procedures, and practices.

6. Any objections not previously discussed are overruled.

III. FINDINGS OF FACT[3]

1. Because the Court consolidated the hearing on the motion with a trial on the merits, the proper standard for factual findings is the preponderance of the evidence.

A. Overview of the relevant statutory framework

2. Section 1225 of Title 8 of the United States Code establishes procedures for DHS to process aliens who are "applicant[s] for admission" to the United States, whether they arrive at a port of entry or cross the border unlawfully. 8 U.S.C. § 1225(a)(1).

[3] In preparing this memorandum opinion and order, the Court carefully considered the trial arguments, the record, and the admitted exhibits and applied the standard in this circuit for findings of fact and conclusions of law. See Century Marine Inc. v. United States, 153 F.3d 225, 231 (5th Cir. 1998) (discussing standard for findings and conclusions under Rule 52). In accordance with that standard, the Court has not set out its findings and conclusions in "punctilious detail" or "slavishly traced the claims issue by issue and witness by witness, or indulged in exegetics, parsing or declaiming every fact and each nuance and hypothesis." Id. The Court instead has limited its discussion to those legal and factual issues that form the basis for its decision. Id.

Where appropriate, any finding of fact herein that should more appropriately be regarded as a conclusion of law shall be deemed as such, and vice versa.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

3. An immigration officer must first inspect the alien to determine whether he is entitled to be admitted. § 1225(a)(3). Section 1225(b)(2)(A) provides that, if an immigration officer "determines" that an "applicant for admission" is "not clearly and beyond a doubt entitled to be admitted," then the alien "shall be detained for a proceeding under Section 1229a of this title" to determine whether he will be removed from the United States.

4. Alternatively, if an alien lacks valid entry documentation or misrepresents his identity, he shall be "removed from the United States without further hearing or review unless" he "indicates either an intention to apply for asylum . . . or a fear of persecution." § 1225(b)(1)(A)(i). If the alien makes such a showing, then he "shall be detained for further consideration of the application for asylum." § 1225(b)(1)(B)(ii). Such an alien then would also be placed in a Section 1229a full removal proceeding. See 8 C.F.R. § 208.30(f).

5. Under either route, Section 1229a proceedings involve a hearing before an immigration judge with potential review by the Board of Immigration Appeals. 8 U.S.C. § 1229a; 8 C.F.R. § 1003.1. In a full removal proceeding, the government may charge the alien with any applicable ground of inadmissibility, and the alien may seek asylum or any other form of relief or protection from removal to his home country. 8 U.S.C. § 1229a(a)(2), (c)(4).

6. Most importantly for this case, when DHS places an applicant for admission into a full removal proceeding under Section 1229a, the alien is subject to mandatory detention during that proceeding. § 1225(b)(2)(A) ("[I]f the examining immigration officer determines that an alien seeking admission is not clearly and beyond a doubt entitled to be admitted, the alien shall be detained for a proceeding under Section 1229a of this title.") (emphasis added). DHS does retain the discretion to parole certain aliens "for urgent humanitarian reasons or significant public benefit." § 1182(d)(5)(A).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

7. But Congress allows DHS an alternative to mandatory detention in the United States: "In the case of an alien described in [Section 1225(b)(2)(A)] who is arriving on land (whether or not at a designated port of arrival) from a foreign territory contiguous to the United States, [DHS] may return the alien to that territory pending a proceeding under Section 1229a of this title." § 1225(b)(2)(C). This contiguous-territory-return authority enables DHS to avoid having to detain aliens arriving on land from Mexico (or Canada), and instead allows DHS to temporarily return those aliens to the foreign territory from which they just arrived pending their immigration proceedings.

B. MPP was created to combat an influx of illegal aliens during the Trump administration

8. In 2018, the southern border of the United States experienced an immigration surge and a resulting "humanitarian and border security crisis." AR 186; App. 005. Federal officials encountered an approximately 2,000 inadmissible aliens each day in 2018. App. 005. By May 2019, that number had increased to 4,800 aliens crossing the border daily. AR 682.

9. The resulting influx of immigrants had "severe impacts on U.S. border security and immigration operations." App. 302. But most aliens lacked meritorious claims for asylum — "only 14 percent of aliens who claimed credible fear of persecution or torture were granted asylum between Fiscal Year 2008 and Fiscal Year 2019." App. 005. With so many "fraudulent asylum claims," "[t]he dramatic increase in illegal migration" was "making it harder for the U.S. to devote appropriate resources to individuals who [were] legitimately fleeing persecution." App. 302–03.

10. The influx did not just divert resources from legitimate asylum seekers, but illegal aliens with meritless asylum claims were being released into the United States. "[M]any of these individuals . . . disappeared into the country before a judge denie[d] their claim and simply bec[a]me fugitives." App. 303. "Between Fiscal Year 2008 and Fiscal Year 2019, 32 percent of aliens referred to [the Executive Office for Immigration Review] absconded into the United States and were ordered removed in absentia." App. 005.

11. In response, the Trump Administration implemented a program known as the Migrant Protection Protocols. On December 20, 2018, the Secretary of Homeland Security announced the MPP program, under which DHS would begin the process of invoking the authority provided at § 1225(b)(2)(C).[4] This statutory authority allows DHS to return to Mexico certain third-country nationals — i.e., aliens who are not nationals or citizens of Mexico — arriving in the United States from Mexico for the duration of their removal proceedings under 8 U.S.C. § 1229a. AR 151.

12. The goal of MPP was to ensure that "[c]ertain aliens attempting to enter the U.S. illegally or without documentation, including those who claim asylum, will no longer be released into the country, where they often fail to file an asylum application and/or disappear before an immigration judge can determine the merits of any claim." App. 303–04.

13. The same day, the United States obtained the Government of Mexico's agreement to temporarily permit "entry of certain foreign persons from within the United States who have entered that country through a port of entry or who have been apprehended between ports of entry and interviewed by the authorities of migration authorities of that country, and have received a notice to attend a hearing before a judge." AR 149.

14. On January 25, 2019, DHS issued guidance for implementation of MPP. Three days later, DHS began implementing MPP, initially in San Diego, California, then El Paso, Texas, and Calexico, California, and then nationwide. AR 155, 156, 684.

15. Under the issued guidance, DHS officers determined whether aliens were amenable to the MPP process. If they were, the DHS officer could issue a Notice to Appear (NTA), place the alien into a removal proceeding under Section 1229a, and then return the alien to Mexico to await removal proceedings unless the alien affirmatively demonstrated a fear of persecution or torture in Mexico. AR 161.

[4] Section 235(b)(2)(C) of the Immigration and Nationality Act (INA)

16. Certain categories of noncitizens were not amenable to MPP: unaccompanied alien children — as defined in 6 U.S.C. § 279(g); citizens or nationals of Mexico; noncitizens processed for expedited removal under 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(1); noncitizens "in special circumstances"; returning lawful permanent residents seeking admission; noncitizens with an advance parole document or in parole status; noncitizens with known physical or mental health issues; noncitizens with a criminal history or a history of violence; noncitizens of interest to the Government of Mexico or the United States; any noncitizen who demonstrated that they are more likely than not to face persecution or torture in Mexico; and other noncitizens at the discretion of the Port Director or Border Patrol counterpart. AR 161.

17. On February 12, 2019, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement issued guidance on MPP to its field offices, in anticipation of expansion of MPP across the border. AR 165–70. After June 7, 2019, DHS began constructing temporary structures at the southern border in Brownsville and Laredo, Texas, to hold immigration hearings for noncitizens subject to MPP, and notified Congress of their completion in August 2019. These temporary facilities functioned as virtual courtrooms, with immigration judges appearing by video connection from their courthouses within the United States. AR 208, 684.

C. The Department of Homeland Security found MPP to be effective

18. Upon review, DHS found MPP to be effective. In its October 28, 2019, Assessment of the Migrant Protection Protocols, DHS stated that "MPP has demonstrated operational effectiveness." AR 683. DHS noted that it had "returned more than 55,000 aliens to Mexico under MPP" and that

"MPP has been an indispensable tool in addressing the ongoing crisis at the southern border and restoring integrity to the immigration system." Id.

19. Specifically, DHS found "[s]ince a recent peak of more than 144,000 in May 2019, total enforcement actions . . . have decreased by 64% through September 2019." Id. Moreover, DHS found "[b]order encounters with Central American[5] families — who were the main driver of the crisis and comprise a majority of MPP-amenable aliens — have decreased by approximately 80%." Id.

20. Additionally, DHS stated "although MPP is one among many tools that DHS employed in response to the border crisis, DHS has observed a connection between MPP implementation and decreasing enforcement actions at the border — including a rapid and substantial decline in apprehensions in those areas where the most amenable aliens have been processed and returned to Mexico pursuant to MPP." Id.

21. In addition to finding MPP effective at deterring border encounters and decreasing the number of illegal aliens present in the United States, DHS also found that "MPP is restoring integrity to the [immigration] system." Id. As examples of this restoration, DHS found that "MPP returnees with meritorious claims can be granted relief or protection within months, rather than remaining in limbo for years while awaiting immigration court proceedings in the United States." Id. at 684. And "MPP returnees who do not qualify for relief or protection are being quickly removed from the United States. Moreover, aliens without meritorious claims — which no longer constitute a free ticket into the United States — are beginning to voluntarily return home." Id.

22. DHS did recognize that there were some flaws in the original implementation of MPP. On October 25, 2019 — just three days before releasing its assessment of MPP — DHS released the Migrant Protection Protocols Red Team Report. AR 192. This report found several issues and recommended improvements — but not termination — of MPP. Some of these improvements included standardizing documents and protocols to ensure aliens received a fair process and hearing on their claims. AR 192–201.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

23. MPP also faced legal challenges. In Wolf v. Innovation Law Lab, a district court enjoined the implementation of MPP. 366 F. Supp. 3d 1110 (N.D. Cal. 2019). The Ninth Circuit stayed that injunction, but a separate panel affirmed the injunction on the merits. 951 F.3d 1073 (9th Cir. 2020). The Ninth Circuit then granted a stay as far as the district court's injunction applied outside the territorial limits of the Ninth Circuit but otherwise denied the government's request for a stay. 951 F.3d 986 (9th Cir. 2020).

24. But the Supreme Court stayed the injunction in full granting the Trump Administration a legal victory. 140 S. Ct. 1564 (Mar. 11, 2020). The Supreme Court also granted certiorari. 141 S. Ct. 617 (Oct. 19, 2020). The case was later dismissed from the merits docket as moot. Wolf, 2021 WL 2520313, at *1 (June 20, 2021) (citing United States v. Munsingwear, Inc., 340 U.S. 36 (1950)).

25. But throughout the legal challenges, DHS found MPP was meeting its intended goals. AR 554. First, DHS found "MPP provides a streamlined pathway for aliens to defensively apply for protection or relief from removal, while upholding non-refoulement obligations through screenings of fear in Mexico." Id. Second, DHS found "MPP provides a pathway for aliens to proceed efficiently through the U.S. immigration court processes, as compared to non-detained dockets." Id. at 555. Third, DHS found "MPP decreases the number of aliens released into the interior of United States for the duration of their U.S. removal proceedings." Id. And fourth, DHS found "MPP implementation contributes to decreasing the volume of inadmissible aliens arriving in the United States on land from Mexico — including those apprehended between the [ports of entry]." Id.

26. By December 31, 2020, DHS had enrolled 68,039 aliens in the MPP program. Id.[6] DHS concluded its review of MPP and found it to be a "cornerstone" of DHS's efforts to restore integrity to the immigration system:

> These unprecedented [immigration] backlogs have strained DHS resources and challenged its ability to effectively execute the laws passed by Congress and deliver appropriate immigration consequences: those with meritorious claims can wait years for protection or relief, and those with non-meritorious claims often remain in the country for lengthy periods of time.
>
> This broken system has created perverse incentives, with damaging and far-reaching consequences for both the United States and its regional partners. In Fiscal Year 2019, certain regions in Guatemala and Honduras saw 2.5% of their population migrate to the United States, which is an unsustainable loss for these countries.
>
> MPP is one among several tools DHS has employed effectively to reduce the incentive for aliens to assert claims for relief or protection, many of which may be meritless, as a means to enter the United States to live and work during the pendency of multi-year immigration proceedings. Even more importantly, MPP also provides an opportunity for those entitled to relief to obtain it within a matter of months. MPP, therefore, is a cornerstone of DHS's ongoing efforts to restore integrity to the immigration system — and of the United States' agreement with Mexico to address the crisis at our shared border.

[6] The COVID-19 pandemic accounted for the markedly fewer aliens enrolled in MPP in 2020. Due to the pandemic, MPP removal proceedings began to be postponed on April 22, 2020. AR 466. Additionally, beginning in March 2020, DHS assisted in the enforcement of Title 42 — a statutory provision not relevant to this suit — to expel certain amenable noncitizens from Mexico and the Northern Triangle countries back to Mexico, and certain amenable noncitizens from other countries to their countries of origin if Mexico will not accept them, with limited exceptions. AR 621–22, 631. Title 42 expulsions accounted for 102,234 and 111,175 repatriations in 2020 and the first quarter of 2021. AR 660.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

D. During the transition period, the outgoing Trump Administration entered into an Agreement with Texas and warned the incoming Biden Administration of the dangers of ending MPP

1. DHS and Texas enter into an Agreement

27. Shortly before leaving office, the Trump Administration entered into a Memorandum of Understanding (the "Agreement") between Texas and DHS. App. 317–26. The Agreement was finalized on January 8, 2021. Id. at 325.

28. The Agreement purportedly established "a binding and enforceable commitment between DHS and Texas," in which Texas agreed to "provide information and assistance to help DHS perform its border security, legal immigration, immigration enforcement, and national security missions." Id. at 319. In return, DHS agreed "to consult Texas and consider its views before taking any action, adopting or modifying a policy or procedure, or making any decision that could:

(1) reduce, redirect, reprioritize, relax, or in any way modify immigration enforcement;

(2) decrease the number of ICE agents performing immigration enforcement duties;

(3) pause or decrease the number of returns or removals of removable or inadmissible aliens from the country;

(4) increase or decline to decrease the number of lawful, removable, or inadmissible aliens;

(5) increase or decline to decrease the number of releases from detention;

(6) relax the standards for granting relief from return or removal, such as asylum;

(7) relax the standards for granting release from detention;

(8) relax the standards for, or otherwise decrease the number of, apprehensions or administrative arrests;

(9) increase, expand, extend, or in any other way change the quantity and quality of immigration benefits or eligibility for other discretionary actions

for aliens; or

(10) otherwise negatively impact Texas.

In case of doubt, DHS will err on the side of consulting with Texas." Id. at 319.

29. To enable this consultation process, the Agreement requires DHS to "[p]rovide Texas with 180 days' written notice . . . of any proposed action" subject to the consultation requirement. Id. at 320. That would give Texas "an opportunity to consult and comment on the proposed action." Id. After Texas submitted its views, "DHS will in good faith consider Texas's input and provide a detailed written explanation of the reasoning behind any decision to reject Texas's input before taking any action" covered by the Agreement. Id.

30. The parties agree DHS did not follow these procedures when it issued the June 1 Memorandum. But DHS did send a letter that purported to terminate the Agreement "effective immediately" on February 2, 2021. Id. at 347–48. Texas avers that the termination letter also did not comply with the Agreement and chose to interpret a letter as a notice of intent to terminate. ECF No. 53 at 21. Accordingly, even under Texas's view, the Agreement is only "binding until August 1, 2021." Id.

2. The Biden Administration was warned of the consequences of terminating MPP

31. During the latter half of 2020, the Biden transition team met with career staff from DHS. According to Mark Morgan — who is former Acting Commissioner of CBP, former Acting Director of ICE, and Marine — CBP "career employees . . . fully briefed the Biden transition officials on the importance of MPP and the consequences that would follow a suspension of MPP." App. 399. Morgan stated: "transition personnel were specifically warned that the suspension of the MPP, along with other policies, would lead to a resurgence of illegal aliens attempting to illegally enter our [southwest border]." Id. And officials were also "warned smuggling organizations would exploit the rescission and convince migrants the U.S. borders are open. They were warned the increased volume was predictable and would overwhelm Border Patrol's capacity and facilities, as well as HHS facilities." Id.

E. The Biden Administration first suspended, then terminated MPP.

32. The incoming Biden Administration (1) knew MPP had been found effective by DHS as a matter of policy, (2) knew MPP had been successfully defended in court, and (3) had received warnings about the consequences that would attend the repealing of MPP. But the Biden Administration suspended new enrollments in MPP on its first day in office. On January 20, 2021, the Acting Secretary of DHS wrote that "[e]ffective January 21, 2021, the Department will suspend new enrollments in the Migrant Protection Protocols (MPP), pending further review of the program. Aliens who are not already enrolled in MPP should be processed under other existing legal authorities." AR 581.

33. Since that day, DHS has not offered a single justification for suspending new enrollments in the program during the period of review. Indeed, when the original administrative record was filed prior to the June 1 Memorandum's issuance, it contained only a single document — the January 20 Memorandum. See ECF No. 45. There was no cost-benefit analysis or any sort of reasoned decisionmaking for a court to review.

34. But the flaws of the January 20 Memorandum were mooted when DHS completed its review and issued the June 1 Memorandum that terminated the MPP program. AR 1–7; ECF No. 52 at 3 ("[T]he January 20 Memorandum expired upon the completion of DHS's review of the program.").

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

35. In the June 1 Memorandum, DHS Secretary Mayorkas found that his "review confirmed that MPP had mixed effectiveness in achieving several of its central goals and that the program experienced significant challenges." AR 3.

36. In particular, Secretary Mayorkas made several conclusions. First, the Secretary "determined that MPP does not adequately or sustainably enhance border management in such a way as to justify the program's extensive operational burdens and other shortfalls." Id.

37. Second, the Secretary was concerned that MPP did not ensure that aliens waiting in Mexico were able to attend their immigration proceedings. "The focus on speed was not always matched with sufficient efforts to ensure that conditions in Mexico enabled migrants to attend their immigration proceedings." Id. at 4. The Secretary noted that "[i]n particular, the high percentage of cases completed through the entry of in absentia removal orders (approximately 44 percent, based on DHS data) raises questions for me about the design and operation of the program." Id.

38. Third, the Secretary found that MPP was "intended to reduce burdens on border security personnel and resources, but over time the program imposed additional responsibilities that detracted from the Department's critically important mission sets." Id. The Secretary also added that "[a] number of the challenges faced by MPP have been compounded by the COVID-19 pandemic." Id. The Secretary concluded by stating "as a result, any benefits the program may have offered are now far outweighed by the challenges, risks, and costs that it presents." Id.

39. The June 1 Memorandum contained no discussion or analysis of DHS's previous assessment that MPP removed "perverse incentives" and decreased the number of aliens attempting to illegally cross the border.

40. The June 1 Memorandum contained no discussion or analysis regarding DHS's ability to fulfill its statutory obligation to detain certain classes of aliens in the absence of MPP.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

F. The termination of MPP has and will continue to increase the number of aliens being released into the United States and has and will continue to impose harms on Plaintiff States Texas and Missouri

1. The termination of MPP increases the number of aliens present in the United States

41. First, Defendants' termination of MPP necessarily increases the number of aliens present in the United States regardless of whether it increases the absolute number of would-be immigrants. MPP authorized the return of certain aliens to Mexico. Without MPP, Defendants are forced to release and parole aliens into the United States because Defendants simply do not have the resources to detain aliens as mandated by statute. App. 307 ("[R]esource constraints during the [May 2019] crisis, as well as other court-ordered limitations on the ability to detain individuals, made many releases inevitable."); App. 330 n.7 ("Continued detention of a migrant who has more likely than not demonstrated credible fear is not in the interest of resource allocation.").

42. Second, the termination of MPP has contributed to the current border surge. DHS previously acknowledged that "MPP implementation contribute[d] to decreasing the volume of inadmissible aliens arriving in the United States on land from Mexico." AR 555. MPP removed the "perverse incentives" which enticed aliens with "a free ticket into the United States." AR 684, 687; Trial Tr. 147:23–25 (Defense counsel: "I think it's fair to say that [MPP] probably deterred some individuals from coming to the United States.").

43. Since MPP's termination, the number of enforcement encounters on the southwest border has skyrocketed. Defendants' data shows encounters jumping from 75,000 in January 2021, when MPP was suspended, to about 173,000 in April 2021, when this case was filed. AR 670. Since then, encounters have continued to increase: CBP data shows nearly 189,000 encounters occurred in June 2021. U.S. Customs and Border Protection, Southwest Land Border Encounters, CBP

(Aug. 3, 2021), https://www.cbp.gov/newsroom/stats/southwest-land-border-encounters; FRE 201.[7]

44. Even if the termination of MPP played no role in the increasing number of migrants, the lack of MPP as a tool to manage the influx means that more aliens will be released and paroled into the United States as the surge continues to overwhelm DHS's detainment capacity.

45. Texas is a border state. But Missouri also faces an increased number of aliens due to the termination of MPP. Statistically, for every 1,000 aliens who remain unlawfully in the United States, fifty-six end up residing in Missouri. App. 006.

2. Texas and Missouri have suffered injuries because of the increased numbers of aliens present in their states

a. Driver's Licenses

46. As a result of the termination of MPP, some aliens who would have otherwise been enrolled in MPP are being released or paroled into the United States and will obtain Texas driver's licenses.

> In May and June 2021, for example, CBP recorded over 180,000 and 188,000 encounters, respectively, at the southwest border . . . These constitute the highest numbers of monthly encounters recorded by CBP in more than twenty years, including during previous surges when the Department was not constrained by COVID-19 capacity considerations. As noted above, due to COVID-19-related guidance, border facilities are currently expected to operate at only 25 to 50 percent capacity, depending on individual facility infrastructure and facility type.
> Based on preliminary data, the number of border encounters continued to increase in July 2021. Over the first 29 days of July, CBP encountered an average of 6,779 individuals per day, including 616 unaccompanied children and 2,583 individuals in family units. Overall, according to preliminary data, CBP is likely to have encountered about 210,000 individuals in July, the highest monthly encounter number since Fiscal Year 2000. July also likely included a record number of unaccompanied child encounters, exceeding 19,000, and the second-highest number of family unit encounters, at around 80,000.

> Based on current trends, the Department expects that total encounters this fiscal year are likely to be the highest ever recorded.

IV. CONCLUSIONS OF LAW

The Court's opinion proceeds in the following order: (1) the Court finds that it has jurisdiction and Plaintiffs have established standing; (2) the Court concludes there are no other jurisdictional or procedural hurdles to judicial review of Plaintiffs' claims; (3) the Court proceeds to the merits of Plaintiffs' APA and statutory claims; (4) and then the Court declines to address the merits of Plaintiffs' constitutional and Agreement-based claims.

A. Plaintiffs have standing

1. Federal courts are courts of limited jurisdiction which possess only that power authorized by Constitution and statute. Xitronix Corp. v. KLA-Tencor Corp., 916 F.3d 429, 435 (5th Cir. 2019). "The requirement that jurisdiction be established as a threshold matter spring[s] from the nature and limits of the judicial power of the United States and is inflexible and without exception." Id. (quoting Steel Co. v. Citizens for a Better Env't, 523 U.S. 83, 94–95 (1998)).

2. "[T]he states have the burden of establishing standing," Texas, 809 F.3d at 150, by showing "(1) an 'injury in fact,' (2) a sufficient 'causal connection between the injury and the conduct complained of,' and (3) a 'likel[ihood]' that the injury 'will be redressed by a favorable decision.'" Susan B. Anthony List v. Driehaus, 573 U.S. 149, 158 (2014).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

3. "Each element [of standing] must be supported in the same way as any other matter on which the plaintiff bears the burden of proof, i.e., with the manner and degree of evidence required at the successive stages of the litigation" Lujan v. Defender of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555, 561 (1992). "And at the final stage, those facts (if controverted) must be 'supported adequately by the evidence adduced at trial.'" Id. (quoting Gladstone, Relators v. Village of Brentwood, 441 U.S. 91, 115 n. 31 (1979)).

4. Here, the Court consolidated the preliminary injunction hearing with trial on the merits, so the preponderance of evidence standard applies. Env't Tex. Citizen Lobby, Inc. v. ExxonMobil Corp., 968 F.3d 357, 367 (5th Cir. 2020).

1. Texas and Missouri have suffered harms that are concrete, non-speculative, and are traceable to Defendants' conduct — and are redressable.

5. First, Texas and Missouri have both shown that they have suffered and will continue to suffer "concrete and particularized" injuries attributable to Defendants' actions. Massachusetts v. EPA, 549 U.S. 497, 517 (2007).

6. Plaintiffs have established that the termination of MPP will increase the cost of providing driver's licenses to aliens released and paroled into the United States, inflicting on the States an actual and imminent injury. See Texas, 809 F.3d at 155 ("[L]icenses issued to beneficiaries would necessarily be at a financial loss.").

7. Second, Plaintiffs' injuries are fairly traceable to the actions of Defendants. As stated above, the termination of MPP necessarily increases the number of aliens released and paroled into the United States and the Plaintiff States specifically.

8. Paroled and released aliens seeking to obtain driver's licenses is the "the predictable effect of Government action on the decisions of third parties." Dep't of Commerce v. New York, 139 S.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Ct. 2551, 2566 (2019); Texas, 809 F.3d at 156 ("[T]here is little doubt that many [aliens] would [apply for driver's licenses] because driving is a practical necessity in most of the state.").

9. Third, the Court has the power to redress Plaintiffs' injuries. The APA allows the Court to "set aside agency action . . . [that is] arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law." 5 U.S.C. § 706. Additionally, injunctive relief authorizing DHS officers to return aliens to Mexico via the MPP program pending the resolution of their asylum claims would decrease the number of aliens paroled and released into the United States and into Plaintiff States specifically. Consequently, the amount of fiscal injury suffered by Plaintiffs would decrease.

10. Accordingly, the Court finds Plaintiffs have more likely than not established Article III standing under the driver's license theory of injury approved by applicable Fifth Circuit precedent.[8]

11. The same line of reasoning applies to the increased healthcare costs, education costs, and enforcement and correctional costs that Plaintiffs will suffer because of the termination of MPP.

2. Plaintiffs have not established parens patriae standing

12. Texas and Missouri have not established by a preponderance of the evidence that they are entitled to parens patriae standing.

13. Parens patriae is a type of standing that allows a state to sue a defendant to protect the interests of its citizens. Alfred L. Snapp & Son, Inc. v. Puerto Rico ex rel. Barez, 458 U.S. 592, 600 (1982).

[8] Even if Missouri has failed to establish standing, it does not prevent the Court from proceedings to the merits because Texas has standing. See, e.g., Texas v. United States, No. 1:18-CV-00068, 2021 WL 3025857, at *18 (S.D. Tex. July 16, 2021) (Hanen, J.) ("Texas has standing. Since one of the Plaintiff States has standing, this Court need not analyze the standing of any other plaintiff."); Massachusetts, 549 U.S. at 518.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

14. Preliminarily, in Alfred L. Snapp, the Supreme Court stated "[a] State does not have standing as parens patriae to bring an action against the Federal Government." Id. at 610 n. 16 (citing Massachusetts v. Mellon, 262 U.S. 447, 485–86 (1923)). This so-called Mellon bar does not sweep as widely as it may seem. In Massachusetts v. EPA, the Supreme Court crafted a distinction: "There is a critical difference between allowing a State 'to protect her citizens from the operation of federal statutes' (which is what Mellon prohibits) and allowing a State to assert its rights under federal law (which it has standing to do)." 549 U.S. at 520 n. 17 (citing Georgia v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 324 U.S. 439, 447 (1945)).

15. Here, Texas is asserting rights under the INA rather than attempting to protect its citizens from the operation of the INA. Accordingly, the Mellon bar does not apply. See, e.g., Texas v. United States, 328 F. Supp. 3d 662, 694–98 (S.D. Tex. 2018).

16. "To have [parens patriae], standing the State must assert an injury to what has been characterized as a 'quasi-sovereign' interest, which is a judicial construct that does not lend itself to a simple or exact definition." Alfred L. Snapp, 262 U.S. at 601. The Supreme Court then articulated two general categories of "quasi-sovereign" interests: a state has an interest "in the health and well-being — both physical and economic — of its residents in general" and a state has an "interest in not being discriminatorily denied its rightful status within the federal system." Id. at 607.

17. Plaintiffs aver that they have standing under the first category because they allege the termination of MPP forces their citizens to compete in distorted labor markets in which it is more difficult to obtain a job. ECF No. 53 at 27–28. The Court finds this is a valid "quasi-sovereign" interest. Texas, 328 F. Supp. 3d at 698.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

18. Plaintiffs fail, however, to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the termination of MPP caused or will cause a distorted labor market. Plaintiffs' entire argument rests on the proposition that "the basic economic law of supply and demand applies to the labor market, so an increase in the supply of illegal aliens authorized to work will harm the employment prospects of Texans and Missourians competing with them." ECF No. 53 at 28. There are no citations to studies, articles, analyses, or anything else that would allow the Court to conclude that the termination of MPP has distorted Texas's or Missouri's labor markets. See, e.g., Texas v. United States, No. 1:18-CV-068, 2021 WL 3025857, at *15 (S.D. Tex. July 16, 2021) (discussing the addition of 114,000 work-eligible individuals who "Texas employers are financially incentivized under the [Affordable Care Act] to hire.").

19. Plaintiffs' simple invocation of the law of supply and demand is not enough for the Court to conclude that Plaintiffs carried their burden at the merits stage.

3. Plaintiffs are entitled to special solicitude

20. Texas and Missouri are entitled to special solicitude because "States are not normal litigants for the purposes of invoking federal jurisdiction." Massachusetts v. EPA, 549 at 518.

21. The Fifth Circuit has identified two additional factors that must be present in a case for States to be entitled to special solicitude: the presence of a procedural right to challenge agency action and the invasion of a "quasi-sovereign" interest. Texas, 809 F.3d at 152–53.

22. First, the Fifth Circuit has already held that the APA provides Texas the procedural right needed for special solicitude. Id. at 152 ("The Clean Air Act's review provision is more specific than the APA's, but the latter is easily adequate to justify 'special solicitude' here.").

23. Second, the termination of MPP "affects the states' 'quasi-sovereign' interests by imposing substantial pressure on them to change their laws, which provide for issuing driver's licenses to some aliens and subsidizing those licenses." Id. at 153. As the Supreme Court noted: "When a State enters the Union, it surrenders certain sovereign prerogatives." Massachusetts v. EPA, 549 at 519. Like Massachusetts, Texas and Missouri surrendered their power over immigration when they joined the Union. See Arizona v. United States, 567 U.S. 387, 394–400 (2012). Plaintiffs States, like Massachusetts, "now rely on the federal government to protect their interests." Texas, 809 F.3d at 154.

24. Accordingly, "[t]hese parallels confirm that [the termination of MPP] affects the states 'quasi-sovereign' interests." Id.

25. As a result, although unnecessary to the Court's finding of standing, the Court finds Texas and Missouri are entitled to special solicitude in its standing analysis.

B. There are no jurisdiction or procedural hurdles to judicial review

1. The termination of MPP is final agency action

26. The APA states that "final agency action for which there is no other adequate remedy in a court [is] subject to judicial review." 5 U.S.C. § 704. In the Fifth Circuit, "whether an agency action is final is a jurisdictional issue, not a merits question." Peoples Nat'l Bank v. Office of the Comptroller of the Currency of the U.S., 362 F.3d 333, 336 (5th Cir. 2004). "The Supreme Court has long taken a pragmatic approach to finality." Texas v. EEOC, 933 F.3d 433, 441 (5th Cir. 2019) (internal marks omitted).

27. Agency action is "final" only if it both (1) "consummate[es] the agency's decisionmaking process" and (2) determines "rights or obligations" or produces "legal consequences." Bennett v. Spear, 520 U.S. 154, 178 (1997).

28. The June 1 Memorandum meets both Bennett standards and is thus an action amenable to judicial review.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

29. First, the parties do not contest that the June 1 Memorandum marks the consummation of the decisionmaking process. AR 002 (The June 1 Memorandum was published after the Secretary "completed the further review undertaken pursuant to Executive Order 14010.").

30. Second, the June 1 Memorandum produces legal consequences and determines rights and obligations. EEOC, 933 F.3d at 445 ("[W]hether the agency action binds the agency indicates whether legal consequences flow from that action.").

31. The June 1 Memorandum had the immediate legal consequence of "terminating the MPP program." AR 002.

32. The June 1 Memorandum had the immediate legal consequence of rescinding "the Memorandum issued by Secretary Nielsen dated January 25, 2019 entitled 'Policy Guidance for Implementation of the Migrant Protection Protocols,' and the Memorandum issued by Acting Secretary Pekoske dated January 20, 2021 entitled 'Suspension of Enrollment in the Migrant Protection Protocols Program.'" AR 007.

33. The June 1 Memorandum directed "DHS personnel, effective immediately, to take all appropriate actions to terminate MPP, including taking all steps necessary to rescind implementing guidance and other directives issued to carry out MPP." Id. (emphasis added).

34. Moreover, the June 1 Memorandum determined rights and obligations. The June 1 Memorandum prevents DHS line officers from using MPP, a tool that was previously available to them. "Where agency action withdraws an entity's previously-held discretion, that action alters the legal regime, binds the entity, and thus qualifies as final agency action." EEOC, 933 F.3d at 442 (quoting Scenic Am., Inc. v. U.S. Dep't of Transp., 836 F.3d 42, 56 (D.C. Cir. 2016)).

35. Accordingly, the June 1 Memorandum constitutes final agency action.

2. No statute precludes judicial review

36. Judicial review is presumptively available under the APA "except to the extent that statutes preclude judicial review." 5 U.S.C 701(a)(1); Texas, 809 F.3d at 163 ("[T]here is a 'well-settled presumption favoring interpretations of statutes that allow judicial review of administrative action,' and we will accordingly find an intent to preclude such review only if presented with 'clear and convincing evidence.'") (quoting Reno v. Catholic Soc. Servs., Inc., 509 U.S. 43, 63–64 (1993)).

37. "Whether and to what extent a particular statute precludes judicial review is determined not only from its express language, but also from the structure of the statutory scheme, its objectives, its legislative history, and the nature of the administrative action involved." Id. at 164 (quoting Block v. Cmty. Nutrition Inst., 467 U.S. 340, 345 (1984)).

38. First, 8 U.S.C. § 1252(g) does not preclude judicial review.

39. Section 1252(g) states that "no court shall have jurisdiction to hear any cause or claim by or on behalf of any alien arising from the decision or action by the Attorney General to commence proceedings, adjudicate cases, or execute removal orders against any alien under this chapter."

40. Texas and Missouri are not bringing this case on "behalf of any alien." Dep't of Homeland Sec. v. Regents of the Univ. of Cal., 140 S. Ct. 1891, 1907 (2020) ("We have previously rejected as 'implausible' the Government's suggestion that § 1252(g) covers 'all claims arising from deportation proceedings' or imposes 'a general jurisdictional limitation.'") (quoting Reno v. American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Comm., 525 U.S. 471, 482 (1999)). This is further confirmed by the fact that the remedy ordered by the Court in this case does not affect the status of any alien or immigration proceeding.

41. Second, 8 U.S.C. § 1252(b)(9) does not preclude judicial review.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

42. Section 1252(b)(9) states: "Judicial review of all questions of law and fact, including interpretation and application of constitutional and statutory provisions, arising from any action taken or proceeding brought to remove an alien from the United States under this subchapter shall be available only in judicial review of a final order under this Section." (emphasis added). This Section functions as a limit on where aliens can seek judicial review of their immigration proceedings.

43. But the Supreme Court has recently stated: "As we have said before, § 1252(b)(9) does not present a jurisdictional bar where those bringing suit are not asking for review of an order of removal, the decision to seek removal, or the process by which removability will be determined." Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1907 (quoting Jennings v. Rodriguez, 138 S. Ct. 830, 841, 875–76 (2018) (plurality opinion) (internal marks omitted)). "And it is certainly not a bar where, as here, the parties are not challenging any removal proceedings." Id.

44. Third, 8 U.S.C. § 1252(f)(1) does not preclude judicial review.

45. Section 1252(f)(1) states: "No court (other than the Supreme Court) shall have jurisdiction or authority to enjoin or restrain the operation of the provisions of part IV of this subchapter."

46. But this section does not apply because Plaintiffs are not seeking to restrain Defendants from enforcing Section 1225. Plaintiffs are attempting to make Defendants comply with Section 1225.

47. Fourth, 8 U.S.C. § 1252(a)(2)(B)(ii) does not preclude judicial review.

48. Section 1252(a)(2)(B)(ii) states: "no court shall have jurisdiction to review . . . any other decision or action of the Attorney General or the Secretary of Homeland Security the authority for which is specified under this subchapter to be in the discretion of the Attorney General or the Secretary of Homeland Security, other than the granting of relief under Section 1158(a) of this title."

49. But Plaintiffs are not challenging the substantive exercise of the Attorney General's discretion. Instead, they are challenging whether the government complied with its legal obligations under the APA in terminating MPP. See e.g., Nora v. Wolf, No. 20-0993, 2020 WL 3469670, at *7 (D.D.C. June 25, 2020) ("But Claim One does not take on the individual decisions made to return each plaintiff to Mexico; it is directed at an agency decision – the decision to "expand" MPP implementation to Tamaulipas."); E.O.H.C. v. Sec'y U.S. Dep't of Homeland Sec., 950 F.3d 177, 191 (3d Cir. 2020) (same); Cruz v. Dep't of Homeland Sec., No. 19-CV-2727, 2019 WL 8139805, at *4 (D.D.C. Nov. 21, 2019) (same).

50. This reading of the statute is further confirmed by Section 1252(a)(2)(B)(ii)'s title: "Denials of discretionary relief." This title indicates the objective of the statute is to prevent aliens from challenging the federal government's refusal to grant discretionary relief. Texas, 809 F.3d at 164.

51. Lastly, the overall structure of the INA does not evidence a clear intent by Congress to preclude judicial review. Texas, 809 F.3d at 163. Congress's choice to expressly preclude certain types of claims does not show by "clear and convincing evidence" that Congress also meant to implicitly preclude all other types of claims. Id.; see Jennings v. Rodriguez, 138 S. Ct. 830, 844 (2018) (An "express exception . . . implies that there are no other[s]"); ANTONIN SCALIA & BRYAN A. GARNER, Reading Law 107 (2012) ("Negative-Implication Canon[:] The expression of one thing implies the exclusion of others (expressio unius est exclusio alterius).").

52. Accordingly, no statute or statutory scheme precludes judicial review of Plaintiffs' APA claim.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

3. The termination of MPP is not an agency action committed to agency discretion by law

53. The APA precludes review "of certain categories of administrative decisions that courts traditionally have regarded as 'committed to agency discretion.'" Texas, 809 F.3d at 165 (quoting Lincoln v. Vigil, 508 U.S. 182, 191 (1993)); 5 U.S.C. § 701(a)(2).

54. Section 1225(b)(2)(c) states: "In the case of an alien described in subparagraph (A) who is arriving on land . . . from a foreign territory contiguous to the United States, [DHS] may return the alien to that territory pending a proceeding under Section 1229a of this title." (emphasis added). But the mere presence of the word "may" does not place the agency's actions outside of the ambit of judicial review. Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1905 ("The dispute before the Court is not whether DHS may rescind DACA. All parties agree that it may. The dispute is instead primarily about the procedure the agency followed in doing so.").

55. Rather, "[t]o honor the presumption of review, [courts] read the exception in § 701(a)(2) quite narrowly, confining it to those rare administrative decisions traditionally left to agency discretion." Id. (internal citations omitted).

56. First, this limited category of unreviewable actions includes an agency's decision not to institute enforcement proceedings. Id. (citing Heckler v. Chaney, 470 U.S. 821, 831–32 (1985)). But the decision to terminate MPP "is more than a non-enforcement policy." Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1907. Although the termination of MPP itself does not confer affirmative benefits, the interaction between the termination of MPP and the lack of detention capacity necessarily means more aliens will be released and paroled into the Plaintiff States. And parole does create affirmative benefits for aliens such as work authorization. App. 337; Texas, 809 F.3d at 167 ("Likewise, to be reviewable agency action, DAPA need not directly confer public benefits.") (emphasis added).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

57. Moreover, the MPP program is not about enforcement proceedings at all. Any alien eligible for MPP has already been placed into enforcement proceedings under Section 1229a. The only question MPP answers is where the alien will be while the federal government pursues removal — in the United States or in Mexico.

58. Second, under Fifth Circuit precedent, agency decisions are "completely unreviewable under the committed to 'agency discretion by law' exception" if "the statutory scheme, taken together with other relevant materials, provides absolutely no guidance as to how that discretion is to be exercised." Texas, 809 F.3d at 168.

59. The INA provides guidance as to how DHS should exercise its discretion "according to the general requirements of reasoned agency decisionmaking." New York, 139 S. Ct. at 2569. Section 1225 imposes mandatory-detention obligations on Defendants. § 1225(b)(2)(A) ("[T]he alien shall be detained"); AR 682 ("The law provides for mandatory detention of aliens who unlawfully enter the United States between ports of entry if they are placed in expedited removal proceedings."). To avoid violating Section 1225's obligations, DHS must use its authority to return aliens to Mexico when an influx of aliens exceeds DHS's detention capacity. These statutory obligations provide courts guidance on how DHS's contiguous-territory-return authority should be exercised.

60. DHS does not have to use this authority; it could always detain every alien required by Section 1225. But if it is incapable of detaining such a large number, then the statute implicitly demands, or, at the very least, directs DHS use its authority to return certain aliens to Mexico.

61. Accordingly, the decision to terminate MPP is "not one of those areas traditionally committed to agency discretion." New York, 139 S. Ct. at 2568.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

4. Plaintiffs are within the zone of interests of the INA

62. "Because the states are suing under the APA, they 'must satisfy not only Article III's standing requirements, but an additional test: The interest they assert must be arguably within the zone of interests to be protected or regulated by the statute that they say was violated.'" Texas, 809 F.3d at 162 (quoting Match–E–Be–Nash–She–Wish Band of Pottawatomi Indians v. Patchak, 132 S. Ct. 2199, 2210 (2012) (internal marks omitted)).

63. "That 'test . . . is not meant to be especially demanding' and is applied 'in keeping with Congress's 'evident intent' when enacting the APA 'to make agency action presumptively reviewable.'" Id. "The Supreme Court 'has always conspicuously included the word 'arguably' in the test to indicate that the benefit of any doubt goes to the plaintiff.'" Id. "The test forecloses suit only when a plaintiff's 'interests are so marginally related to or inconsistent with the purposes implicit in the statute that it cannot reasonably be assumed that Congress intended to permit the suit.'" Id.

64. First, the Court concludes that the proper scope of the zone-of-interest inquiry is the entirety of the INA. Clarke v. Sec. Indus. Ass'n, 479 U.S. 388, 401 (1987) ("In considering whether the "zone of interest" test provides or denies standing in these cases, we first observe that the Comptroller's argument focuses too narrowly on 12 U.S.C. § 36, and does not adequately place § 36 in the overall context of the National Bank Act."). The Court is "not limited to considering the statute under which respondents sued, but may consider any provision that helps us to understand Congress' overall purposes." Id. And, historically, the Fifth Circuit's "treatment of APA claims in the immigration context [] considers the INA as a whole." Texas v. United States, No. 6:21-CV-003, 2021 WL 2096669, at *22 (S.D. Tex. Feb. 23, 2021); Texas, 809 F.3d at 193 n. 80.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

65. Here, Plaintiffs are seeking to require the Secretary to engage in reasoned decisionmaking under the APA before the Secretary terminates MPP requiring the state to choose between "spending millions of dollars to subsidize driver's licenses or changing its statutes." Id.

66. The INA and Section 1225 in particular protect the states' interest by mandating the detention or return to Mexico of aliens who would otherwise impose costs on the states.

67. Accordingly, "[t]he interests the states seek to protect fall within the zone of interests of the INA." Texas, 809 F.3d at 193.

C. The termination of MPP violated the APA

68. The APA prohibits agency actions that are "arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law." 5 U.S.C. § 706(2)(A). This means "[f]ederal administrative agencies are required to engage in reasoned decisionmaking." Michigan v. EPA, 576 U.S. 743, 750 (2015) (internal marks omitted). To do so, "the agency must examine the relevant data and articulate a satisfactory explanation for its action including a 'rational connection between the facts found and the choice made.'" Motor Vehicle Mfrs. Ass'n of U.S., Inc. v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 463 U.S. 29, 43 (1983) (quoting Burlington Truck Lines v. United States, 371 U.S. 156, 168 (1962)). "Normally, an agency rule would be arbitrary and capricious if the agency has relied on factors which Congress has not intended it to consider, entirely failed to consider an important aspect of the problem, offered an explanation for its decision that runs counter to the evidence before the agency, or is so implausible that it could not be ascribed to a difference in view or the product of agency expertise." Id. at 43.

69. Review under the APA's arbitrary and capricious standard is "highly deferential." Avoyelles Sportsmen's League, Inc. v. Marsh, 715 F.2d 897, 904 (5th Cir. 1983). District courts must "accord the agency's decision a presumption of regularity" and "are prohibited from substituting [the court's] judgment for that of the agency." United States v. Garner, 767 F.2d 104, 116 (5th Cir. 1985).

70. "Because the central focus of the arbitrary and capricious standard is on the rationality of the agency's 'decisionmaking,' rather than its actual decision, '[i]t is well-established that an agency's action must be upheld, if at all, on the basis articulated by the agency itself.'" Garner, 767 F.2d at 116 (quoting State Farm, 463 U.S. at 50). This "record rule" normally dictates that "the grounds upon which an administrative order must be judged are those upon which the record discloses that its action was based." SEC v. Chenery Corp., 318 U.S. 80, 87 (1943).

71. But courts allow extra-record evidence when it is necessary to determine whether the agency "considered all the relevant factors." Envtl. Def. Fund, Inc. v. Costle, 657 F.2d 275, 285 (D.C. Cir. 1981).[9]

72. If a court finds that an administrative agency failed to engage in reasoned decisionmaking, the reviewing court "shall hold unlawful and set aside" such "agency action, findings, and conclusions" as arbitrary and capricious. 5 U.S.C. § 706(2)(A).

1. DHS ignored critical factors

73. "Agency action is lawful only if it rests on a consideration of the relevant factors." Michigan, 576 U.S. at 750 (internal marks omitted). Although the June 1 Memorandum claims that Defendants "reviewed all relevant evidence and weighed the costs and benefits of" their decision, AR 006, an agency merely "[s]tating that a factor was considered, however, is not a substitute for considering it." Getty v. Fed. Sav. & Loan Ins. Corp., 805 F.2d 1050, 1055 (D.C. Cir. 1986). Courts "do not defer to the agency's conclusory or unsupported suppositions." United Techs. Corp. v. U.S. Dep't of Def., 601 F.3d 557, 562 (D.C. Cir. 2010). Rather, the Court "must [9] See ECF No. 76 at 11–12. There, the Court discussed the applicable exceptions to the "record rule" and found that Plaintiffs may submit extra-record evidence on its APA claims.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

make a "searching and careful" inquiry to determine if [DHS] actually did consider [the relevant factors]. Getty, 805 F.3d at 155 (quoting Citizens to Preserve Overton Park v. Volpe, 401 U.S. 402, 416 (1971)) (emphasis in original).

74. Defendants failed to consider several critical factors.

75. First, the Secretary failed to consider several of the main benefits of MPP. As the Court stated above in the findings of fact, DHS had previously found that "aliens without meritorious claims — which no longer constitute[d] a free ticket into the United States — [were] beginning to voluntarily return home." AR 684. DHS also found that MPP addressed the "perverse incentives" created by allowing "those with non-meritorious claims . . . [to] remain in the country for lengthy periods of time." AR 687.

76. The June 1 Memorandum never once mentions these benefits. At the very least, the Secretary was required to show a reasoned decision for discounting the benefits of MPP. Instead, the June 1 Memorandum does not address the problems created by false claims of asylum or how MPP addressed those problems. Likewise, it does not address the fact that DHS previously found that "approximately 9 out of 10 asylum claims from Northern Triangle countries are ultimately found non-meritorious by federal immigration judges," App. 303, and that MPP discouraged such aliens from traveling and attempting to cross the border in the first place. AR 687.

77. To be sure, DHS could have determined, "in the particular context before it, that other interests and policy concerns outweigh[ed] any [benefits MPP had]. Making that difficult decision was the agency's job, but the agency failed to do it." Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1914.

78. By ignoring its own previous assessment on the importance of deterring meritless asylum applications without "a reasoned analysis for the change," Defendants acted arbitrarily and capriciously. State Farm, 463 U.S. at 42.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

79. Second, the Secretary also failed to consider the warnings by career DHS personnel that "the suspension of the MPP, along with other policies, would lead to a resurgence of illegal aliens attempting to illegally" cross the border. App. 399.[10] This is all the more important because the Secretary had the opportunity to see if the warnings were predictive because the Secretary suspended enrollments in MPP on January 20, 2021. From that date until June 1, 2021 when MPP was permanently terminated, the Secretary had the opportunity to observe the ever-increasing number of border encounters. U.S. Customs and Border Protection, Southwest Land Border Encounters, CBP (Aug. 3, 2021), https://www.cbp.gov/newsroom/stats/southwest-land-border-encounters. But the Secretary never discussed the rise in border encounters in the June 1 Memorandum or discussed why the warnings by career DHS personnel were misguided or incorrect even as the data appeared to show that the career officials were, in fact, prescient.

80. Third, the Secretary failed to consider the costs to Plaintiffs and Plaintiffs' reliance interests in the proper enforcement of federal immigration law. The Court has already found that the states face fiscal harm from the termination of MPP. But the fact that Plaintiffs suffer fiscal injuries does not indicate the June 1 Memorandum is arbitrary and capricious. Rather, it is the fact that the agency did not consider the costs to the States at all.

81. Fiscal burdens on states are "one factor to consider" — even if the agency could conclude that "other interests and policy concerns outweigh" those costs. Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1914 (listing possible valid reliance interests, including damage to a state's coffers; "State and local governments could lose $1.25 billion."). But once again, even though "[m]aking that difficult decision was the agency's job, [] the agency failed to do it." Id.

[10] The briefing materials from the career officials were not part of the administrative record.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

82. Moreover, the Secretary failed to address whether the States had any "reliance interests" in the ongoing implementation of MPP. "When an agency changes course, as DHS did here, it must 'be cognizant that longstanding policies may have engendered serious reliance interests that must be taken into account.'" Id. at 1913 (Encino Motorcars, LLC v. Navarro, 136 S. Ct. 2117, 2126 (2016)). "It would be arbitrary and capricious to ignore such matters." Id. (quoting Encino Motorcars, 136 S. Ct. at 1800).

83. Fourth, the Secretary also failed to meaningfully consider more limited policies than the total termination of MPP. "When an agency rescinds a prior policy its reasoned analysis must consider the alternatives that are within the ambit of the existing policy." Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1913 (quoting State Farm, 463 U.S. at 51) (internal marks omitted). The entirety of the Secretary's reasoning in not modifying MPP is contained in a single sentence: "I also considered whether the program could be modified in some fashion, but I believe that addressing the deficiencies identified in my review would require a total redesign that would involve significant additional investments in personnel and resources." AR 005. The Secretary does not identify a single example of what a modified MPP would look like or what kind of investment would be needed to modify or scale back MPP. Courts "do not defer to the agency's conclusory or unsupported suppositions." United Techs. Corp., 601 F.3d at 562.

2. DHS's given reasons were arbitrary

84. On the other hand, one of the key reasons the Secretary gave for terminating for MPP is arbitrary. In discounting the expeditious pace at which MPP completed removal proceedings, the Secretary stated:

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

> It is certainly true that some removal proceedings conducted pursuant to MPP were completed more expeditiously than is typical for non-detained cases, but this came with certain significant drawbacks that are cause for concern. The focus on speed was not always matched with sufficient efforts to ensure that conditions in Mexico enabled migrants to attend their immigration proceedings. In particular, the high percentage of cases completed through the entry of in absentia removal orders (approximately 44 percent, based on DHS data) raises questions for me about the design and operation of the program.
> AR 004 (emphasis added).

85. Certainly, the June 1 Memorandum was concerned about the rate of in absentia removals, which were around 44 percent under MPP. And that concern was a key factor in the Secretary's decision to terminate MPP.

86. But the June 1 Memorandum never provides any reason why DHS determined that in absentia removals resulted from aliens abandoning meritorious asylum claims when DHS previously concluded that in absentia removals were a result of aliens abandoning meritless claims. AR 684 ("Moreover, aliens without meritorious claims . . . are beginning to voluntarily return home."). Instead, the June 1 Memorandum states only that this data "raises questions." AR 004. But it is the Secretary's job to answer such questions. Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1914.

87. It is true that "the APA "imposes no general obligation on agencies to conduct or commission their own empirical or statistical studies." Fed. Commc'ns Comm'n v. Prometheus Radio Project, 141 S. Ct. 1150, 1160 (2021). But it is also true that the agency must actually reach some sort of conclusion. State Farm, 463 U.S. at 52 (("Rescission of [agency action] would not be arbitrary and capricious simply because there was no evidence in direct support of the agency's conclusion . . . the agency must then exercise its judgment in moving from the facts and probabilities on the record to a policy conclusion.") (emphasis added).

88. Merely noting the presence of "questions" provides no "justification for rescinding [MPP] before engaging in a search for further evidence" that could answer those questions. Id.; see also

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Whitman-Walker Clinic, Inc. v. HHS, 485 F. Supp. 3d 1, 44 (D.C. Cir. 2020) (finding agency action arbitrary when the agency "took no position whatsoever on the actual effects that a [policy change] would have").

89. Besides assuming without evidence that the 44% in absentia rate was attributable to MPP, the Secretary never explained why 44% is itself an unacceptably high number. The June 1 Memorandum does not consider any relevant comparator for determining whether the rate of in absentia removal orders under MPP was unusually high. See State Farm, 463 U.S. at 43 ("[T]he agency must examine the relevant data.").

90. The federal government's data shows similarly high rates of in absentia removals prior to implementation of MPP. Executive Office for Immigration Review, Adjudication Statistics: Comparison of In Absentia Rates, https://www.justice,gov/eoir/page/file/1153866/download. For example, the in absentia rate was 42% in 2015 and 43% in 2017. Id. Failing to exam the relevant data is arbitrary and capricious. Again, "the agency must examine the relevant data." State Farm, 463 U.S. at 43.

91. In their briefing, Defendants posit a new theory not mentioned in the June 1 Memorandum. ECF No. 63 at 32–33; but see Sw. Elec. Power Co. v. EPA, 920 F.3d 999, 1014 (5th Cir. 2019) (A court "may uphold agency action only on the grounds that the agency invoked when it took the action."). Defendants argue that 44 percent of MPP cases resulted in in absentia removal orders, while only 11 percent of non-MPP cases resulted in in absentia orders during the same time period. Id. at 33. And the disparity between MPP and non-MPP in absentia removal orders is evidence of the ineffectiveness of the program in deterring fraudulent claims. Id.

92. But even if the Court considered this argument, it is not persuasive. A higher rate of in absentia removal is consistent with DHS's findings that MPP reduced the "perverse incentives" to pursue meritless asylum applications. There is nothing in the record that provides any analysis or reasoning explaining how higher in absentia removals resulted from aliens abandoning meritorious, rather than unmeritorious, asylum claims as DHS had previously found. AR 684 ("Moreover, aliens without meritorious claims — which no longer constitute a free ticket into the United States — are beginning to voluntarily return home."); FCC v. Fox Television Stations, Inc., 556 U.S. 502, 515–16 (2009) ("If the "new policy rests upon factual findings that contradict those which underlay its prior policy," the agency must offer "a reasoned explanation . . . for disregarding facts and circumstances that underlay . . . the prior policy.").

93. Another of the Secretary's stated conclusions is arbitrary. In the June 1 Memorandum, the Secretary justified, in part, terminating MPP because of the court closures caused by the COVID-19 pandemic:

> As immigration courts designated to hear MPP cases were closed for public health reasons between March 2020 and April 2021, DHS spent millions of dollars each month to maintain facilities incapable of serving their intended purpose. Throughout this time, of course, tens of thousands of MPP enrollees were living with uncertainty in Mexico as court hearings were postponed indefinitely. As a result, any benefits the program may have offered are now far outweighed by the challenges, risks, and costs that it presents.

94. The Secretary's reasoning is without any merit. Even according to the June 1 Memorandum, immigration courts were reopened by the end of April 2021. Past problems with past closures are irrelevant to the decision to prospectively terminate MPP in June 2021. This is especially true when the Secretary admits DHS had maintained the facilities during the pandemic.

3. DHS failed to consider or acknowledge the effect terminating MPP would have on its compliance with Section 1225

95. As detailed more below, the June 1 Memorandum failed to consider the effect terminating MPP would have on DHS's ability to detain aliens subject to mandatory detention under Section 1225.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

96. DHS had previously recognized that "[t]he law provides for mandatory detention of aliens who unlawfully enter the United States between ports of entry if they are placed in expedited removal proceedings." AR 682. But "resource constraints during the crisis, as well as other court-ordered limitations on the ability to detain individuals, made many releases inevitable." Id.

97. MPP addressed the resource problem by reducing the number of aliens DHS would have to detain by returning certain aliens to Mexico. Id.; AR 687. In terminating MPP, the Secretary was required to consider whether DHS could meet its statutory obligation to detain aliens seeking asylum without MPP as a tool. This the Secretary did not do.

98. Not once did the June 1 Memorandum discuss DHS's mandatory-detention obligation. In fact, a perusal of the entire administrative record shows zero evidence of DHS's detention capacity. Trial Tr. 114 (DHS counsel: "the [administrative] record doesn't contain any information about detention capacity.") (emphasis added). By "fail[ing] to consider an important aspect of the problem," the Secretary acted arbitrarily and capriciously. State Farm, 463 U.S. at 43.

99. For the above stated reasons, Defendants' termination of MPP was arbitrary and capricious and in violation of the APA. Accordingly, the Court concludes that Plaintiffs' APA claim is meritorious.

D. The termination of MPP causes Defendants to violate Section 1225

100. The Court begins by quickly re-summarizing the relevant statutory framework.

101. Section 1225 provides that if an immigration officer determines that an alien subject to expedited removal does not have a credible fear of persecution, the alien "shall be detained pending a final determination of credible fear of persecution and, if found not to have such a fear, until removed." 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(1)(B)(iii)(IV) (emphasis added).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

102. An alien subject to expedited removal and determined by an immigration officer to have a credible fear of persecution "shall be detained for further consideration of the application for asylum." § 1225(b)(1)(B)(ii) (emphasis added).

103. An alien seeking admission and not subject to expedited removal, whom an examining immigration officer determines is not clearly and beyond a doubt entitled to be admitted, "shall be detained" for removal proceedings. § 1225(b)(2)(A) (emphasis added).

104. Aliens who are not subject to expedited removal and arrive on land from a foreign territory contiguous to the United States may be returned by the government to that territory pending asylum proceedings as an alternative to detention. § 1225(b)(2)(C); AR 682.

105. MPP used this statutory authority to return aliens to Mexico pending their removal proceedings. AR 682.

106. Accordingly, Section 1225 provides the government two options vis-à-vis aliens seeking asylum: (1) mandatory detention; or (2) return to a contiguous territory. Failing to detain or return aliens pending their immigration proceedings violates Section 1225.[11]

107. Without MPP, Defendants only remaining option under Section 1225 is mandatory detention. But DHS admits it does not have the capacity to meet its detention obligations under Section 1225 because of "resource constraints." AR 682; App. 330 n. 7 ("Continued detention of [11] DHS does have the discretion to parole some aliens. But parole is available "only on a case-by-case basis for urgent humanitarian reasons or significant public benefit." 8 U.S.C. § 1182(d)(5)(A). Nor is parole intended "to replace established refugee processing channels." App. 336. By enacting the Illegal Immigration Reform and Immigrant Responsibility Act of 1996, Congress "specifically narrowed the executive's discretion" to grant parole due to "concern that parole . . . was being used by the executive to circumvent congressionally established immigration policy." Cruz-Miguel v. Holder, 650 F.3d 189, 199 & n.15 (2d Cir. 2011). Any class-wide parole scheme that paroled aliens into the United States simply because DHS does not have the detention capacity would be a violation of the narrowly prescribed parole scheme in section 1182 which allows parole "only on a case-by-case basis for urgent humanitarian reasons or significant public benefit." 8 U.S.C. § 1182(d)(5)(A) (emphasis added). See also AR 184 ("The number of asylum seekers who will remain in potentially indefinite detention pending disposition of their cases will be almost entirely a question of DHS's detention capacity, and not whether the individual circumstances of individual cases warrant release or detention,' [according to UT law professor Steve] Vladeck.") (emphasis added).

a migrant who has more likely than not demonstrated credible fear is not in the interest of resource allocation or justice.").

108. Under these particular circumstances, where Defendants cannot meet their detention obligations, terminating MPP necessarily leads to the systemic violation of Section 1225 as aliens are released into the United States because Defendants are unable to detain them.

109. Accordingly, the Court concludes that Plaintiffs' statutory claim is meritorious as well.

E. The Court does not need to decide Plaintiffs' Take Care Clause claim

110. Because the Court will grant Plaintiffs full relief on their APA and statutory claims, there is no further relief related to the June 1 Memorandum that the Court can grant.

111. Where the Court has made a full disposition of the case without addressing a constitutional claim, it will not address the issue. See Matal v. Tam, 137 S. Ct. 1744, 1755 ("We have often stressed that it is important to avoid the premature adjudication of constitutional questions and that we ought not to pass on questions of constitutionality unless such adjudication is unavoidable.") (internal marks and citations omitted).

F. The Agreement with Texas has expired and is therefore moot.

112. Because the Court will grant Plaintiffs full relief on their APA and statutory claims, there is no further relief related to the June 1 Memorandum that the Court can grant.

113. Any further agency action responsive to this opinion shall take place after August 1, 2021, which is when Texas agrees the Agreement was terminated. Therefore, the Agreement will not apply to any new agency action either.

114. The Court accordingly dismisses this claim as moot.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

V. REMEDIES

115. Having found Plaintiffs' APA and statutory claims are meritorious, it is the Court's remaining task to craft to proper relief.

A. Vacatur and Remand

116. The APA provides that "[t]he reviewing court shall . . . hold unlawful and set aside agency action, findings, and conclusions found to be . . . arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law." 5 U.S.C. § 706(2)(A) (emphasis added).

117. As a textual matter,[12] the mandatory language of the APA has led courts to make remand and vacatur the default remedy for agency action that violates the APA. United Steel v. Mine Safety and Health Admin., 925 F.3d 1279, 1287 (D.C. 2019); Franciscan All., Inc. v. Azar, 414 F. Supp. 3d 928, 945 (N.D. Tex. 2019) ("[D]istrict courts have a duty to vacate unlawful agency actions."). Remand, without vacatur, is only "generally appropriate when there is at least a serious possibility that the agency will be able to substantiate its decision given an opportunity to do so." Tex. Assoc. of Mfrs. v. US Consumer Prod. Safety Comm'n, 989 F.3d 368, 389–90.

118. The D.C. Circuit considers two factors when deciding whether to remand without vacatur: "(1) the seriousness of the deficiencies of the action, that is, how likely it is the agency will be able to justify its decision on remand; and (2) the disruptive consequences of vacatur." United Steel, [12] Defendants aver that "nothing in section 706(2)'s text specifies whether a rule, if found invalid, should be set side on its face or as applied to the challenger." ECF No. 93 at 11. And Defendants further argue the Court should adopt the narrower "as-applied" reading of the statute and only set aside agency action as to the named Plaintiffs. But that argument is in error. "The APA empowers courts to determine rule validity, not just whether the application of the rule is valid." Mila Sohoni, The Power to Vacate a Rule, 88 GEO. WASH. L. R. 1120, 1133 (2019); see also Jonathan F. Mitchell, The Writ-of-Erasure Fallacy, 104 VA. L. REV. 933, 1012 (2018) ("T]he APA and these organic statutes go further by empowering the judiciary to act directly against the challenged agency action. This statutory power to 'set aside' agency action is more than a mere non-enforcement remedy. It is a veto-like power that enables the judiciary to formally revoke an agency's rules, orders, findings, or conclusions — in the same way that an appellate court formally revokes an erroneous trial-court judgment."). The question of whether courts should extend relief beyond the named litigants in the APA context is a question of severability, not a question of whether the APA authorizes such relief — it does. Mitchell, supra, at 1013.

925 F.3d at 1287; accord Cent. & S. W. Servs., Inc. v. E.P.A., 220 F.3d 683, 692 n.6 (5th Cir. 2000) ("EPA gave ample reasons for its application of the Rule to the members of the regulated community in general. It simply failed to explain why it refused to grant the national variance to the electric utilities. We conclude that it would be disruptive to vacate application of the Rule to other segments of the industry.").

119. Under the first prong, the Court finds that the deficiencies in the June 1 Memorandum are serious and are unlikely to be resolved on a simple remand. As the Court has found, Defendants failed to consider the main benefits of MPP: (1) MPP deterred aliens, especially from the Northern Triangle, from attempting to illegally cross the border, (2) MPP allowed DHS to avoid systemic violation of Section 1225's detention requirements, and (3) MPP reduced the burden on states caused by tens of thousands of aliens being released.

120. Moreover, DHS knew of these failings when it issued the June 1 Memorandum because Plaintiffs first brought suit on April 13, 2021 — nearly two months earlier. DHS had the opportunity to consider Plaintiffs' suit and engage in reasoned decisionmaking to avoid the flaws the Court has identified in this opinion.

121. Additionally, the June 1 Memorandum is not only arbitrary and capricious for a lack of reasoned decisionmaking, but it is also substantively unlawful because, in these circumstances, termination of MPP causes Defendants to systemically violate Section 1225. It will continue to be unlawful to terminate MPP until DHS has the capacity and willingness to detain immigrants claiming asylum under Section 1225.

122. Under the second prong, the Court finds vacatur will not be unduly disruptive. In their supplemental briefs addressing remedies, Defendants emphasizes the "chaos" and "disruptive consequences" that would follow vacatur of the June 1 Memorandum. ECF Nos. 70, 93 at 4–7

("An order interfering with DHS's termination of MPP, or otherwise requiring DHS to reinstitute the program, would wreak havoc on the Administration's approach to managing migration in the region, including by undermining the Government's ability to engage in the delicate bilateral (and multilateral) discussions and negotiations required to achieve a comprehensive solution."). The government further states "restarting MPP would 'come at tremendous opportunity cost,' 'draw resources from other efforts,' 'create doubt about the reliability of the United States as a negotiating partner,' 'hamstring the Federal Government's ability to conduct the foreign policy discussions' necessary to manage migration, and 'have significant resource implications and be damaging to our national and economic security.'" Id.

123. But these problems are entirely self-inflicted. "Such inconveniences are common incidental effects of injunctions, and the government could have avoided them by delaying preparatory work until the litigation was resolved." Texas, 809 F.3d at 187. Here, Texas filed suit challenging the suspension of enrollments in MPP on April 13, 2021, which is nearly two months before DHS purported to terminate the program entirely in the June 1 Memorandum. DHS "could have avoided" any disruptions by simply informing Mexico that termination of MPP would be subject to judicial review "until the litigation was resolved." Id.[13] Mexico is capable of understanding that DHS is required to follow the laws of the United States which includes the APA and INA.

124. And, as evidenced by Defendants' briefs, DHS seemingly relies on the premise that it actually terminated MPP back in January 2021 and has been dismantling the program ever since [13] The Court notes that only slightly more than two months has passed between the issuance of the June 1 Memorandum and the Court's final disposition of this case on the merits.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

then, even though the January 20 Memorandum only purported to suspend the enrollment of aliens in MPP.[14]

125. DHS argues, in a brief dated July 7, 2021, that it began acting "to unwind MPP and its infrastructure," before the June 1 Memorandum terminating MPP, which is only two months old. ECF No. 70 at 8 ("[N]ew initiatives" to replace MPP have been "in place for nearly six months."). Similarly, in the same brief, Defendants stated that re-implementing MPP would be difficult because MPP "had been terminated for some time." Id. at 9 (emphasis added)

126. Again, in the same brief, Defendants argues that "Mexico had already begun taking action to redeploy resources." Id. at 9. But Defendants' citation shows that Mexico was redeploying resources already by April 28, a month before DHS issued the June 1 Memorandum. ECF No. 64 at 14. In another portion, Defendants state MPP began being wound down on "February 11, 2021." Id. at 17–18. Defendants also state that vacatur would nullify "more than four months of diplomatic and programmatic engagement," ECF No. 70 at 11, even though MPP had only been terminated for one month when that brief was submitted.

127. In other words, DHS's apparent argument is that MPP has been in the process of termination for months, far preceeding the actual issuance of the June 1 Memorandum, and it is simply too late for a court to vacate their actions. But if the decision to terminate MPP was made far in advance of the June 1 Memorandum, that reduces the entire June 1 Memorandum into post hoc arguments for a decision that was already made. Compare ECF No. 64 at 5 ("Upon completion of the required review, the Secretary announced his decision to terminate MPP [on June 1, 2021.]") with id. at 17 ("[T]he U.S. government announced the wind-down of the MPP policy on February 11, 2021.").

[14] There is no question that the January 20, 2021 Memorandum would have been found to be arbitrary and capricious as there is no administrative record or any stated basis for agency action for the Court to review. See ECF No. 45.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

128. Additionally, DHS's arguments also only relate to the effect vacatur would have on its diplomatic engagements with foreign countries.[15] ECF No. 70 at 7–11.

129. DHS's reliance on the effects of foreign affairs is unpersuasive. DHS's first duty is to uphold American law. It cannot just point at diplomatic efforts as an excuse to not follow the APA or fulfill its statutory obligations.

130. Accordingly, Plaintiffs are entitled to vacatur and remand because the June 1 Memorandum violates the APA and is in substantive violation of Section 1225.

B. Injunctive Relief is warranted

131. "According to well-established principles of equity, a plaintiff seeking a permanent injunction must satisfy a four-factor test before a court may grant such relief. eBay Inc. v. MercExchange, LLC., 547 U.S. 388, 391 (2006). The four factors are: "(1) that [Plaintiffs have] suffered an irreparable injury; (2) that remedies available at law, such as monetary damages, are inadequate to compensate for that injury; (3) that, considering the balance of hardships between the plaintiff and defendant, a remedy in equity is warranted; and (4) that the public interest would not be disserved by a permanent injunction." Id.

132. Regarding the first factor, as discussed in the Section on standing, supra § IV.A.1, Plaintiffs have shown that they are suffering ongoing and future injuries as a result of the termination of MPP.

[15] At various points, Defendants argue that the Court is unable to redress Plaintiffs' injuries because any relief would be dependent on Mexico's cooperation. See, e.g., ECF No. 913 at 10–11. This is not correct. The United States initiated MPP unilaterally pursuant to U.S. law, not pursuant to bilateral agreement or treaty with Mexico. App. 307. The program was then "implemented and expanded . . . through ongoing discussions with Mexico." Id. In other words, MPP was adopted and launched unilaterally, just as it was later terminated unilaterally. App.307; see also App.303. And even if Mexico's cooperation may be required to return an alien who has already been admitted, nothing prevents DHS from refusing to admit asylum applicants at ports of entry in the first place — before they ever enter the United States.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

133. Regarding the second factor, Texas and Missouri are unable to recover the additional expenditures from the federal government. Texas, 2021 WL 2096669, at *48 ("[N]o Party has suggested that Texas could recover any of its likely financial injury here, and the Court cannot conceive of any path for Texas to pierce the federal government's usual sovereign immunity or contrive a remedial cause of action sufficient to recover from its budgetary harm."); see also Texas, 328 F. Supp. 3d at 737 (deeming an injury irreparable because "there [was] no source of recompense").

134. Regarding the third and fourth factors,[16] the ongoing and future injuries sustained by Plaintiffs outweigh any harms to Defendants as Defendants have no "interest in the perpetuation of unlawful agency action." League of Women Voters of United States, v. Newby, 838 F.3d 1, 12 (D.C. Cir. 2016). Rather, there is a "public interest in having governmental agencies abide by the federal laws that govern their existence and operations." Washington v. Reno, 35 F.3d 1093, 1103 (6th Cir. 1994).

135. Moreover, the public interest favors Plaintiffs because the public has an "interest in stemming the flow of illegal immigration." United States v. Escobar, No. 2:17-CR-529, 2017 WL 5749620 at *2 (S.D. Tex. Nov. 28, 2017) (citing United States v. Martinez–Fuerte, 428 U.S. 543, 556–58 (1976)). And the public has interest in the enforcement of immigration laws, including Section 1225. Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986, Pub. L. No. 99-603, § 115, 100 Stat 3359, 3384 (1986) ("[T]he immigration laws of the United States should be enforced vigorously and uniformly.")

[16] Federal courts may consider the third and fourth together as they overlap considerably. Texas, 809 F.3d at 187; Nken v. Holder, 556 U.S. 418, 435 (2009) ("Once an applicant satisfies the first two factors [for a stay of an alien's removal pending judicial review], the traditional stay inquiry calls for assessing the harm to the opposing party and weighing the public interest. These factors merge when the Government is the opposing party.").

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

136. Lastly, the Supreme Court has cautioned that a district court vacating an agency action under the APA should not issue an injunction unless an injunction would "have [a] meaningful practical effect independent of its vacatur." Monsanto Co. v. Geertson Seed Farms, 561 U.S. 139, 165 (2010).

137. Here, an injunction is warranted for two reasons. First, an injunction is needed to prevent the continued systemic violation of Section 1225. Second, Defendants have indicated that, even if the June 1 Memorandum were declared invalid, they would not necessarily return any aliens to Mexico. ECF No. 63 at 9 ("Reinstating MPP would not require DHS to return anyone to Mexico.") (emphasis in original). ECF No. 92 at 47 ("DHS retains discretion to . . . release all noncitizens inspected for admission under Section 1225(b)(2)(A) or arrested while present in the United States under Section 1226.") (emphasis added).

138. Defendants are correct in stating that this Court does not have the power to tell a DHS line officer which individual aliens are amenable to MPP and must be enrolled. But Defendants are incorrect in arguing this Court has no power to enjoin a "blanket policy" that removes all discretion from line officers to utilize MPP. Texas, 2021 WL 2096669, at *51 ("But this injunction does not enjoin individual removal decisions. As described above, it enjoins a blanket policy that is contrary to law. The Government makes much of its discretion in individual matters . . .. But nothing in this preliminary injunction changes that."); ECF No. 63 at 9 ("Reinstating MPP . . . would merely authorize line-level officers to [return aliens to Mexico] in their discretion.").

139. Lastly, Fifth Circuit precedent dictates that, in immigration related cases, proper relief includes nationwide injunctions. A geographically limited injunction would be improper because federal immigration law must be uniform. Texas, 809 F.3d at 187–88; see also Texas, 2021 WL 2096669, at *52; Texas, 2021 WL 247877, at *7–8. Furthermore, a geographically limited injunction would likely "be ineffective because [aliens] would be free to move among states." Id. at 188.

140. Accordingly, the Court will grant the narrowest injunction possible that afford Plaintiffs full relief on their claims.

VI. CONCLUSION

For the reason stated above, the Court finds that Plaintiffs have proven their APA and statutory claims by the preponderance of the evidence. Accordingly, it is ORDERED:

1. Defendants and all their respective officers, agents, servants, employees, attorneys, and other persons who are in active concert or participation with them are hereby PERMANENTLY ENJOINED and RESTRAINED from implementing or enforcing the June 1 Memorandum.

2. The June 1 Memorandum is VACATED in its entirety and REMANDED to DHS for further consideration.

3. Defendants are ORDERED to enforce and implement MPP in good faith until such a time as it has been lawfully rescinded in compliance with the APA and until such a time as the federal government has sufficient detention capacity to detain all aliens subject to mandatory detention under Section 1255 without releasing any aliens because of a lack of detention resources.

4. To ensure compliance with this order, starting September 15th, 2021, the Government must file with the Court on the 15th of each month, a report stating (1) the total monthly number of encounters at the southwest border; (2) the total monthly number of aliens expelled under Title 42, Section 1225, or under any other statute; (3) Defendants' total detention capacity as well as current usage rate; (4) the total monthly number of "applicants for admission" under Section 1225; (5) the total monthly number of "applicants for admission" under Section 1225 paroled into the United States; and (6) the total monthly number of "applicants for admission" under Section 1225 released into the United States, paroled or otherwise.

5. This injunction is granted on a nationwide basis.

6. Nothing in this injunction requires DHS to take any immigration or removal action nor withhold its statutory discretion towards any individual that it would not otherwise take.

7. The Court retains jurisdiction of this matter for purposes of construction, modification, and enforcement of this permanent injunction.

8. The Court STAYS the applicability of this opinion and order for 7 days to allow the federal government time to seek emergency relief at the appellate level.

SO ORDERED.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA Plaintiff, v. GUSTAVO CARRILLO-LOPEZ, Defendant.	Case No. 3:20-cr-00026-MMD-WGC ORDER

I. SUMMARY

On June 25, 2020, Defendant Gustavo Carrillo-Lopez was indicted on one count of deported alien found in the United States in violation of 8 U.S.C. § 1326(a) & (b) ("Section 1326"). (ECF No. 1.) Before the Court is Carrillo-Lopez's motion to dismiss the indictment (the "Motion") on the grounds that Section 1326 violates the equal protection guarantee of the Fifth Amendment under the standard articulated in Village of Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp., 429 U.S. 252 (1977).[1] (ECF No. 26.) On January 22, 2021, the Court heard oral argument on the Motion (ECF No. 39 ("Oral Argument")), and on February 2, 2021, the Court held an evidentiary hearing (ECF Nos. 48, 49 (the "Hearing").[2] Because Carrillo-Lopez has established that Section 1326 was enacted with a discriminatory purpose and that the law has a disparate impact on Latinx persons, and the government fails to show that Section 1326 would have been enacted absent racial animus—and as further discussed below—the Court will grant the Motion.

[1]The government responds. (ECF No. 29.) Carrillo-Lopez replies. (ECF No. 30.) Carrillo-Lopez filed two supplements to the Motion. (ECF Nos. 31, 33.)

[2]At the Hearing, Carrillo-Lopez called two defense experts: Professor Kelly Lytle Hernández and Professor Benjamin Gonzalez O'Brien. The Court ordered both parties to file post-hearing briefs. (ECF Nos. 50 (Carrillo-Lopez brief); 51 (government brief).)

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

II. DISCUSSION

Having considered the briefing, arguments of counsel, and expert testimony of Professors Benjamin Gonzalez O'Brien and Kelly Lytle Hernández, the Court ultimately grants the Motion. First, the Court will explain the applicable standard of review: the test outlined in Arlington Heights. Next, the Court will determine whether Carrillo-Lopez has met his burden. Because Carrillo-Lopez has demonstrated that Section 1326 disparately impacts Latinx people and that the statute was motivated, at least in part, by discriminatory intent, the Court finds that he has. Finally, the Court reviews whether the government has shown that Section 1326 would have been enacted absent discriminatory intent. Because the government fails to so demonstrate, the Court finds its burden has not been met and that, consequently, Section 1326 violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fifth Amendment.

A. Arlington Heights applies to Section 1326.

As a preliminary matter, the Court must determine which standard to apply. The parties dispute, but the Court finds that the test outlined in Arlington Heights applies to criminal immigration laws such as Section 1326.

Under the Fifth Amendment's equal protection guarantee, a law can violate equal protection in three ways: (1) a law can discriminate on its face (see, e.g., Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967)); (2) authorities can apply a facially neutral law in a discriminatory manner (see, e.g., Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356 (1886)); or (3) a legislature may enact a facially neutral law with a discriminatory purpose in a way that disparately impacts a specific group (see, e.g., Arlington Heights, 429 U.S. at 265-68).

Carrillo-Lopez argues that Section 1326 violates his right to equal protection, specifically as articulated in Arlington Heights. The government counters that the statute should not be assessed under an equal protection framework because Congress' plenary power over immigration subjects immigration laws such as Section 1326 to a highly deferential standard of review. (ECF No. 29 at 7-11 (citing Kleindienst v. Mandel, 408

U.S. 753, 765 (1972); Fiallo v. Bell, 430 U.S. 787, 792 (1977)).)[3] The government asserts that criminal immigration laws are to receive the same deferential review, or rational bias review. (Id. at 10-11 (citing U.S. v. Hernandez-Guerrero, 147 F.3d 1075, 1078 (9th Cir. 1998); U.S. v. Ruiz-Chairez, 493 F.3d 1089 (9th Cir. 2007); U.S. v. Lopez-Flores, 63 F.3d 1468 (9th Cir. 1995)).)

Arlington Heights applies here. As an initial matter, the Supreme Court has held that greater protections under the Fifth Amendment necessarily apply when the government seeks to "punish[] by deprivation of liberty and property." Wong Wing v. United States, 163 U.S. 228, 237 (1896) ("[E]ven aliens shall not be held to answer for a capital or other infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."). The Court is unpersuaded that a criminal law enacted by Congress is free from constitutional equal protection constraints, even if the offense relates to immigration.

The federal government's plenary power over immigration does not give it license to enact racially discriminatory statutes in violation of equal protection. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals and a plurality of the United States Supreme Court declined to adopt the standard advanced by the government in race-based equal protection challenges of immigration decisions by the executive, and instead applied Arlington Heights. See Regents of the Univ. of Cal. v. U.S. Dep't of Homeland Sec., 908 F.3d 476, 518-20 (9th Cir. 2018), rev'd in part, vacated in part sub nom. Dep't of Homeland Sec. v. Regents of the Univ. of Cal., 140 S. Ct. 1891 (2020));[4] see also Ramos v. Wolf, 975 F.3d 872, 896-99 (9th Cir. 2020) (declining to apply a more deferential standard in favor of Arlington Heights). In both Regents and Wolf, the Ninth Circuit distinguished Trump v. Hawaii, 138

[4]On review, a plurality of the Supreme Court agreed with the Ninth Circuit that Arlington Heights applied. See Dep't of Homeland Sec. 140 S. Ct. at 1915-16. Ultimately, the plaintiff's claims were rejected on other grounds. Id.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

S. Ct. 2392 (2019), where the Court applied a more deferential standard to an establishment clause challenge of an executive order concerning immigration. Specifically, the Ninth Circuit found that the standard applied in Trump did not similarly apply to equal protection challenges because it differed "in several potentially important respects, including the physical location of the plaintiffs within the geographic United States, the lack of national security justification for the challenged government action, and the nature of the constitutional claim raised." Regents, 908 F.3d at 520; see also Wolf, 975 F.3d at 895 ("[T]he deferential standard of review applied in Trump v. Hawaii turned primarily on the Court's recognition of the fundamental authority of the executive branch to manage our nation's foreign policy and national security affairs without judicial interference.").

The government's counterargument is not persuasive. The Ninth Circuit recognized a difference between situations that invoke the President's expansive executive authority "to respond to changing world conditions" in matters of national security and the Court's mandate to ensure all people are afforded equal protection under the law. See Wolf, 975 F.3d at 896 (quoting Trump, 138 S. Ct. at 2419). That Carrillo-Lopez challenges a criminal law—which goes to the "nature" of the Fifth Amendment's protective concern—applicable to those within the United States, rather than an immigration policy addressing national security concerns of those not within the United States, is further evidence that his equal protection challenge should be reviewed under a more heightened standard than the rational-basis standard that the government proposed.[5]

Moreover, the three Ninth Circuit cases the government relies on to argue that immigration laws are subject to rational-basis review despite "§1326's criminal character"

[5]If anything, the Supreme Court's justification in Trump v. Hawaii for increased deference is inapplicable to Congressional action, as the Court's review does not directly implicate the executive's core function. See Ramos, 975 F.3d at 895 ("[T]he deferential standard of review applied in Trump v. Hawaii turned primarily on the Court's recognition of the fundamental authority of the executive branch to manage our nation's foreign policy and national security affairs without judicial interference.").

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

fail to support such an argument. (ECF No. 30 at 10.) First, Hernandez-Guerrero establishes only that Congress did not exceed its constitutional authority under its immigration powers when it enacted Section 1326. See 147 F.3d at 1078. The Ninth Circuit did not hear or address an equal protection challenge to Section 1326 in Hernandez-Guerrero, much less determine which standard of review applies. Moreover, both Lopez-Flores, 63 F.3d at 1475, and Ruiz-Chairez, 493 F.3d at 1091, simply establish that a challenged alienage classification qualifies for rational-basis review. But here, race and national origin, not alienage, is the classification in dispute.

Finally, the Court finds persuasive the fact that several district courts have similarly applied Arlington Heights to race-based immigration challenges brought by individuals residing in the United States,[6] including when reviewing equal protection challenges to Section 1326.[7]

Considering the above, the Court finds that Section 1326 must be reviewed under the Arlington Heights equal protection framework.

B. Carrillo-Lopez has met his burden under Arlington Heights.

Having found that Arlington Heights applies, the Court must now determine whether Carrillo-Lopez has met his burden. The Court finds that he has.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Under Arlington Heights, the moving party has the burden of demonstrating: (1) disparate impact;[8] and (2) that "racially discriminatory intent or purpose" was a "motivating factor in the decision." 429 U.S. at 265-68. Determining discriminatory intent requires a "sensitive inquiry into such circumstantial and direct evidence of intent as may be available," including, but not limited to: "[t]he historical background of the decision"; "[t]he legislative or administrative history"; "[t]he specific sequence of events leading to the challenged action"; "[d]epartures from normal procedural sequence"; or whether the impact of the law "bears more heavily on one race than another." Id. at 266-68. If the movant demonstrates that a racially discriminatory intent or purposes was a motivating factor in the challenged decision, the burden then shifts to the government to establish that "the same decision would have resulted even had the impermissible purpose not been considered." Id. at 270 n. 21.

Before Section 1326 was enacted in 1952, Congress first criminalized unlawful reentry in 1929 as part of the Undesirable Aliens Act ("the Act of 1929").[9] See Act of Mar. 4, 1929, Pub. L. No. 70-1018, ch. 690, 70 Congress, 45 Stat. 1551 (1929). The Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952 ("INA"), often referred to as The McCarran-Walter Act ("McCarran-Walter Act"), again codified the unlawful reentry provision first passed in 1929 under Title 8 of the United States Code, at 8 U.S.C.A. § 1326.[10] Section 1326 was [8]The Court opined that "disproportionate impact is not irrelevant, but it is not the sole touchstone of an invidious racial discrimination." Id. (quoting Washington v. Davis, 426 U.S. 229, 242 (1976)).

[9]In relevant part, the statute reads: "That (a) if any alien has been arrested and deported in pursuance of law, he shall be excluded from admission to the United States whether such deportation took place before or after the enactment of this act, and if he enters or attempts to enter the United States after the expiration of sixty days after the enactment of this act, he shall be guilty of a felony and upon conviction thereof shall, unless a different penalty is otherwise expressly provided by law, be punished by imprisonment for not more than two years or by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by both such fine and imprisonment." Undesirable Aliens Act, Pub. L. No. 70-1018, ch. 690, 45 Stat. 1551 (1929).

[10]The recodified statute reads: "Any alien who—(1) has been arrested and deported or excluded and deported, and thereafter (2) enters, attempts to enter, or is at any time found in, the United States, unless (A) prior to his reembarkation at a place outside the United States or his application for admission from foreign contiguous territory, the Attorney General has expressly consented to such alien's reapplying for admission; or (B) with respect to an alien previously excluded and deported, unless such alien shall establish that he was not required to obtain such advance consent under this or any prior Act, shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof, be punished by imprisonment of not more than two years, or by a fine of not more than $1,000, or both." Immigration and Nationality Act, Pub. L. No. 82-414, § 276, 66 Stat. 229 (codified at 8 U.S.C. § 1326 (1952)).

[11]Section 1326 was first amended in the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988 by adding subsection (b) which created increased penalties for those with prior felony convictions. See Pub. L. 100-690, title VII § 7345(a), 102 Stat. 4471 (Nov. 18, 1988) (codified at 8 U.S.C. § 1326 (1988)). The new Section 1326(b) provided that a person with a prior felony conviction who reenters may be imprisoned up to five years, and a person with an aggravated felony conviction may be imprisoned up to 15 years.

In 1990, the Immigration Act of 1990 removed the $1,000 cap and authorized greater fines under Title 18. See Pub. L. 101-649, title V § 543(b)(3), 104 Stat. 5059 (Nov. 29, 1990).

In 1994, the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994 again increased penalties for violating Section 1326 and included those with misdemeanor convictions in the heightened penalty category. See Pub. L. 103-322, title XIII § 130001(b), 108 Stat. 2023 (Sept. 13, 1994) (codified at 8 U.S.C. § 1326 (1994)). Specifically, the 1994 Amendments increased the imprisonment time for those with a prior felony conviction from up to five years to up to 10 years, and for those with a prior aggravated felony conviction from up to 15 years to up to 20 years. The amendment also included persons with "three or more misdemeanors involving drugs, crimes against the person, or both" in the group with the penalty of up to 10 years imprisonment. Finally, the amendment broadened the definition of 'deportation' to include "any agreement in which an alien stipulates to deportation during a criminal trial under either Federal or State law." Id.

In 1996, the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 ("AEDPA") again amended Section 1326. Pub. L. 104-132, title IV §§ 401(c), 438(b), 441(a), 110 Stat. 1267-68, 1276, 1279 (Apr. 24, 1996) (codified at 8 U.S.C. § 1326 (2000)). AEDPA added subsections (c) and (d) to Section 1326. Subsection (c) mandates incarceration for any person who reenters after they were deported by judicial order, and subsection (d) limits collateral attack of the underlying deportation order. The AEDPA amendments also added § 1326(b)(3), which allowed persons excluded from entry under § 1225(c) to be imprisoned for a period of 10 years, which may not be served concurrently with any other sentence.

Again in 1996, as part of the Omnibus Consolidated Appropriations Act of 1997, Congress added a fourth paragraph to § 1326(b). See Pub. L. 104-208, div. C title III §§ 305(b), 308(d)(4)(J), 308(e)(1)(K), 308(e)(14)(A), 324(a), 324(b); 110 Stat. 3009-606, 3009-618 to 3009-620, 3009-629 (Sept. 30, 1996). Section 1326(b)(4) added a penalty for persons convicted of nonviolent offenses who had been removed while on parole, supervised release, or probation, who then reenter. The penalty is up to 10 years'

Carrillo-Lopez relies on the Arlington Heights factors to argue that racial animus—as evidenced through the historical background, legislative history, sequence of events leading up to passage—was, at minimum, a motivating factor in the passage of Section 1326 that disparately impacts Mexican and Latinx individuals. That racial animus would make Section 1326 presumptively unconstitutional under Arlington Heights. (ECF No. 26 at 2.) The government responds that "even assuming Congress's 1929 illegal reentry law was wholly the result of impermissible racial animus, well-established doctrine holds that such legislative history would have no bearing on the law enacted by a subsequent Congress in 1952." (ECF No. 29 at 2.)

First, the Court finds that Section 1326 does indeed disparately impact Mexican and Latinx individuals. The Court further finds, as other district courts have, that discriminatory intent motivated the criminal unlawful reentry statute in 1929.[12] But the Court further concludes the evidence Carrillo-Lopez provides demonstrating the animus which tainted the Act of 1929, along with other proffered evidence contemporaneous with the INA's enactment in 1952, is sufficient for Carrillo-Lopez to meet his burden that discriminatory intent was a motivating factor of both the 1929 and 1952 enactments.

Because the Court finds Carrillo-Lopez has met his burden under Arlington Heights, the burden shifts to the government to prove that the statute would have passed even if the impermissible purpose had not been considered. Because the government fails to provide sufficient evidence to meet its burden, the Court will grant the Motion.

1. Disparate Impact on Latinx Individuals

The Court determines first that Section 1326 disparately impacts Latinx individuals. In some "rare" instances, there is a "clear pattern unexplainable on grounds other than imprisonment and a fine. These amendments also further broadened the scope of persons to which Section 1326 applied by replacing the 1994 definition of deportation with 'removal,' which "includes any agreement in which an alien stipulates to removal during (or not during) a criminal trial under with Federal or State law." Id.

[12]See, e.g., Machic-Xiap, 2021 WL 3362738 at *1 ("[T]he Court finds that racism has permeated the official congressional debate over United States immigration laws since the late 19th and early 20th centuries, including the 1929 Act.")

race" that a statute would affect some groups and not others, but "absent a pattern [of disparate impact] as stark as that in Gomillion or Yick Wo, impact alone is not determinative, and the Court must look to other factors." 429 U.S. 252 at 266. Carrillo-Lopez acknowledges, and in fact does not contend, that disparate impact alone in this case is enough to meet his burden. Rather, he proffers evidence of both disparate impact and discriminatory intent to meet his burden under Arlington Heights. The Court finds he has met his burden as to both.

Carrillo-Lopez argues, convincingly, that Section 1326 disparately impacts Mexican and Latinx defendants. (ECF No. 26 at 20.) While no publicly available data exists as to the national origin of those prosecuted under Section 1326, over 97% of persons apprehended at the border in 2000 were of Mexican decent, 86% in 2005, and 87% in 2010. (Id. (citing U.S. Border Patrol Nationwide Apprehensions by Citizenship and Sector, 2007-2019 (URL omitted).) In lieu of prosecution data, Carrillo-Lopez argues that immigration policy under President Trump and Department of Justice directives to prosecuting attorneys demonstrate that many, if not all, apprehensions are ultimately prosecuted.[13] Carrillo-Lopez then compares the data to other successful challenges under Arlington Heights to show that they meet the necessary standard of disproportionality. (Id.)

Importantly, the government does not dispute that Section 1326 bears more heavily on Mexican and Latinx individuals. Instead, the government attributes that impact to other causes—geography and proportionality. Specifically, the government argues that the stated impact is "a product of geography, not discrimination"[14] and the statistics are

[14]"Those numbers are neither surprising nor illuminating of Congress's motives in the 1920s. Indeed, if it were enough to state an equal protection claim that a broad-scale immigration law disparately affected individuals of any particular ethnicity—including those from a country sharing 1,954 miles of border with the United States—virtually any

rather "a feature of Mexico's proximity to the United States, the history of Mexican employment patterns, and other socio-political and economic factors that drive migration from Mexico to the United States–not discrimination." (ECF No. 29 at 13, 25 (citing Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1915-16).) As to "proportionality" it argues that "it makes sense that Mexican citizens comprised a high percentage of illegal entry defendants, given the suggestion that they made up a disproportionately high percentage of the overall illegal alien population." (ECF No. 29 at 14.) The Court is not persuaded.

First, the test for disparate impact only requires evidence that Section 1326 "bears more heavily on one race than another," a much less stringent standard than the government suggests. (ECF No. 30 at 12 (citing Arlington Heights, 429 U.S. at 266).) Carrillo-Lopez has met this standard by showing that Section 1326 bears more heavily on Mexican and Latinx individuals. From 1929 to 1939, the number of border crossing crimes increased substantially, making up anywhere from 84% to 99% of defendants." (ECF No. 26 at 17.) Over the course of a decade, well over 80% of border crossing apprehensions were those of Mexican or Latinx heritage.[15] These numbers are in line with other successful Arlington Heights challenges. See Ave. 6E Investments, LLC v. City of Yuma, Ariz., 818 F.3d 493, 505-06 (finding disparate impact where a concentration of most low-income housing is in neighborhoods that are 75% Hispanic); Arce v. Douglas, 793 F.3d 968, 977 (9th Cir. 2015) (finding disparate impact where 90% of enrollees at a targeted program were of Mexican or Hispanic origin); The Comm. Concerning Cmty. Improvement v. City of Modesto, 583 F.3d 690, 704 (9th Cir. 2009) (finding disparate impact where 71% of Latino areas were excluded from benefits while extending benefits to areas that were only 48% Latino).

such law could be challenged on that ground." (ECF No. 29 at 13 (citing Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1915-16).)

[15]And as noted, those apprehensions are being prosecuted. See U.S. Dep't of Justice, Statements of AG Sessions (Apr. 6, 2018) (URL omitted) ("The Department of Homeland Security is now referring 100 percent of illegal Southwest Border crossings to the Department of Justice for prosecution. And the Department of Justice will take up those cases.").

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The government also attempts to use the Supreme Court's reasoning in Regents to support its proportionality argument, but that reliance is misplaced.[16] In Regents, the Court found that disparate impact alone had not been demonstrated. But, as discussed above, Carrillo-Lopez does not attempt to meet his burden on disparate impact alone, but through a showing of disparate impact coupled with intent. Because the Court in Regents found that the plaintiffs had failed to demonstrate discriminatory intent, whereas this Court ultimately finds that Carrillo-Lopez has demonstrated both a disparate impact along with discriminatory intent, Regents is inapposite.

Second, the Court is unpersuaded by the government's argument that geography explains disparate impact. As Carrillo-Lopez notes (ECF No. 30 at 13-14), the Ninth Circuit has previously found disparate impact in situations where "geography" might arguably explain the disparity. See Comm. Improvement, 583 F.3d at 704-06 (finding that planning decisions made with racist purpose in predominantly Latino neighborhoods disparately impacts Latino people); Arce, 793 F.3d at 978 (finding that education decisions with racist purpose in Latino city has disparate impact on Latino students); D.N.C. v. Hobbs, 948 F.3d 989, 1004-06 (9th Cir. 2020) (en banc) (finding that voting decisions with racist purpose in state where American Indian, Latino, and Black neighborhoods have limited transit and mail access disparately impacts those communities). Moreover, the government's argument is circular and inconclusive. It cannot be the case that the mere over-policing of certain locations—here the Southern border as opposed to the Northern border—prevents a specific group from raising equal protection challenges. Or that because Mexican citizens will likely make up more unlawful reentries because they are a higher percentage of the overall illegal alien population, they cannot raise equal protection challenges. Ultimately, the law still bears more heavily on [16] In Regents, the Court reasoned that "because Latinos make up a large share of the unauthorized alien population, one would expect them to make up an outsized share of recipients of any cross-cutting immigration relief program. Were this fact sufficient to state a claim, virtually any generally applicable immigration policy could be challenged on equal protection grounds." 140 S. Ct. at 1915.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

those individuals than others, which is the standard that Carrillo-Lopez has met here. The Court accordingly finds that Section 1326 disparately impacts Latinx individuals.

2. The Act of 1929 was first enacted with a racially discriminatory purpose.

In his Motion and at the subsequent Oral Argument and Hearing, Carrillo-Lopez submitted significant evidence of the non-exhaustive factors outlined in Arlington Heights to argue that the Act of 1929 was passed with discriminatory intent. The government ultimately conceded that discriminatory intent motivated the passage of the Act of 1929.[17] But because the background of the Act of 1929 is relevant to the eventual passage of Section 1326 in 1952, and because the 1952 Congress adopts language from the Act of 1929 almost word for word, the Court will address each of the proffered Arlington Heights factors as they relate to the 1929 statute. The Court concludes, as did both parties, that Carrillo-Lopez presents sufficient evidence to demonstrate the Act of 1929 was motivated by racial animus.

a. Historical Background

Arlington Heights permits courts to consider "the historical background of the decision." 429 U.S. at 265-68. Carrillo-Lopez first explains how immigration legislation and racism were intimately entwined in the 1920s. Kelly Lytle Hernández, Professor of History at the University of California, Los Angeles, gives context to that history through a sworn declaration in which she testifies that "the criminalization of unauthorized entry was a racially motivated act." (ECF Nos. 26-2 at 2; 49). Professor Lytle Hernández provided context for the passage of the Act of 1929, explaining that the legislation came on the heels of the National Origins Act of 1924 which "narrow[ed] the pathways of legal immigration" by reserving 96 percent of all quota slots for European immigrants. (ECF

[17]At Oral Argument, the government's counsel stated: "I would say that, yes, the statements from those legislators would be sufficient were we considering the 1929 law, but we're not." (ECF No. 47 at 38.) The Court asked for confirmation—"so you agree that they've offered enough evidence to demonstrate that the 1929 enactment stems from racial animus under Arlington Heights"—to which the government's counsel responded, "Yes, your Honor." (Id. at 38-39.)

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

No. 26-2 at 4.) But the National Origins Act exempted immigrants from the Western Hemisphere, in part due to pressures from American industry who relied on Mexican labor. (Id.) Nativists and proponents of eugenics argued against this exemption.

At the Hearing, Professor Lytle Hernández emphasized how racial animus "bec[am]e more intense" heading into the 1920s, a period referred to as the "Tribal Twenties," when nativism and eugenics became more widely accepted and began to impact Congressional immigration proposals. (ECF Nos. 49 at 27-28; 26-2 at 5 ("[T]he Nativists in Congress never gave up their quest to end Mexican immigration to the United States. After the passage of the 1924 Immigration Act, they proposed bill after bill attempting to add Mexico to the quota system. Between 1926 and 1930, Congress repeatedly debated the future of Mexican immigration into the United States.").) Additionally, and among other things, Professor Lytle Hernández also addressed the "Juan Crow regime" that developed in the 1920s, "a racialized subjugation system in place that mirrors what [was] happening in the American South." (ECF No. 49 at 32.)

b. Sequence of Events and Legislative History

Courts may also consider "the specific sequence of events leading to the challenged action." Arlington Heights, 429 U.S. at 265-68. Professor Lytle Hernández again provided insight into the events surrounding the passage of the Act of 1929, notably the National Origins Act of 1924 which established a quota system based on national origin that specifically exempted immigrants from the Western Hemisphere, including Mexicans. (ECF No. 49 at 27-28.) This exemption resulted in a "pretty rapid turn to focusing on getting Mexican immigrants included on the quota," with two major pieces of legislation attempted in 1926 and 1928, but both protested by "major employers and industries across the west" who were "concerned that they w[ould] be cut off from access to Mexican workers." (Id. at 28-30.) Professor Lytle Hernández explained that while employment lobbies won initially, "the nativists [were] furious in Congress . . . so [sought] to pursue this through other means" which ultimately led to the Act of 1929 which criminalizes unlawful entry and reentry." (Id. at 28-29.) She concludes that it is her

"professional opinion" that "the illegal reentry provision of the 1929 law was intended to target Latinos." (ECF No. 49 at 34.)

Relatedly, the Court may consider "the relevant legislative or administrative history." 429 U.S. at 265-68. Here, Carrillo-Lopez argues that legislative history "easily clears the low threshold of showing that racism and eugenics were a 'motivating factor' . . ." (ECF No. 26 at 15.) While there was little discussion or debate prior to the Senate's passage of the Act of 1929, the bill was introduced after prior attempts failed. Carrillo-Lopez argues these prior failed attempts clearly indicate racial animus. For example, a House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization hearing on "The Eugenical Aspects of Deportation" included testimony from principal witness Dr. Harry H. Laughlin, a well-known eugenicist who suggested that "immigration control is the greatest instrument which the Federal Government can use in promoting race conservation of the Nation" (ECF No. 26-3 at 11, 19), and compared drafters of deportation laws to "successful breeders of thoroughbred horses" (id. at 44). Chairman of the House Immigration and Naturalization Committee, Representative Albert Johnson, then advocated for Congress's use of "the principle of applied eugenics" to reduce crime by "debarring and deporting" people. (Id. at 25.) These remarks and earlier debates were essentially incorporated into the 1929 discussion because after the initial legislation failed, a compromise was brokered with the agricultural industry and the bill was resubmitted and quickly passed from the Senate to the House. (ECF Nos. 26 at 14; 26-9 at 2-3; 26-10 at 2 (passed full Senate with relatively little debate, but when presented, Senator Blease remarks that he was "asked to get the measures over to the house [within two days] if I possibly could"); 26-11 at 2-3 (report submitted from the Committee of Immigration and Naturalization to the full House, reading: "the hearings in the Sixty-ninth Congress on the subject matter contained in the bill were exhaustive. Much important testimony was developed.") During debate on the bill in the House, representatives made similar racist remarks, including testimony from Representative Fitzgerald who argued that Mexicans

were "poisoning the American citizen" because they were of a "very undesirable" class. (ECF No. 26-4 at 8.)

c. Departure from Normal Substantive Considerations

The next Arlington Height's factor a court can consider is "the legislature's departure[] from normal procedures or substantive conclusions." 429 U.S. at 265-68. Here, Carrillo-Lopez argues that the "1920s was the first and only era in which Congress openly relied on the now discredited theory of eugenics to enact immigration legislation," with illegal reentry laws as one of "few laws still in effect from that era." (ECF No. 26 at 16.) Further, the discussions departed from typical conclusions underlying immigration law because the "racial vitriol expressed during the debates was directed almost exclusively at Mexicans—even though Canadians were also entering the United States in record numbers." (Id. (citing ECF No. 26-4 at 9.))

Taking these factors into account, the Court is persuaded that Carrillo-Lopez has proffered sufficient evidence under the Arlington Heights framework to demonstrate that racial animus was a strong motivating factor in the passage of the Act of 1929. The evidence clearly indicates, as both parties and other district courts agree, that the Act of 1929 was passed during a time when nativism and eugenics were widely accepted, both in the country at large and by Congress, and that these racist theories ultimately fueled the Act's passage.

3. The 1952 reenactment did not cleanse Section 1326 of its racist origins and was also motivated by discriminatory intent.

The government argues that evidence relating to the Act of 1929 has "no bearing on the passage of the law [Carrillo-Lopez] actually challenges."[18] (ECF No. 29 at 15.) Instead, the government argues that reenactment of an existing law, in the absence of

[18]The original briefs on the Motion focused on the Act of 1929. (ECF Nos. 26, 29, 30.) Following the Hearing, the Court ordered post-hearing briefing specifically addressing the question of whether the racial animus motivating the Act of 1929 tainted the statute's reenactment in 1952 through the INA. (ECF Nos. 50, 51.)

discriminatory intent, cleanses the law of prior discriminatory motivation.[19] (ECF No. 51 at 4-5.) The government there argues that the history of 1929 is therefore irrelevant to the Court's inquiry under Arlington Heights and the Court must limit its attention to the passage of the INA in 1952.

Carrillo-Lopez counters that "the absence of any repudiation of the racial animus that led to the adoption of the statute in 1929 should be construed as the defendant meeting his burden."[20] (ECF No. 50 at 5.) But in the alternative, Carrillo-Lopez argues that he exceeds his burden by further demonstrating that the 1952 Congress not only remained silent, but repeatedly recodified Section 1326 with more punitive measures with knowledge of the law's disparate impact, over a presidential veto addressing the bill's racism, and at a moment in history when Congress was simultaneously passing other legislation disparately impacting Latinx migrants. (ECF No. 50 at 1-2.) The Court will therefore consider whether the racial animus exhibited in the Act of 1929's passage can and did infect Section 1326's enactment in 1952.

While the Court might be persuaded that the 1952 Congress' silence alone is evidence of a failure to repudiate a racially discriminatory taint, the Court need not decide that issue. Instead, the Court finds the evidence that racial animus motivated the Act of 1929 is relevant to the 1952 Arlington Heights inquiry in two ways. First, evidence from the 1929 Congress is relevant as historical background for the passage of the INA in 1952. See Machic-Xiap, 2021 WL 2021 WL 3362738 at *12 (finding the history of the 1929 statute "strong" historical background evidence). The Court incorporates by reference this prior evidence as evidence of the historical background motivating the passage of Section 1326 in 1952. The Court will further explain below how the other

[19]The government relies specifically on the Supreme Court's decision in Abbott v. Perez, 138 S. Ct. 2305, 2324 (2018), and three circuit courts of appeals decisions, see Hayden v. Paterson, 594 F.3d 150, 164-68 (2d Cir. 2010); Johnson v. Governor of State of Florida, 405 F.3d 1214, 1223-26 (11th Cir. 2005) (en banc*); Cotton v. [20]Specifically, codifications are "either responsive, i.e. reverse[] a prior piece of legislation, or [are] extensive, that is, passed in the context of knowing what the existing statute means and is intended to do, and builds on that." (Id.)

Arlington Heights factors also support the finding that Section 1326's enactment was motivated at least in part by discriminatory intent.

But second, the Court finds the government is incorrect in its reliance on Abbott, because a prior version of a statute known to be motivated by racial animus may be considered as infecting its present iteration if it was not, in fact, substantially altered. See Hunter, 471 U.S. 222, 232-33 (1985) (finding that when a statute's original enactment was clearly motivated by racial animus, later amendments did not "legitimate[]" the provision); see also Abbott, 138 S. Ct. at 2324-25 (distinguishing its holding from Hunter because the statute in Abbott was substantially different from its predecessor and there was no evidence that the reenacting legislature "carried forward the effects of any discriminatory intent"). After the Court addresses the 1952-specific evidence, the Court will explain why the 1952 Congress cannot be presumed to have cured the animus present in 1929.

In light of these reasons, the Court considers that the totality of the evidence demonstrates racial animus motivated the 1952 enactment of Section 1326, regardless of whether silence alone would have been sufficient to demonstrate discriminatory intent.[21]

a. The 1952 enactment of Section 1326 was also motivated by discriminatory intent.

The Court does not rely solely on the evidence from 1929, but also considers contemporaneous evidence from 1952. In evaluating that evidence, the Court looks at the interplay between legislative history and relevant historical evidence. Specifically, the [21]The Court notes that the authority the government relies upon specifies that courts must presume legislatures act in good faith in redistricting cases. See Abbott, 138 S. Ct. at 2324 ("'[I]n assessing the sufficiency of a challenge to a districting plan,' a court 'must be sensitive to the complex interplay of forces that enter a legislature's redistricting calculus . . . [a]nd the 'good faith of [the] state legislature must be presumed.'") (citing Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 915-16 (1995)). Both Miller and Abbott emphasize the complexity of redistricting in the need for presumption of legislative good faith. The Court is not convinced that reasoning is analogous to this comparatively less complex statutory scheme, especially when animus has been demonstrated and the reenacted statute is nearly identical to its improper predecessor.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Court considers: a relative lack of discussion compared to robust Congressional debate regarding other provisions of the INA; explicit, recorded use of the derogatory term "wetback" by supporters of Section 1326; Congressional silence while increasingly making the provision more punitive; Congress' failure to revise in the face of President Truman's veto statement calling for a reimagination of immigration policy; knowledge of the disparate impact of Section 1326 on Mexican and Latinx people; and passage of the so-called "Wetback Bill" by the same Congress only months prior. The Court recognizes that this evidence is circumstantial, and that each instance may not be as probative when considered alone. But in its totality, the cited evidence is sufficient to demonstrate that racial animus was at least one motivating factor behind the enactment of Section 1326.[22] The evidence specific to the 1952 enactment will be discussed in turn.

i. Silence Compared to Robust Debate on Other Provisions

As stated above, the Court does not now determine if silence alone is enough for Carrillo-Lopez to meet his burden. But the Court does consider whether a lack of debate regarding recodification of Section 1326 in 1952, when other provisions of the INA were debated and discussed, supports Carrillo-Lopez's argument that discriminatory intent was a motivating factor in its reenactment in 1952. The Court finds that it does.

Defense expert Professor Gonzalez O'Brien testified that the contrast between extensive congressional debate about other national origin provisions and the comparative lack thereof around Section 1326 suggests an acceptance of its history. (ECF No. 49 at 181.) Other instances of discriminatory immigration policy, Professor Gonzalez O'Brien notes, prompted the Congress to debate about what was deemed a problematic aspect of the original enactment—including during the 1952 enactment of the [22]The Court notes that a recent district court decision from this circuit disagrees. See Machic-Xiap, 2021 WL 3362738 at *11-14. After considering the same evidence that is now before the Court—Truman's veto statement, the letter from DAG Ford, testimony from Professors Gonzalez O'Brien and Lytle Hernández—the court in that case found that the legislative history of Section 1326 is "inconclusive." Id. at *13. But this Court cannot agree that the evidence, when viewed in its totality, is insufficient to demonstrate that racial animus was at least one motivating factor for the passage of Section 1326. The Court explains its reasoning more fully below.

INA.[23] (Id. at 180.) Professor Gonzalez O'Brien concludes "that's one of the reasons that I'm willing to say that this is a demonstration of racial—of continued racial animus, is that you're acknowledging in the debate over the McCarran-Walter Act, members of Congress are acknowledging that there are problematic racial aspects to the 1924 Johnson-Reed Act, which comes five years before the Undesirable Aliens Act, and yet they choose to not only recodify the 1326, but to recodify it[] without any examination." (ECF No. 49 at 180-81.)

Professor Gonzalez O'Brien's testimony depicts a Congress that was more concerned with which racial and ethnic groups warranted continued discriminatory exclusion, rather than any desire to confront or revise the nativism reflected in the Act of 1929. As a matter of logic, the 1952 Congress could have either examined that history or ignored it. If the 1952 Congress ignored the express nativist intent behind the Act of 1929, there is no reason to assume that the later enactment arose from some wholly unrelated motivation cleansed from discriminatory intent. If it did not ignore the Act of 1929's history, there was opportunity to either adopt its racial animus or refute its improper motivation and clarify a purpose for the statute that did not violate the Equal Protection Clause. Here, the 1952 Congress remained silent, even when other provisions of the law were being debated. When considered in comparison with the express debate over other racially problematic predecessor statutes, Congress' silence here weighs in favor of establishing Carrillo-Lopez meets his burden.

[23]In particular, Professor Gonzalez O'Brien notes the continued debate over the use (and allocation) of quotas in the immigration scheme: "we see that debate with the McCarran-Walter Act, I mean the debate over national origins, and the kind of racial aspects of the, of the limits placed on quotas for southern and eastern Europeans. . . you see the continuation of that with the McCarran-Walter Act, and the insertion of tables during committee testimony, the insertion of tables showing that the largest quotas will still go to northern and western Europeans." (ECF No. 49 at 180.) He goes on to note that "in 1965 with debate over the Hart-Celler Act, and the elimination of national quotas and the acknowledgement that the national quota system had been one that was very clearly and explicitly meant to privilege certain groups based on perceptions of superiority and inferiority, particularly—you know, especially with 1924." (Id.)

ii. President Truman's Veto

The Court also considers that Congress declined to comment on the racist forebears of Section 1326, even in the face of President Truman's veto of the INA. On June 25, 1952, President Truman vetoed INA, and included a veto statement. (ECF No. 44-1.) President Truman condemned the INA as "legislation which would perpetuate injustices of long standing against many other nations of the world" and "intensify the repressive and inhumane aspects of our immigration procedures." (Id. at 3.) Finding that the positive aspects of the INA were "heavily outweighed" by other provisions, President Truman expressed dismay that so much of the INA "would continue, practically without change" discriminatory practices first enacted in 1924 and 1929. (Id. at 4.)

On June 27, Congress overrode President Truman's veto and passed the INA. (Id.) Carrillo-Lopez argues that Congress' decision to pass the INA over a presidential veto that "explicitly called out the law for its racism" is evidence of racial animus. (ECF No. 50 at 5-6.) While President Truman did not explicitly address racism as to Mexican or Latinx individuals, he commented on the negative implications of expanding the grounds for deportation,[24] and implored Congress to reconsider the INA's passage: "Should we not undertake a reassessment of our immigration policies and practices in the light of the conditions that face us in the second half of the twentieth century? . . . I hope the Congress will agree to a careful reexamination of this entire matter." (ECF No. 44-1 at 10.) President Truman clearly wanted Congress to review the INA and reconsider its objectives, admonishing it was "the time to shake off this dead weight of past mistakes . . . time to develop a decent policy of immigration—a fitting instrument for our foreign policy and a true reflection of the ideals we stand for, at home and abroad . . .” (Id. at 6.) Professor Gonzalez O’Brien confirms that despite the fact that the INA is “sometimes characterized as racially progressive,” President Truman’s veto “explicitly notes” the INA was unnecessarily punitive, and inequitably so. (ECF No. 49 at 116-117).

[24]President Truman specifically criticized the "unnecessarily severe" and inflexible penalties for deportation. (Id. at 8.) He continued, "[t]he bill would sharply restrict the present opportunity of citizens and alien residents to save family members from deportation. Under the procedures of present law, the Attorney General can exercise his discretion to suspend deportation in meritorious cases. In each such case, at the present time, the exercise of administrative discretion is subject to the scrutiny and approval of the Congress. Nevertheless, the bill would prevent this discretion from being used in many cases where it is now available and would narrow the circle of those who can obtain relief from the letter of the law. This is most unfortunate, because the bill, in its other provisions, would impose harsher restrictions and greatly increase the number of cases deserving equitable relief." (Id. at 9.)

As another court noted, the veto statement largely objected to the national origin quota system, not Section 1326. See Machic-Xiap, 2021 WL 3362738, at *13. But although President Truman did not address Section 1326 specifically, the veto statement represents in no uncertain terms a contemporary admonishment of an overly punitive and discriminatory immigration policy. Truman expressly drew the INA into dialogue with prior immigration legislation, from both 1924 and 1929, which were concededly racist. But the 1952 Congress rejected that call and overrode the veto. The Court finds that Congress’ failure to heed President Truman’s call to “reimagine” immigration while simultaneously making the INA, and particularly Section 1326, more punitive in nature, is evidence of at least indifference to the nativist motivations of the statute’s predecessor. The Court accordingly finds that Congress’ decision to proceed with the INA that President Truman denounced as discriminatory contributes to its finding that Carrillo-Lopez has met his burden.

iii. Deputy Attorney General Peyton Ford Letter

The Court considers additional legislative history—a letter of support from Deputy Attorney General Peyton Ford, which includes use of the racially derogatory word “wetback” as well as testimony in support of expanding the grounds for prosecution and conviction of unlawful reentry under Section 1326. On May 14, 1951, Attorney General Ford wrote to Pat McCarran, Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, in “response to [McCarran’s] request for the views of the Department of Justice relative to the bill (S. 716) to revise the laws relating to immigration, naturalization, and nationality; and for other purposes . . .” (ECF No. 44-2.) Congress’ decision to adopt this recommendation, the only substantive change made to Section 1326 in 1952, in light of its silence regarding all other aspects of the provision, is further evidence of racial animus.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

First, Attorney General Ford's letter expressly includes the racial slur "wetback." The letter specifically quotes from the report of the President's Commission on Migratory Labor, Migratory Labor in American Agriculture, March 26, 1951, which says: "Statutory clarification on the above points will aid in taking action against the conveyors and receivers of the wetback. These clarifications of the statute, together with increased funds and personnel for enforcement, are possibly all that are needed to deal effectively with the smuggler and the intermediary." (ECF No. 44-2 at 9 (emphasis added).) Common sense dictates, and many courts have acknowledged, that the term "wetback" is racist.[25] See, e.g., Machic-Xiap, 2021 WL 3362738, at *13 ("Again, 'wetback' is a racial epithet."). Its use in testimony from a supporter of the bill is significant here. First, it evidences the racial environment and rhetoric in 1952, even among high-ranking government officials and committees, specifically with regard to Mexican and Latinx people. But it is also significant considering that Ford's recommendation was the only recommendation adopted by Congress as to Section 1326. Not only does Ford's letter employ racially derogatory language, but it advises Congress to expand the grounds for deportation. Specifically, the letter recommended amendments to the bill including clarifying the "found in" clause in Section 276 by:

> add[ing] to existing law by creating a crime which will be committed if a previously deported alien is subsequently found in the United States. This change would overcome the inadequacies in existing law which have been observed in those cases in which it is not possible for the Immigration and Naturalization Service to establish the place of reentry, and hence the proper venue, arising in prosecutions against a deported alien under the 1929 act.

[25]Professor Gonzalez O'Brien goes on to explain that "the term with 'wetback' comes from the idea that individuals who are entering without inspection have to do so at an area where there is no bridge over the Rio Grande River and, therefore, they get wet and, therefore, the term wetback. But across the period of the 1940s and 1950s, this term has—is associated, and almost synonymous with Mexicans. And in addition to being synonymous with Mexicans and racialized in much the same way, it also has the attribution of a lot of the negative stereotypes that were associated with Mexican immigrants in the push, or [sic] quotas to be applied to immigration from Mexico and south of the Rio Grande, as well as during debate over the Undesirable Aliens Act." (ECF No. 49 at 89-90.)

At the Hearing, Professor Gonzalez O'Brien explained that this amendment was incorporated "explicitly to make it easier to enforce the 1929 law, by allowing prosecution of immigrants wherever they were found, even if you couldn't establish where they crossed." (ECF No. 49 at 184-85). This legislative history confirms, as Carrillo-Lopez argues, that the only substantive change made to Section 1326 in 1952 was this amendment which expanded the government's authority to enforce the original 1929 provision, thereby making Section 1326 more punitive in nature. Attorney General Ford's recommendation, conveyed to Congress along with racial slurs, was adopted by the 1952 Congress and became a part of Section 1326.

Again, while Attorney General Ford's recommendation alone may not be enough to prove discriminatory intent, the Court considers this evidence in context. The only significant alteration between the unlawful reentry provision in the Act of 1929 and Section 1326 was this one, recommended by Ford.[26] The 1952 Congress' silence does not evince a neutral viewpoint, but worked to expand the enforceability of an admittedly racist law. The Court therefore finds that this evidence contributes to its finding that Carrillo-Lopez meets his burden.

iv. Wetback Bill

The Court further considers the passage of the so-called "Wetback Bill" as evidence of historical background. The bill's passage is particularly probative because it was "passed by the same congress during the same time frame and with the same express aim as illegal reentry . . ." (ECF No. 50 at 10.) Senate Bill 1851, nicknamed the "Wetback Bill," was passed March 20, 1952, just a few months before the INA. See United Statutes at Large, 82 Cong. ch. 108, 66 Stat. 26 (March 20, 1952). The bill's stated aim was to "assist in preventing aliens from entering or remaining in the United States illegally." Id. Yet, as Carrillo-Lopez argues, the bill was reflective of Congress' racially [26] See notes 9 & 10.

discriminatory motivations, not only because of the nickname of the bill but also by the way it sought to achieve its stated aim.

First, the Wetback Bill evidences discriminatory motive simply in its use of the racial epithet "wetback." As Professor Gonzalez O'Brien testified: "In 1952, prior to the passage of the McCarran-Walter Act, you have a Bill that is introduced and passed on March 20th that is nicknamed the Wetback Bill. And this is a piece of anti-harboring legislature where, throughout the debate, Mexican undocumented entrants are regularly referenced as wetbacks. And Senator McFarland [of Arizona], during the debate over the Act of March 20th, 1952, notes that Senate Bill 1851, a Bill known as the Wetback Bill, was going to be debated. Initially, this legislation was aimed strictly at Mexicans." (ECF No. 49 at 97-98.)[27]

Aside from the use of derogatory language, the incongruities between the stated intent of the bill and the actual language of the bill demonstrate the Congress' racist motives and intent. While the stated aim of the bill was to prevent "aliens from entering or remaining in the United States illegally", as Carrillo-Lopez argues, it actually "illustrates the intent of congress to preserve the influx of cheap and exploitable labor, while simultaneously marginalizing those workers and excluding them from full participation in American life." (ECF No. 50 at 10.) By failing to punish employers who hired illegal immigrants and instead only punishing the laborers themselves, the "1952 and 1929 congresses were both balancing the hunger of the agricultural industry for exploitable labor and the desire to keep America's identity white." (Id.)

The Court agrees that the "context in which [] Mexican immigration was being discussed at that historical moment" is illustrative of the 1952 Congress' intent. (ECF No. 49 at 129-30.) Despite the lack of official debate surrounding the enactment of Section 1326, Professor Gonzalez O'Brien connects the Ford letter with the Wetback Bill to give a more nuanced understanding of the 1952 Congress' approach:

> what you do have is that you do have this note that's entered in the support for 1326 by the Department of Justice, and it's a letter from the Deputy Attorney General, Peyton Ford . . .So, again, you have the use of this

[27]Relatedly, Professor Gonzalez O'Brien notes that this "debate around wetbacks is—also enters into the McCarran-Walter Act." (ECF No. 49 at 99-100.)

> racialized term to describe Mexican immigrants, even though you don't have debate around Mexican immigration in the McCarran-Walter Act itself, or during debate for the McCarran-Walter Act, in part, because you have this Bill that precedes it by two months, where much of the debate is how do we limit the number of Mexican immigrants and the trafficking of undocumented Mexican immigrants into the United States? And that Bill also contained the Texas proviso, which gave workers the kind of loophole of, you know, if you're employing undocumented laborers, it doesn't constitute harboring.

(ECF No. 49 at 129-30.) Professor Gonzalez O'Brien notably concludes that "understanding the recodification under McCarran-Walter, it has to be done in the context both of what came before it, but also what was occurring at that historical moment, and at that moment in time." (Id.)[28]

This context assists the Court in its "sensitive" inquiry demanded by Arlington Heights. See 429 U.S. at 564. In short, both the derogatory nickname of the Wetback Bill and its criminalization of Mexican immigrant laborers while shielding employers evidences the racially discriminatory motives and intent of the same Congress who enacted Section 1326 only two months later.

v. Congressional Awareness of Disparate Impact

Finally, the Court considers Congress' silence in light of their knowledge that Section 1326 disparately impacts Latinx people as further evidence of continued racial animus. Professor Lytle Hernández outlined the disparate impact of the criminal unlawful reentry statute over the 23 years between the law's enactment 1929 and reenactment in 1952. (ECF No. 26-1.) She specifically highlighted that "some years, Mexicans comprised 99 percent of immigration offenders" and by the 1930s "tens of thousands of Mexicans had been arrested, charged, prosecuted, and imprisoned for unlawfully entering the United States." (Id.)

[28]"Q: And part of the legislative background also is the Wetback Bill that occurred two months earlier. Is that fair? A: That is fair. Q: And the Wetback Bill explicitly carved out from the harboring of aliens [sic] employers? A: That is correct. Q: And that tension between employers and the utilization of south of the border migrants was the same sort of tension that we see animating that debate in 1929. Is that fair? A: That's fair." (ECF No. 49 at 184-86 (excerpts of Professor O'Brien's testimony under defense counsel's examination.)

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Congress' knowledge that Section 1326 continued to disparately impact Mexican and Latinx people is evidenced by criticism from President Truman in his veto statement when he specifically critiqued the INA for expanding grounds for deportation[29] and from testimony provided by enforcers of the law—the Immigration and Naturalization Service. The Immigration and Naturalization Service testified regarding the "difficulties encountered in getting prosecutions and convictions, especially in the Mexican border area" because many violators of immigration law "are not prosecuted or, if prosecuted, get off with suspended sentences or probation." (ECF No. 45 at 2.) Congress' silence about the prior racist iterations of this bill coupled with its decision to expand the grounds for deportation and carceral punishment, despite its knowledge of the disparate impact of this provision on Mexican and Latinx people, is some evidence that racial animus was a motivating factor.

When these factors are considered together, the Court finds there is sufficient evidence to conclude that racial animus continued to be a motivating factor in the recodification of 1952. As Professor Gonzalez O'Brien testified:

> if you look at all of those things, including the racial animus that was demonstrated in the McCarran-Walter Act itself . . . then I think all of those things suggest that the decision to pass this without debate, was largely driven by the same things that drove the original codification of 1326; and that was, in part, a desire to control access to Mexican labor, and also a tendency to view Mexicans, individuals from south of the Rio Grande, and at least in the terms of the 1950s, the wetback, as a problematic population. And you don't see any significant debate over – you have a stretch between 1959 and 1952, where you have 1326 in effect, and you don't see any debate over that policy on its merits. We've been doing this for over 20 years by that point. What are the merits of 1326? . . . You don't have debate over that in 1952.

(ECF No. 49 at 129-30.)

The totality of evidence shows that the same factors motivating the passage of Section 1326 in 1929 were present in 1952. Not only did Congress fail to repudiate the racial animus clearly present in 1929, but it expanded the government's power to enforce unlawful reentry, despite President Truman's call to reimagine immigration laws. The [29] See note 24.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

1952 Congress incorporated the advice of supporters of the bill who used racial epithets in official documents, while contemporaneously passing another bill targeting "wetbacks." Although it is "not easy" to prove that racism motivated the passage of a particular statute, the Court reasons that it cannot be impossible, or Arlington Heights would stand for nothing.[30]

The Court therefore finds that Carrillo-Lopez has met his burden.

b. The authority cited by the government does not preclude consideration of the Act of 1929.

Essential to the government's position is its proposition that improper motivations infecting prior versions of legislation do not carry over to reenacted versions of a law. The government argues that the Supreme Court "ha[s] viewed variants of the 'taint argument' with equal skepticism," and several circuit and district courts have found that "the ultimate focus in subsequent litigation is the intent of the reenacting legislature, not the original one." (ECF No. 29 at 24.) As explained below, the Court finds these cases do not support the government's argument that a re-enacting Congress is always shielded from the legislation's prior motivations, and instead instruct the reviewing court to consider how much the reenacting Congress actually altered the legislation.

The government relies on Abbott v. Perez to argue that "the presumption of legislative good faith [is] not changed by a finding of past discrimination" nor can past discrimination "condemn governmental action that is not itself unlawful." (ECF No. 51 at 3-4.) In Abbott, electoral redistricting plans developed in 2011 were challenged as discriminatory. Responding to that concern, Texas adopted interim plans overseen by a federal district court that were later adopted by the 2013 Legislature. See Abbott, 138 S. Ct. at 2315. When reviewing the 2013 plans, the district court found discriminatory intent

[30] Machic-Xiap, 2021 WL 3362738 at *1. The Machic-Xiap court noted it was "unaware of any federal appellate decision holding that a facially neutral act passed by Congress was motivated by racial, ethnic, or religious animus." Id. When faced with the record before it and lacking clear guiding or distinguishing authority from federal appellate courts, this Court cannot ignore the extensive history—both from 1929 and contemporaneously in 1952—that suggests discrimination was in part motivating Congress' enactment of Section 1326.

because the 2013 Legislature "failed to 'engage[] in a deliberative process to ensure that the 2013 plans cured any taint from the 2011 plans." Id. at 2318. The Supreme Court disagreed and ultimately upheld the 2013 districting plan because the "2013 Texas Legislature did not reenact the plan previously passed by its 2011 predecessor. Nor did it use criteria that arguably carried forward the effects of any discriminatory intent on the part of the 2011 Legislature." Id. at 2325. The Supreme Court reasoned that although a court had previously found that the 2011 Legislature "acted with discriminatory intent in framing the congressional plan, that finding was based on evidence about districts that the interim plan later changed." Id. Therefore "there can be no doubt about what matters: it is the intent of the 2013 Legislature." Id.

The facts here are distinguishable. Most importantly, here, the initial and recodified unlawful reentry statutes are nearly identical, with the exception of broader enforcement measures. In Abbott, the 2013 Legislature was not simply reenacting an earlier version of the districting plan, but an entirely new plan was implemented following a lower court's finding of discriminatory intent. In so doing, the new plan was explicitly created to "fix[] the problems identified," id. at 2329, or "cure[]" any prior discriminatory intent, id. at 2325. The holding in Abbott is based on the legislature's active response and engagement with the prior challenged statute. The Supreme Court in fact clarified:

> We do not suggest either that the intent of the 2011 Legislature is irrelevant or that the plans enacted in 2013 are unassailable because they were previously adopted on an interim basis by the Texas court. Rather, both the intent of the 2011 Legislature and the court's adoption of the interim plans are relevant to the extent that they naturally give rise to—or tend to refute—inferences regarding the intent of the 2013 Legislature. They must be weighed together with any other direct and circumstantial evidence of that Legislature's intent. But when all the relevant evidence in the record is taken into account, it is plainly insufficient to prove that the 2013 Legislature acted in bad faith and engaged in intentional discrimination.

Id. at 2327 (emphasis added). The Court found the new legislature lacked discriminatory intent precisely because of the way that it responded to the challenged provision. Moreover, the Court expressly stated that how the reenacting legislature responds to a prior discriminatory statute is probative of the reenacting legislature's intent. Unlike in

Abbott, the 1952 Congress adopted Section 1326 almost wholesale from the Act of 1929, revising it only to make it more punitive.[31]

The government's reliance on three circuit courts of appeals decisions is similarly unpersuasive. (ECF No. 51 at 4-5 (citing Hayden v. Paterson, 594 F.3d 150, 164-68 (2d Cir. 2010); Cotton v. Fordice, 157 F.3d 388, 391-92 (5th Cir. 1998); Johnson v. Governor of State of Fla., 405 F.3d 1214, 1223-26 (11th Cir. 2005).) Contrary to the government's argument that re-enactment of an existing law "cleanses" it from "any discriminatory aspects of its history" (id. at 5), the Second Circuit in Hayden expressly warned against the possibility that a legislative body "might seek to insulate from challenge a law known to have been originally enacted with a discriminatory purpose by (quietly) reenacting it without significant change." Hayden, 594 F.3d at 167 (reasoning that subsequent changes to legislation tainted by racial animus should "substantively change" the prior issue in a way that is "not inconsequential"). Clearly aware of this issue, the Fifth Circuit in Cotton and the Eleventh Circuit in Johnson also stress that the challenged amendments made substantive revisions to their racist predecessors which meaningfully impacted how they would be enforced.[32] The Second Circuit reasoned that its concerns were "ameliorated" because (i) there was no allegation of bad faith on the part of the re-enacting legislature, (ii) there was adequate deliberation that resulted in substantive changes when

[31]The government further relies on the Supreme Court's decision in McKlesky v. Kemp to argue that "unless historical evidence is reasonably contemporaneous with the challenged decision, it has little probative value." 481 U.S. 279, 289 n.20 (1987). There, the Court looked at Georgia laws in force during and just after the Civil War, finding that "historical background of the decision is one evidentiary source" for proof of discrimination under Arlington Heights, but it has little probative value if it is not "reasonably contemporaneous" ultimately deciding that "although the history of racial discrimination in this country is undeniable, we cannot accept official actions taken long ago as evidence of current intent." Id. Here, the evidence offered and accepted by this Court regarding the 1952 reenactment was contemporaneous in time. Thus, McKlesky has no bearing on the Court's decision here.

[32]See Cotton, 157 F.3d at 391-92 (explaining that the amendment in question removed burglary, an offense commonly relied on to disenfranchise Black people, and broadened the applicability of the statute to include murder and rape to better fit the state's race-neutral disenfranchisement purposes); Johnson, 405 F.3d at 1223-24 (similarly reasoning that the specific amendment at issue went through multiple revisions and committee reviews with the purpose of removing the racial taint from a prior felon-disenfranchisement statute).

the statute in question was reenacted, and (iii) there was no evidence of discriminatory intent of the reenacting legislature. See Hayden, 594 F.3d at 167.

Carrillo-Lopez's case is completely distinguishable. The legislatures in Hayden, Cotton, and Johnson substantively amended the prior iterations of the laws in question in an attempt to make them less racially targeted. But Section 1326 was not substantively changed, or even genuinely debated. Instead, the 1952 Congress sought only to ease law enforcement's burden in prosecuting those subject to Section 1326. While the Hayden, Cotton, and Johnson legislatures were expressly revising felon-disenfranchisement laws to make them more race-neutral, the 1952 Congress did not depart from the original enactment of Section 1326 and instead adopted it in its entirety into the INA. Moreover, that addition happened at a time that Congress did not appear to be overly concerned with its animus toward Mexican and Latinx people, but instead welcomed racist epithets. Carrillo-Lopez has demonstrated that the 1952 reenactment not only failed to reconcile with the racial animus of the Act of 1929, but was further embroiled by contemporary racial animus and discriminatory intent. The Court therefore concludes that Abbott, Hayden, Cotton, and Johnson do not prohibit considering the motivations of the Act of 1929 when determining whether the 1952 Congress was motivated by a similar discriminatory intent.

4. The Court disagrees with the conclusions of other district courts that have addressed this issue.

The Court notes that Section 1326 has lately faced scrutiny in several district courts. The parties have routinely supplemented their briefing in response to these developments,[33] and the Court has worked to stay abreast of recent decisions.[34] As the Court understands the present status, no court that has addressed this issue has found that Section 1326 is unconstitutional under Arlington Heights. The Court will therefore explain its reasons for departing from the holdings of its sister courts.

The two cases cited by the government, Medina-Zepeda and Palacios-Arias, are distinguishable because they considered solely evidence from the 1952 reenactment. (ECF Nos. 43-1, 29-1.) Unlike in those cases, the Court here considers the surrounding legislative history and context of both the Act of 1929 and 1952 INA. The Central District of California reasoned in Medina-Zepeda that dicta in Ramos v. Louisiana, 140 S. Ct. 1390 2020), and Espinoza v. Mont. Dep't of Revenue, 140 S. Ct. 2246 (2020), was insufficient authority to justify relying solely on legislative history from the 1920s. (ECF No. 43-1 at 6 ("Defendant provides no authority or basis for the court to evaluate the 1952 statute solely on the basis of the legislative history relating to the Undesirable Aliens Act of 1929.").) The Court agrees with that reasoning. However, the Court here does not only consider historical background from the 1920s. Medina-Zepeda therefore cannot guide the Court's determination of whether Carrillo-Lopez has met his burden under Arlington Heights.

Rios-Montano*, Case No. 19-cr-2123 (S.D. Cal. Dec. 8, 2020) (ECF No. 31-1); United States v. Medina-Zepeda, Case No. CR 20-0057 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 5, 2021) (ECF No. 43-1). The government additionally cites to United States v. Morales-Roblero, 2020 WL 5517594 (S.D. Cal. Sept. 14, 2020) (ECF No. 29 at 6 n.6) and United States v. Ruiz-Rivera, Case No. 20-mj-20306-AHG (S.D. Cal. Sept. 2, 2020) (ECF No. 29 at 22 n.13) in its opposition brief. Palacios-Arias and Medina-Zepeda address the constitutionality of Section 1326, and will be discussed below. Rios-Montano, Morales-Roblero, and Ruiz-Rivera address the constitutionality of Section 1325, which is also part of the INA but has a separate legislative history. Accordingly, the Court will focus on cases that challenge Section 1326 specifically.

[34]In addition to the parties' briefing, the Court notes that several courts have lately ruled on this issue. See United States v. Machic-Xiap, Case No. 3:19-cr-407-SI, 2021 WL 3362738 (D. Or. Aug. 3, 2021); United States v. Wence, Case No. 3:20-cr-0027, 2021 WL 2463567 (D.V.I. Jun. 16, 2021); United States v. Gutierrez-Barba, Case No. CR-19-01224-001-PHX-DJH, 2021 WL 2138801 (D. Ariz. May 25, 2021). The Court will address the arguments in Machic-Xiap and Wence below. However, the Court will not address Gutierrez-Barba, which applied a deferential rational-basis review instead of Arlington Heights, and is therefore unhelpful to the Court's analysis. See 2021 WL 2138801 at *5.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The Court similarly finds Palacios-Arias distinguishable. (ECF No. 29-1.) The Eastern District of Virginia reasoned that evidence of animus from the 70th Congress cannot necessarily be imputed to the 82nd Congress. Again, the Court agrees. But Carrillo-Lopez has provided evidence of contemporaneous discriminatory intent motivating the passage of the 1952 INA. Moreover, the Court will not ignore that Congress in 1952 adopted the language of Section 1326 without substantially changing the law and without debate or discussion of the invidious racism that motivated the Act of 1929, only to make it more punitive.

Two district courts, however, have recently found that substantially similar evidence to that which the Court here considers is insufficient for a defendant to meet their burden. Ultimately, the Court disagrees.

In United States v. Wence, the District Court of the Virgin Islands applied Arlington Heights but found the defendant had not met his burden because "Wence has failed to provide any legislative history or other evidence suggestive of the motives of the 82nd Congress." See 2021 WL 2463567, at *7. After considering the "problematic rhetoric" surrounding the INA's passage, as well as the Truman veto statement and override, that court concluded "Wence has not cited any part of the legislative history which discloses any racial animus in the law against Latinx aliens" and "the legislative history for the 1952 and 1929 legislation does not reveal any discriminatory motive." Id. at *9. First, the Court disagrees with that conclusion—as explained above, the record demonstrates discriminatory motivations as to both statutes. But the Court further rejects the Wence court's conclusion because that court appeared to blur the defendant's burden under Arlington Heights, reasoning that alternative "valid immigration considerations," id., balanced out the evident "issues" with the INA, id. at *8. But see Arlington Heights, 429 U.S. at 265 (explaining that a challenger need not "prove that the challenged action rested solely on a racially discriminatory purpose"). Moreover, the Wence court relies on Hayden, Cotton, and Johnson to support that deliberation of other sections of the INA is sufficient to cleanse the reenacted Section 1326 of its original discriminatory motivation, despite the fact that Section 1326 was neither specifically debated nor substantively changed. The Court is therefore unpersuaded by Wence.

In Machic-Xiap, the District Court for the District of Oregon considered a similar challenge to Section 1326 based on similar evidence as presented here. See Machic-Xiap, 2021 WL 3362738, at *12. The Machic-Xiap court detailed an extensive historical record, and found not only that the Act of 1929 served "racist purposes," id. at *12, but also that the defendant did provide some evidence of racial animus during the 1952 reenactment, id. at *12-14. But after concluding that the historical evidence of the Act of 1929 was "strong," id. at *12, the Machic-Xiap court carefully examined the remaining evidence and found that despite evidence of racist motivation, each piece of evidence should not be given significant or conclusive weight. See id. It is apparent that the Machic-Xiap court conducted a thorough and sensitive inquiry, and this Court agrees that any individual piece of evidence alone would likely be insufficient to demonstrate that racial animus was a motivating factor. But, as stated above, the Court views the evidence—of historical background, legislative history, sequence of events, and departure from normal deliberative process—under the totality of the circumstances. While each piece of evidence may be insufficient alone, together they show discriminatory intent on behalf of the 1952 Congress specifically, and with regards to Section 1326 specifically.

The Machic-Xiap court further limited its reliance on evidence from 1929 based on its application of Abbott. See id. at *14. While the Court agrees that racial animus from a prior enacting legislature cannot be necessarily imputed to a reenacting legislature, the Court reads Abbott to require that the reenacting legislature make some substantive change before known racial animus is cleansed. See Abbott, 138 S. Ct. at 2325. Although courts have an obligation to give a reenacting legislature the presumption of good faith,[35] that presumption is not insurmountable. Here, the 1929 provision and Section 1326 are nearly identical, the only change was not substantive, and that change was motivated by [35] See Machic-Xiap, 2021 WL 3362738 at *15 (citing Abbott and N.C. St. Conf. of the NAACP v. Raymond, 981 F.3d 295, 303 (4th Cir. 2020)).

the Ford Letter which sought to expand the enforceability of the 1929 provision while referring to Latinx people as "wetbacks." As explained above, Abbott does not shield the reenacting legislature from scrutiny in light of such evidence. The Court therefore disagrees with the conclusion of the Machic-Xiap court and finds that the evidence Carrillo-Lopez presents is sufficient to meet his burden under Arlington Heights.

The Court is aware that proving discriminatory intent motivated the passage of a specific statute is difficult—in fact, unprecedented.[36] But despite the high threshold, the Court cannot deny that when considered as a whole, the evidence indicates discriminatory intent on the part of the 1952 Congress.

C. The government has failed to show that Section 1326 would have been enacted absent the discriminatory motivation.

Having found that Carrillo-Lopez met his burden under Arlington Heights, the burden shifts to the government to establish that "the same decision would have resulted even had the impermissible purpose not been considered." 429 U.S. at 270 n. 21. The government argues that it is "obvious and uncontroverted that valid, nondiscriminatory objectives motivated the passage of Section 1326 in 1952 and its later amendments." (ECF No. 51 at 11.) The government offers no independent evidence, but points instead to Carrillo-Lopez's own expert testimony to propose three allegedly permissible motivations: (1) a desire to protect American citizens from economic competition; (2) a need to maintain national security; and (3) a need to maintain foreign relations with international allies. (ECF No. 52 at 11.) As the Court explains below, the testimony does not support a conclusion that these alternative motivations can easily be separated from the demonstrated discriminatory intent.

The government advances two additional arguments that do not offer alternative motivations for the passage of Section 1326, but which it claims are sufficient to show that Section 1326 would have been enacted absent discriminatory intent. The government first argues the Ninth Circuit once found Section 1326 is "a necessary piece of the immigration-regulation framework." (ECF No. 51 at 12 (citing U.S. v. Hernandez-Guerrero, 147 F.3d 1075, 1078 (9th Cir. 1998).) Second, the government argues that because Section 1326 has been passed "six times in various amended versions, all in the absence of any evidence of discriminatory intent, the Court need not engage in a counterfactual analysis to conclude that the law would pass absent discriminatory intent." (ECF No. 51 at 13.) The Court will also address these arguments after its evaluation of the proposed nondiscriminatory motivations.

[36] See Machic-Xiap, 2021 WL 3362738 at *1.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

1. Alternative Nondiscriminatory Motivations

The government has not met its burden under Arlington Heights. By failing to offer any independent evidence of "obvious and uncontroverted . . . nondiscriminatory objectives" motivating the passage of Section 1326, the government limits itself to relying solely on the testimony of defense experts and distinguishable case law. (ECF No. 51 at 11.) But the expert testimony from Professors Lytle Hernández and Gonzalez O'Brien does not support the government's proffered alternative reasons. Instead, that testimony convincingly demonstrates that the government's proffered reasons are so intertwined with racial animus such that they cannot successfully show that the "same decision would have resulted even had the impermissible purpose not been considered." See Arlington Heights, 429 U.S. at 270 n. 21. The Court will address each argument in turn.

a. Economic Competition

The government first argues that border enforcement was driven "by a desire to protect American citizens from economic competition," citing only to Professor Lytle Hernández's testimony to support this proposition. (ECF No. 51 at 11.) At the Hearing, Professor Lytle Hernández agrees with the government's claim that leaders of the Mexican-American middle class supported immigration enforcement because "they thought that increased border enforcement would improve job security" (ECF No. 49 at 42-43), but she goes on to explain that this economic competition was rooted in racialization and played up to "create the notion that they were in competition with each other." (ECF No. 49 at 42-43). Specifically, she notes:

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

> There was a notion that there was a, sort of, zero sum game of jobs, right, and that people of Mexican descent, largely because of segregation in the United States and because of that racial subrogation, gave this notion that Mexican-origin folks had to fight for the same jobs as to opposed to having all jobs open to them, and that certainly helped to create this notion that they were in competition with each other.

(Id.)

Moreover, some economic programs like the Bracero program targeted non-white populations. Professor Lytle Hernández explains that targeting is a "key indicator[] of the dynamics at play, that it's not just labor, it's a racialized labor form." (ECF No. 49 at 75-76.) Bracero workers were "an exploited labor force," subjected to racialized stereotyping and inhumane treatment. She details in her testimony that Bracero workers were routinely gassed with DDT and subjected to invasive inspections. The workers were racially stereotyped as being "fit for agricultural labor," unlike their white immigrant or domestic counterparts. (Id. at 77-78.) Professor Lytle Hernández's testimony concludes that any stated desire to protect American citizens from economic competition cannot reasonably be divorced from the underlying racialization of Mexican migrant laborers.

The Court agrees that even—or in this case, especially—under the auspice of economic motivation, immigration is not intrinsically separate from racial animus. Without offering any additional evidence, the government fails show that economic competition was a potential motivating factor absent the impermissible motivation: racial animus.

b. National Security

The Court is similarly unpersuaded by the government's argument that Section 1326 was recodified due to "a need to maintain national security." (ECF No. 51 at 11.) Again, the government cites only to Professor Lytle Hernández's testimony[37] to suggest [37]Professor Lytle Hernández further explains how the national security concerns of the period relevant to the INA's passage were motivated by racialized labor policies like the Bracero Program. "Q: So the start of the Bracero program happened roughly around the onset of World War II, correct? A: Yes. Post-U.S. entry into the war. Q: Right. And you wrote in Migra that this triggered increased national security and geopolitical concerns, given that the U.S. shared a 2000-mile border with Mexico, correct? A: Correct. Q: And you wrote that the U.S. State Department put pressure on the INS and Border Patrol to close the door to undocumented migrants during this time, correct? A: Correct.

that Section 1326 was reenacted to maintain national security interests. (Id.) But, following the testimony cited in the government's brief, Professor Lytle-Hernández went on to say:

> I mean, all of this activity is happening, you know, I would argue, uh, yes, within foreign relations, with an (unintelligible) of foreign relations, with an integrated economy, around labor concerns, concerns about what's emerging as the Cold War. Racial animus is also at play. There is no way in which we can understand the politics of head shaving as something that would have been tolerable for other than Mexican immigrants in this time period. And the involvement of the Mexican government does not mean that racial animus is not at play. Mexico has a long and deep history of race and subrogation, especially for indigenous folks. So, the story of race transcends the border.

(ECF No. 49 at 53 (emphasis added).) When considered in the context that the government omits, Professor Lytle Hernández's testimony indicates that the desire to maintain national security cannot be viewed alone because it only offers an explanation in part. But her more complete answer turned on the conclusion that "racial animus is also at play."[38]

The Court cannot consider that Professor Lytle Hernández's testimony, standing alone, is sufficient to demonstrate that the need to maintain national security is an "obvious and uncontroverted . . . nondiscriminatory objective motivat[ing] the passage of Section 1326 in 1952" as the government argues. With no further evidence, the government has again failed to meet its burden.

c. Foreign Relations

Finally, the government fails to show that "a need to maintain foreign relations with international allies, including Mexico" was a motivating factor independent from the demonstrated racial animus. (ECF No. 51 at 11.) Again, the government relies solely on

Q: In part, because of the national security concern presented by having a forced border during the world war, correct? A: In part, yeah." (ECF No. 49 at 50 (excerpts of government counsel's cross-examination of Professor Lytle Hernández).)

[38]In response to the government's prompting to restrict her testimony to the questions asked, Professor Lytle Hernández responded: "Well I just want to be full in my answers, so—everything is complicated so yes/no is not always the accurate answer. So when I think I need to give a little bit more context, I would like to be able to do that." (ECF No. 49 at 53-54.)

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Professor Lytle Hernández's testimony. (ECF Nos. 49 at 44-47; 51 at 11-12.) But contrary to the government's conclusions, Professor Lytle Hernández testified that a nuanced understanding of foreign relations shows the dynamic in 1952 was still grounded in racial animus. While Professor Lytle Hernández acknowledges there was a concern about maintaining foreign relations with Mexico, she again goes on to say, as quoted in full above, that "racial animus is also at play" when considering the United States' foreign policy with Mexico during that period, and "the involvement of the Mexican government does not mean that rational animus is not at play." (ECF No. 49 at 53.) She further explains that during this period, Mexico "is a junior partner" in the two countries' partnership and that "they're not dictating, by any means, to the Untied States Government about how this is going to go." (Id. at 47.) The government's selective citation ignores repeated testimony emphasizing the connection between foreign relations and racial animus, and Professor Lytle Hernández's qualification that the United States felt free to enact legislation it felt was appropriate. It is therefore not possible for the Court to conclude based upon the record before it that the need to maintain a relationship with the government of Mexico is a factor extricable from the demonstrated discriminatory motives of the period.

Without more, the government has failed to show that valid, nondiscriminatory objectives motivated the passage of 1326 and later amendments.

2. Inferred Nondiscriminatory Intent

The government argues that even absent a nondiscriminatory motive, the Court can infer that the 1952 Congress had a valid, nondiscriminatory objective in passing Section 1326. (ECF No. 51 at 11-12.) The Court finds the government's proffered alternative reasoning in support of Section 1326 nonresponsive and unpersuasive. The government's only proffered evidence is the Ninth Circuit's language in United States v. Hernandez-Guerrero, in which the court stated it is "plain" that Section 1326 "is a necessary piece of the immigration-regulation framework." 147 F.3d 1075, 1078 (9th Cir. 1998). But the issue before the court in Hernandez-Guerrero was whether Congress exceeded the scope of its constitutional authority when enacting Section 1326, a criminal immigration statute. See id. The Ninth Circuit held that because Section 1326 was a piece of immigration regulation, Congress acted within its authority to enact the statute. See id.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

But Hernandez-Guerrero has no bearing on this case because the limits of Congress' immigration powers are not at issue here. The question is not whether Congress functionally had the authority to pass a criminal immigration statute, but whether the motivation behind Section 1326's enactment was racially discriminatory in violation of the Equal Protection Clause. That issue was not raised or discussed in Hernandez-Guerrero and the Court accordingly finds its application of limited use.

Ultimately, the fact that Congress has the authority to pass immigration regulations like Section 1326 does not foreclose the possibility that such legislation was passed with discriminatory intent, nor does it preclude the Court from determining whether Section 1326 is unconstitutional on other grounds. The government's own briefing concedes that courts may infer that nondiscriminatory motivation sufficient to displace discriminatory motivation only absent evidence of discriminatory intent. (ECF No. 51 at 12.) But here, Carrillo-Lopez offers substantial evidence that improper discriminatory motives were at least a factor in Section 1326's passage. Accordingly, the Court declines to infer that Section 1326's utility to the overall immigration scheme justifies an inference of nondiscriminatory motive.

3. Repeated Amendment

Finally, the government argues that it has met its burden under the second prong of Arlington Heights "given that Section 1326 has been passed six times in various amended versions, all in the absence of any evidence of discriminatory intent . . ." (ECF No. 51 at 13.) The government relies on the Eleventh Circuit's reasoning in Johnson v. Governor of State of Florida, in which the court held that "the state met its burden as a matter of law by substantively reenacting the law for race-neutral reasons" because repassage of an amended version of the statute "conclusively demonstrates that the [legislature] would enact the provision without an impermissible motive." 405 F.3d 1214,

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

1224 (11th Cir. 2005) (en banc). The Court finds Johnson is distinguishable and is unpersuaded that subsequent Congresses have cleansed § 1326 of its racial taint through amendment alone.

First, the Court does not agree that the subsequent amendments were "substantive." In addressing whether an 1868 felon disenfranchisement provision was alleviated of its racial taint by a subsequent 1968 reenactment, the Johnson court considered that the reenactment "narrowed the class of persons" to whom the disenfranchisement provision would be applicable. See id. Moreover, the Eleventh Circuit noted that the Florida legislature engaged in an extensive deliberative process in which many alternatives were considered to revise the 1868 law in conformance with modern goals. See id. at 1221-22.

But Section 1326's reenactment and subsequent amendments never substantively altered the original provision, making this case distinguishable from Johnson. Since 1952, Section 1326 has been amended five times—in 1988, 1990, 1994, and twice in 1996.[39] These amendments did not change the operation of Section 1326, but instead served to increase financial and carceral penalties. The 1988 amendments added increased imprisonment time for those with prior felony convictions.[40] The 1990 amendment removed the $1,000 cap on financial penalties.[41] The 1994 amendments increased the penalties for persons convicted of felonies from five years to 10, and for those convicted of aggravated felonies from 15 years to 20, while also drawing in additional penalties for persons with certain misdemeanor convictions.[42] And the 1996 amendments to §

Second, there has been no attempt at any point to grapple with the racist history of Section 1326 or remove its influence on the legislation. The Supreme Court has noted in concurrences on two recent occasions that a legislature's failure to confront a provision's racist past may keep it "'[t]ethered' to its original 'bias.'" Espinoza v. Mont. Dep't of Revenue, 140 S. Ct. 2246, 2274 (2020) (Alito, J., concurring); see also Ramos v. Louisiana, 140 S. Ct. 1390, 1410 (2020) (Sotomayor, J., concurring) ("Where a law otherwise is untethered to racial bias—and perhaps also where a legislature actually confronts a law's tawdry past in reenacting it—the new law may well be free of discriminatory taint. That cannot be said of the laws at issue here.").[45] This reasoning is [43]Carrillo-Lopez was charged only with violating §§ 1326(a) and (b), while the AEDPA amendments added §§ 1326(c) and (d), which deal with collateral habeas corpus relief. See Pub. [45]Other district courts in this circuit have rejected applying Ramos and Espinoza to similar challenges, but those cases are distinguishable. The clearest distinguishable reason is that other courts reject the relevancy of the 1929 legislative history absent something contemporaneous with the 1952 reenactment. See United States v. Lazcano-Neria, Case No. 3:20-mj-04538-AHG, 2020 WL 6363685, at *8 (S.D. Cal. Oct. 29, 2020) (rejecting the argument that § 1325 of the INA must reckon with the racist legislative history that happened "decades before" because the defendant did not supply an analysis of "relevant legislative history"); see also United States v. Rios-Montano, Case No. 19-CR-2123-GPC, 2020 WL 7226441, at *3 (S.D. Cal. Dec. 8, 2020) (same); United State v. Lucas-Hernandez, Case No. 19MJ24522-LL, 2020 WL 6161150, at *3 (S.D. Cal. Oct. 21, 2020) (same); United States v. Ruiz-Rivera, Case No. 3:20-mj-20306-AHG2020 WL 5230519, at *3 (S.D. Cal. Sept. 2, 2020) (same).

In United States v. Gutierrez-Barba, the district court declined to apply Ramos and Espinoza because it found the statute had been cleansed by a later amendment. See Case No. CR-19-01224-001-PHX-DJH, 2021 WL 2138801, at *3-4 (D. Ariz. May 25, 2021). But that court addressed only the discriminatory intent of the Act of 1929 and did not consider evidence that the 1952 reenactment was also motivated by not binding precedent, nor does the fact that a prior iteration of a statute was tainted by racial animus necessarily mean that every subsequent reenactment will be. See, e.g., Abbott, 138 S. Ct. at 2325 (confirming that, while past discrimination does not "flip[] the evidentiary burden on its head," the historical background of legislative enactment is "relevant to the question of intent"). But this reasoning is instructive and, here, persuasive.

Carrillo-Lopez has established, and the government concedes, that the Act of 1929 was motivated by racial animus. The government does not assert the 1952 Congress addressed that history when it reenacted Section 1326. Moreover, the government fails to demonstrate how any subsequent amending Congress addressed either the racism that initially motivated the Act of 1929 or the discriminatory intent that was contemporaneous with the 1952 reenactment. The record before the Court reflects that at no point has Congress confronted the racist, nativist roots of Section 1326. Instead, the amendments to Section 1326 over the past ninety years have not changed its function but have simply made the provision more punitive and broadened its reach. Accordingly, the Court cannot find that subsequent amendments somehow cleansed the statute of its history while retaining the language and functional operation of the original statute.

In conclusion, the government has failed to establish that a nondiscriminatory motivation existed in 1952 for reenacting Section 1326 that exists independently from the discriminatory motivations, in either 1929 or 1952. Moreover, the government's alternative arguments—that a nondiscriminatory motive was "plain" or that subsequent amendments somehow imply the racial taint was cleansed—are not supported by caselaw nor borne out by the evidentiary record. In sum, on the record before the Court, the Court can only conclude that the government has not met its burden. Because Section 1326 violates the contemporaneous discriminatory intent. Moreover, the Court disagrees with that court's conclusion that Section 1326 was ultimately cleansed of any racial animus by a 1965 amendment elsewhere in the INA which purported to prohibit discrimination on the basis of race, sex, nationality, place of birth, or place of residence. See id. at *4 (referencing Pub. L. No. 89-236, 66 Stat. 175, 911 (Oct. 3, 1965)). That amendment was added to 8 U.S.C. § 1152, a subsection that prohibited discrimination between members of "any single foreign state." The Court will not extend this provision, which does not even address discrimination between immigrants from different countries, to a criminal statute with demonstrated racist origins in a separate section of the subchapter.

III. CONCLUSION

The Court notes that the parties made several arguments and cited to several cases not discussed above. The Court has reviewed these arguments and cases and determines that they do not warrant discussion as they do not affect the outcome of the motions before the Court.

It is therefore ordered that Carrillo-Lopez's motion to dismiss (ECF No. 26) is granted.

It is further ordered that Carrillo-Lopez's indictment (ECF No. 1) is dismissed.

The Clerk of Court is directed to enter judgment accordingly and close the case.

I. SUMMARY

On June 25, 2020, Defendant Gustavo Carrillo-Lopez was indicted on one count of deported alien found in the United States in violation of 8 U.S.C. § 1326(a) & (b) ("Section 1326"). (ECF No. 1.) Before the Court is Carrillo-Lopez's motion to dismiss the indictment (the "Motion") on the grounds that Section 1326 violates the equal protection guarantee of the Fifth Amendment under the standard articulated in Village of Arlington Heights v. Metropolitan Housing Development Corp., 429 U.S. 252 (1977).[1] (ECF No. 26.) On January 22, 2021, the Court heard oral argument on the Motion (ECF No. 39 ("Oral Argument")), and on February 2, 2021, the Court held an evidentiary hearing (ECF Nos. 48, 49 (the "Hearing").[2] Because Carrillo-Lopez has established that Section 1326 was enacted with a discriminatory purpose and that the law has a disparate impact on Latinx persons, and the government fails to show that Section 1326 would have been enacted absent racial animus—and as further discussed below—the Court will grant the Motion.

[1]The government responds. (ECF No. 29.) Carrillo-Lopez replies. (ECF No. 30.) Carrillo-Lopez filed two supplements to the Motion. (ECF Nos. 31, 33.)

[2]At the Hearing, Carrillo-Lopez called two defense experts: Professor Kelly Lytle Hernández and Professor Benjamin Gonzalez O'Brien. The Court ordered both parties to file post-hearing briefs. (ECF Nos. 50 (Carrillo-Lopez brief); 51 (government brief).)

II. DISCUSSION

Having considered the briefing, arguments of counsel, and expert testimony of Professors Benjamin Gonzalez O'Brien and Kelly Lytle Hernández, the Court ultimately grants the Motion. First, the Court will explain the applicable standard of review: the test outlined in Arlington Heights. Next, the Court will determine whether Carrillo-Lopez has met his burden. Because Carrillo-Lopez has demonstrated that Section 1326 disparately impacts Latinx people and that the statute was motivated, at least in part, by discriminatory intent, the Court finds that he has. Finally, the Court reviews whether the government has shown that Section 1326 would have been enacted absent discriminatory intent. Because the government fails to so demonstrate, the Court finds its burden has not been met and that, consequently, Section 1326 violates the Equal Protection Clause of the Fifth Amendment.

A. Arlington Heights applies to Section 1326.

As a preliminary matter, the Court must determine which standard to apply. The parties dispute, but the Court finds that the test outlined in Arlington Heights applies to criminal immigration laws such as Section 1326.

Under the Fifth Amendment's equal protection guarantee, a law can violate equal protection in three ways: (1) a law can discriminate on its face (see, e.g., Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967)); (2) authorities can apply a facially neutral law in a discriminatory manner (see, e.g., Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U.S. 356 (1886)); or (3) a legislature may enact a facially neutral law with a discriminatory purpose in a way that disparately impacts a specific group (see, e.g., Arlington Heights, 429 U.S. at 265-68).

Carrillo-Lopez argues that Section 1326 violates his right to equal protection, specifically as articulated in Arlington Heights. The government counters that the statute should not be assessed under an equal protection framework because Congress' plenary power over immigration subjects immigration laws such as Section 1326 to a highly deferential standard of review. (ECF No. 29 at 7-11 (citing Kleindienst v. Mandel, 408

U.S. 753, 765 (1972); Fiallo v. Bell, 430 U.S. 787, 792 (1977)).)[3] The government asserts that criminal immigration laws are to receive the same deferential review, or rational bias review. (Id. at 10-11 (citing U.S. v. Hernandez-Guerrero, 147 F.3d 1075, 1078 (9th Cir. 1998); U.S. v. Ruiz-Chairez, 493 F.3d 1089 (9th Cir. 2007); U.S. v. Lopez-Flores, 63 F.3d 1468 (9th Cir. 1995)).)

Arlington Heights applies here. As an initial matter, the Supreme Court has held that greater protections under the Fifth Amendment necessarily apply when the government seeks to "punish[] by deprivation of liberty and property." Wong Wing v. United States, 163 U.S. 228, 237 (1896) ("[E]ven aliens shall not be held to answer for a capital or other infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."). The Court is unpersuaded that a criminal law enacted by Congress is free from constitutional equal protection constraints, even if the offense relates to immigration.

The federal government's plenary power over immigration does not give it license to enact racially discriminatory statutes in violation of equal protection. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals and a plurality of the United States Supreme Court declined to adopt the standard advanced by the government in race-based equal protection challenges of immigration decisions by the executive, and instead applied Arlington Heights. See Regents of the Univ. of Cal. v. U.S. Dep't of Homeland Sec., 908 F.3d 476, 518-20 (9th Cir. 2018), rev'd in part, vacated in part sub nom. Dep't of Homeland Sec. v. Regents of the Univ. of Cal., 140 S. Ct. 1891 (2020));[4] see also Ramos v. Wolf, 975 F.3d 872, 896-99 (9th Cir. 2020) (declining to apply a more deferential standard in favor of Arlington Heights). In both Regents and Wolf, the Ninth Circuit distinguished Trump v. Hawaii, 138

[4]On review, a plurality of the Supreme Court agreed with the Ninth Circuit that Arlington Heights applied. See Dep't of Homeland Sec. 140 S. Ct. at 1915-16. Ultimately, the plaintiff's claims were rejected on other grounds. Id.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

S. Ct. 2392 (2019), where the Court applied a more deferential standard to an establishment clause challenge of an executive order concerning immigration. Specifically, the Ninth Circuit found that the standard applied in Trump did not similarly apply to equal protection challenges because it differed "in several potentially important respects, including the physical location of the plaintiffs within the geographic United States, the lack of national security justification for the challenged government action, and the nature of the constitutional claim raised." Regents, 908 F.3d at 520; see also Wolf, 975 F.3d at 895 ("[T]he deferential standard of review applied in Trump v. Hawaii turned primarily on the Court's recognition of the fundamental authority of the executive branch to manage our nation's foreign policy and national security affairs without judicial interference.").

The government's counterargument is not persuasive. The Ninth Circuit recognized a difference between situations that invoke the President's expansive executive authority "to respond to changing world conditions" in matters of national security and the Court's mandate to ensure all people are afforded equal protection under the law. See Wolf, 975 F.3d at 896 (quoting Trump, 138 S. Ct. at 2419). That Carrillo-Lopez challenges a criminal law—which goes to the "nature" of the Fifth Amendment's protective concern—applicable to those within the United States, rather than an immigration policy addressing national security concerns of those not within the United States, is further evidence that his equal protection challenge should be reviewed under a more heightened standard than the rational-basis standard that the government proposed.[5]

Moreover, the three Ninth Circuit cases the government relies on to argue that immigration laws are subject to rational-basis review despite "§1326's criminal character"

[5]If anything, the Supreme Court's justification in Trump v. Hawaii for increased deference is inapplicable to Congressional action, as the Court's review does not directly implicate the executive's core function. See Ramos, 975 F.3d at 895 ("[T]he deferential standard of review applied in Trump v. Hawaii turned primarily on the Court's recognition of the fundamental authority of the executive branch to manage our nation's foreign policy and national security affairs without judicial interference.").

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

fail to support such an argument. (ECF No. 30 at 10.) First, Hernandez-Guerrero establishes only that Congress did not exceed its constitutional authority under its immigration powers when it enacted Section 1326. See 147 F.3d at 1078. The Ninth Circuit did not hear or address an equal protection challenge to Section 1326 in Hernandez-Guerrero, much less determine which standard of review applies. Moreover, both Lopez-Flores, 63 F.3d at 1475, and Ruiz-Chairez, 493 F.3d at 1091, simply establish that a challenged alienage classification qualifies for rational-basis review. But here, race and national origin, not alienage, is the classification in dispute.

Finally, the Court finds persuasive the fact that several district courts have similarly applied Arlington Heights to race-based immigration challenges brought by individuals residing in the United States,[6] including when reviewing equal protection challenges to Section 1326.[7]

Considering the above, the Court finds that Section 1326 must be reviewed under the Arlington Heights equal protection framework.

B. Carrillo-Lopez has met his burden under Arlington Heights.

Having found that Arlington Heights applies, the Court must now determine whether Carrillo-Lopez has met his burden. The Court finds that he has.

Under Arlington Heights, the moving party has the burden of demonstrating: (1) disparate impact;[8] and (2) that "racially discriminatory intent or purpose" was a "motivating factor in the decision." 429 U.S. at 265-68. Determining discriminatory intent requires a "sensitive inquiry into such circumstantial and direct evidence of intent as may be available," including, but not limited to: "[t]he historical background of the decision"; "[t]he legislative or administrative history"; "[t]he specific sequence of events leading to the challenged action"; "[d]epartures from normal procedural sequence"; or whether the impact of the law "bears more heavily on one race than another." Id. at 266-68. If the movant demonstrates that a racially discriminatory intent or purposes was a motivating factor in the challenged decision, the burden then shifts to the government to establish that "the same decision would have resulted even had the impermissible purpose not been considered." Id. at 270 n. 21.

Before Section 1326 was enacted in 1952, Congress first criminalized unlawful reentry in 1929 as part of the Undesirable Aliens Act ("the Act of 1929").[9] See Act of Mar. 4, 1929, Pub. L. No. 70-1018, ch. 690, 70 Congress, 45 Stat. 1551 (1929). The Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952 ("INA"), often referred to as The McCarran-Walter Act ("McCarran-Walter Act"), again codified the unlawful reentry provision first passed in 1929 under Title 8 of the United States Code, at 8 U.S.C.A. § 1326.[10] Section 1326 was

[9]In relevant part, the statute reads: "That (a) if any alien has been arrested and deported in pursuance of law, he shall be excluded from admission to the United States whether such deportation took place before or after the enactment of this act, and if he enters or attempts to enter the United States after the expiration of sixty days after the enactment of this act, he shall be guilty of a felony and upon conviction thereof shall, unless a different penalty is otherwise expressly provided by law, be punished by imprisonment for not more than two years or by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by both such fine and imprisonment." Immigration and Nationality Act, Pub. L. No. 82-414, § 276, 66 Stat. 229 (codified at 8 U.S.C. § 1326 (1952)).

[11]Section 1326 was first amended in the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988 by adding subsection (b) which created increased penalties for those with prior felony convictions. See Pub. L. 100-690, title VII § 7345(a), 102 Stat. 4471 (Nov. 18, 1988) (codified at 8 U.S.C. § 1326 (1988)). The new Section 1326(b) provided that a person with a prior felony conviction who reenters may be imprisoned up to five years, and a person with an aggravated felony conviction may be imprisoned up to 15 years.

In 1990, the Immigration Act of 1990 removed the $1,000 cap and authorized greater fines under Title 18. See Pub. L. 101-649, title V § 543(b)(3), 104 Stat. 5059 (Nov. 29, 1990).

In 1994, the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act of 1994 again increased penalties for violating Section 1326 and included those with misdemeanor convictions in the heightened penalty category. See Pub. L. 103-322, title XIII § 130001(b), 108 Stat. 2023 (Sept. 13, 1994) (codified at 8 U.S.C. § 1326 (1994)). Specifically, the 1994 Amendments increased the imprisonment time for those with a prior felony conviction from up to five years to up to 10 years, and for those with a prior aggravated felony conviction from up to 15 years to up to 20 years. The amendment also included persons with "three or more misdemeanors involving drugs, crimes against the person, or both" in the group with the penalty of up to 10 years imprisonment. Finally, the amendment broadened the definition of 'deportation' to include "any agreement in which an alien stipulates to deportation during a criminal trial under either Federal or State law." Id.

In 1996, the Antiterrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act of 1996 ("AEDPA") again amended Section 1326. Pub. L. 104-132, title IV §§ 401(c), 438(b), 441(a), 110 Stat. 1267-68, 1276, 1279 (Apr. 24, 1996) (codified at 8 U.S.C. § 1326 (2000)). AEDPA added subsections (c) and (d) to Section 1326. Subsection (c) mandates incarceration for any person who reenters after they were deported by judicial order, and subsection (d) limits collateral attack of the underlying deportation order. The AEDPA amendments also added § 1326(b)(3), which allowed persons excluded from entry under § 1225(c) to be imprisoned for a period of 10 years, which may not be served concurrently with any other sentence.

Again in 1996, as part of the Omnibus Consolidated Appropriations Act of 1997, Congress added a fourth paragraph to § 1326(b). See Pub. L. 104-208, div. C title III §§ 305(b), 308(d)(4)(J), 308(e)(1)(K), 308(e)(14)(A), 324(a), 324(b); 110 Stat. 3009-606, 3009-618 to 3009-620, 3009-629 (Sept. 30, 1996). Section 1326(b)(4) added a penalty for persons convicted of nonviolent offenses who had been removed while on parole, supervised release, or probation, who then reenter. The penalty is up to 10 years'

Carrillo-Lopez relies on the Arlington Heights factors to argue that racial animus—as evidenced through the historical background, legislative history, sequence of events leading up to passage—was, at minimum, a motivating factor in the passage of Section 1326 that disparately impacts Mexican and Latinx individuals. That racial animus would make Section 1326 presumptively unconstitutional under Arlington Heights. (ECF No. 26 at 2.) The government responds that "even assuming Congress's 1929 illegal reentry law was wholly the result of impermissible racial animus, well-established doctrine holds that such legislative history would have no bearing on the law enacted by a subsequent Congress in 1952." (ECF No. 29 at 2.)

First, the Court finds that Section 1326 does indeed disparately impact Mexican and Latinx individuals. The Court further finds, as other district courts have, that discriminatory intent motivated the criminal unlawful reentry statute in 1929.[12] But the Court further concludes the evidence Carrillo-Lopez provides demonstrating the animus which tainted the Act of 1929, along with other proffered evidence contemporaneous with the INA's enactment in 1952, is sufficient for Carrillo-Lopez to meet his burden that discriminatory intent was a motivating factor of both the 1929 and 1952 enactments.

Because the Court finds Carrillo-Lopez has met his burden under Arlington Heights, the burden shifts to the government to prove that the statute would have passed even if the impermissible purpose had not been considered. Because the government fails to provide sufficient evidence to meet its burden, the Court will grant the Motion.

1. Disparate Impact on Latinx Individuals

The Court determines first that Section 1326 disparately impacts Latinx individuals. In some "rare" instances, there is a "clear pattern unexplainable on grounds other than imprisonment and a fine. These amendments also further broadened the scope of persons to which Section 1326 applied by replacing the 1994 definition of deportation with 'removal,' which "includes any agreement in which an alien stipulates to removal during (or not during) a criminal trial under with Federal or State law." Id.

[12]See, e.g., Machic-Xiap, 2021 WL 3362738 at *1 ("[T]he Court finds that racism has permeated the official congressional debate over United States immigration laws since the late 19th and early 20th centuries, including the 1929 Act.") race" that a statute would affect some groups and not others, but "absent a pattern [of disparate impact] as stark as that in Gomillion or Yick Wo, impact alone is not determinative, and the Court must look to other factors." 429 U.S. 252 at 266. Carrillo-Lopez acknowledges, and in fact does not contend, that disparate impact alone in this case is enough to meet his burden. Rather, he proffers evidence of both disparate impact and discriminatory intent to meet his burden under Arlington Heights. The Court finds he has met his burden as to both.

Carrillo-Lopez argues, convincingly, that Section 1326 disparately impacts Mexican and Latinx defendants. (ECF No. 26 at 20.) While no publicly available data exists as to the national origin of those prosecuted under Section 1326, over 97% of persons apprehended at the border in 2000 were of Mexican decent, 86% in 2005, and 87% in 2010. (Id. (citing U.S. Border Patrol Nationwide Apprehensions by Citizenship and Sector, 2007-2019 (URL omitted).) In lieu of prosecution data, Carrillo-Lopez argues that immigration policy under President Trump and Department of Justice directives to prosecuting attorneys demonstrate that many, if not all, apprehensions are ultimately prosecuted.[13] Carrillo-Lopez then compares the data to other successful challenges under Arlington Heights to show that they meet the necessary standard of disproportionality. (Id.)

Importantly, the government does not dispute that Section 1326 bears more heavily on Mexican and Latinx individuals. Instead, the government attributes that impact to other causes—geography and proportionality. Specifically, the government argues that the stated impact is "a product of geography, not discrimination"[14] and the statistics are

[13]"The Department of Homeland Security is now referring 100 percent of illegal Southwest Border crossings to the Department of Justice for prosecution. And the Department of Justice will take up those cases." (ECF No. 26 at 20-21 (citing U.S. Dep't of Justice, Statements of AG Sessions (Apr. 6, 2018) (URL omitted)).)

[14]"Those numbers are neither surprising nor illuminating of Congress's motives in the 1920s. Indeed, if it were enough to state an equal protection claim that a broad-scale immigration law disparately affected individuals of any particular ethnicity—including those from a country sharing 1,954 miles of border with the United States—virtually any

rather "a feature of Mexico's proximity to the United States, the history of Mexican employment patterns, and other socio-political and economic factors that drive migration from Mexico to the United States–not discrimination." (ECF No. 29 at 13, 25 (citing Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1915-16).) As to "proportionality" it argues that "it makes sense that Mexican citizens comprised a high percentage of illegal entry defendants, given the suggestion that they made up a disproportionately high percentage of the overall illegal alien population." (ECF No. 29 at 14.) The Court is not persuaded.

First, the test for disparate impact only requires evidence that Section 1326 "bears more heavily on one race than another," a much less stringent standard than the government suggests. (ECF No. 30 at 12 (citing Arlington Heights, 429 U.S. at 266).) Carrillo-Lopez has met this standard by showing that Section 1326 bears more heavily on Mexican and Latinx individuals. From 1929 to 1939, the number of border crossing crimes increased substantially, making up anywhere from 84% to 99% of defendants." (ECF No. 26 at 17.) Over the course of a decade, well over 80% of border crossing apprehensions were those of Mexican or Latinx heritage.[15] These numbers are in line with other successful Arlington Heights challenges. See Ave. 6E Investments, LLC v. City of Yuma, Ariz., 818 F.3d 493, 505-06 (finding disparate impact where a concentration of most low-income housing is in neighborhoods that are 75% Hispanic); Arce v. Douglas, 793 F.3d 968, 977 (9th Cir. 2015) (finding disparate impact where 90% of enrollees at a targeted program were of Mexican or Hispanic origin); *The Comm. Concerning Cmty. Improvement v. such law could be challenged on that ground." (ECF No. 29 at 13 (citing Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1915-16).)

[15]And as noted, those apprehensions are being prosecuted. See U.S. Dep't of Justice, Statements of AG Sessions (Apr. 6, 2018) (URL omitted) ("The Department of Homeland Security is now referring 100 percent of illegal Southwest Border crossings to the Department of Justice for prosecution. And the Department of Justice will take up those cases.").

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The government also attempts to use the Supreme Court's reasoning in Regents to support its proportionality argument, but that reliance is misplaced.[16] In Regents, the Court found that disparate impact alone had not been demonstrated. But, as discussed above, Carrillo-Lopez does not attempt to meet his burden on disparate impact alone, but through a showing of disparate impact coupled with intent. Because the Court in Regents found that the plaintiffs had failed to demonstrate discriminatory intent, whereas this Court ultimately finds that Carrillo-Lopez has demonstrated both a disparate impact along with discriminatory intent, Regents is inapposite.

Second, the Court is unpersuaded by the government's argument that geography explains disparate impact. As Carrillo-Lopez notes (ECF No. 30 at 13-14), the Ninth Circuit has previously found disparate impact in situations where "geography" might arguably explain the disparity. See Comm. Improvement, 583 F.3d at 704-06 (finding that planning decisions made with racist purpose in predominantly Latino neighborhoods disparately impacts Latino people); Arce, 793 F.3d at 978 (finding that education decisions with racist purpose in Latino city has disparate impact on Latino students); D.N.C. v. Hobbs, 948 F.3d 989, 1004-06 (9th Cir. 2020) (en banc) (finding that voting decisions with racist purpose in state where American Indian, Latino, and Black neighborhoods have limited transit and mail access disparately impacts those communities). Moreover, the government's argument is circular and inconclusive. It cannot be the case that the mere over-policing of certain locations—here the Southern border as opposed to the Northern border—prevents a specific group from raising equal protection challenges. Or that because Mexican citizens will likely make up more unlawful reentries because they are a higher percentage of the overall illegal alien population, they cannot raise equal protection challenges. Ultimately, the law still bears more heavily on [16] In Regents, the Court reasoned that "because Latinos make up a large share of the unauthorized alien population, one would expect them to make up an outsized share of recipients of any cross-cutting immigration relief program. Were this fact sufficient to state a claim, virtually any generally applicable immigration policy could be challenged on equal protection grounds." 140 S. Ct. at 1915.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

those individuals than others, which is the standard that Carrillo-Lopez has met here. The Court accordingly finds that Section 1326 disparately impacts Latinx individuals.

2. The Act of 1929 was first enacted with a racially discriminatory purpose.

In his Motion and at the subsequent Oral Argument and Hearing, Carrillo-Lopez submitted significant evidence of the non-exhaustive factors outlined in Arlington Heights to argue that the Act of 1929 was passed with discriminatory intent. The government ultimately conceded that discriminatory intent motivated the passage of the Act of 1929.[17] But because the background of the Act of 1929 is relevant to the eventual passage of Section 1326 in 1952, and because the 1952 Congress adopts language from the Act of 1929 almost word for word, the Court will address each of the proffered Arlington Heights factors as they relate to the 1929 statute. The Court concludes, as did both parties, that Carrillo-Lopez presents sufficient evidence to demonstrate the Act of 1929 was motivated by racial animus.

a. Historical Background

Arlington Heights permits courts to consider "the historical background of the decision." 429 U.S. at 265-68. Carrillo-Lopez first explains how immigration legislation and racism were intimately entwined in the 1920s. Kelly Lytle Hernández, Professor of History at the University of California, Los Angeles, gives context to that history through a sworn declaration in which she testifies that "the criminalization of unauthorized entry was a racially motivated act." (ECF Nos. 26-2 at 2; 49). Professor Lytle Hernández provided context for the passage of the Act of 1929, explaining that the legislation came on the heels of the National Origins Act of 1924 which "narrow[ed] the pathways of legal immigration" by reserving 96 percent of all quota slots for European immigrants. (ECF

[17]At Oral Argument, the government's counsel stated: "I would say that, yes, the statements from those legislators would be sufficient were we considering the 1929 law, but we're not." (ECF No. 47 at 38.) The Court asked for confirmation—"so you agree that they've offered enough evidence to demonstrate that the 1929 enactment stems from racial animus under Arlington Heights"—to which the government's counsel responded, "Yes, your Honor." (Id. at 38-39.)

No. 26-2 at 4.) But the National Origins Act exempted immigrants from the Western Hemisphere, in part due to pressures from American industry who relied on Mexican labor. (Id.) Nativists and proponents of eugenics argued against this exemption.

At the Hearing, Professor Lytle Hernández emphasized how racial animus "bec[am]e more intense" heading into the 1920s, a period referred to as the "Tribal Twenties," when nativism and eugenics became more widely accepted and began to impact Congressional immigration proposals. (ECF Nos. 49 at 27-28; 26-2 at 5 ("[T]he Nativists in Congress never gave up their quest to end Mexican immigration to the United States. After the passage of the 1924 Immigration Act, they proposed bill after bill attempting to add Mexico to the quota system. Between 1926 and 1930, Congress repeatedly debated the future of Mexican immigration into the United States.").) Additionally, and among other things, Professor Lytle Hernández also addressed the "Juan Crow regime" that developed in the 1920s, "a racialized subjugation system in place that mirrors what [was] happening in the American South." (ECF No. 49 at 32.)

b. Sequence of Events and Legislative History

Courts may also consider "the specific sequence of events leading to the challenged action." Arlington Heights, 429 U.S. at 265-68. Professor Lytle Hernández again provided insight into the events surrounding the passage of the Act of 1929, notably the National Origins Act of 1924 which established a quota system based on national origin that specifically exempted immigrants from the Western Hemisphere, including Mexicans. (ECF No. 49 at 27-28.) This exemption resulted in a "pretty rapid turn to focusing on getting Mexican immigrants included on the quota," with two major pieces of legislation attempted in 1926 and 1928, but both protested by "major employers and industries across the west" who were "concerned that they w[ould] be cut off from access to Mexican workers." (Id. at 28-30.) Professor Lytle Hernández explained that while employment lobbies won initially, "the nativists [were] furious in Congress . . . so [sought] to pursue this through other means" which ultimately led to the Act of 1929 which criminalizes unlawful entry and reentry." (Id. at 28-29.) She concludes that it is her

"professional opinion" that "the illegal reentry provision of the 1929 law was intended to target Latinos." (ECF No. 49 at 34.)

Relatedly, the Court may consider "the relevant legislative or administrative history." 429 U.S. at 265-68. Here, Carrillo-Lopez argues that legislative history "easily clears the low threshold of showing that racism and eugenics were a 'motivating factor' . . ." (ECF No. 26 at 15.) While there was little discussion or debate prior to the Senate's passage of the Act of 1929, the bill was introduced after prior attempts failed. Carrillo-Lopez argues these prior failed attempts clearly indicate racial animus. For example, a House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization hearing on "The Eugenical Aspects of Deportation" included testimony from principal witness Dr. Harry H. Laughlin, a well-known eugenicist who suggested that "immigration control is the greatest instrument which the Federal Government can use in promoting race conservation of the Nation" (ECF No. 26-3 at 11, 19), and compared drafters of deportation laws to "successful breeders of thoroughbred horses" (id. at 44). Chairman of the House Immigration and Naturalization Committee, Representative Albert Johnson, then advocated for Congress's use of "the principle of applied eugenics" to reduce crime by "debarring and deporting" people. (Id. at 25.) These remarks and earlier debates were essentially incorporated into the 1929 discussion because after the initial legislation failed, a compromise was brokered with the agricultural industry and the bill was resubmitted and quickly passed from the Senate to the House. (ECF Nos. 26 at 14; 26-9 at 2-3; 26-10 at 2 (passed full Senate with relatively little debate, but when presented, Senator Blease remarks that he was "asked to get the measures over to the house [within two days] if I possibly could"); 26-11 at 2-3 (report submitted from the Committee of Immigration and Naturalization to the full House, reading: "the hearings in the Sixty-ninth Congress on the subject matter contained in the bill were exhaustive. Much important testimony was developed.") During debate on the bill in the House, representatives made similar racist remarks, including testimony from Representative Fitzgerald who argued that Mexicans were "poisoning the American citizen" because they were of a "very undesirable" class. (ECF No. 26-4 at 8.)

c. Departure from Normal Substantive Considerations

The next Arlington Height's factor a court can consider is "the legislature's departure[] from normal procedures or substantive conclusions." 429 U.S. at 265-68. Here, Carrillo-Lopez argues that the "1920s was the first and only era in which Congress openly relied on the now discredited theory of eugenics to enact immigration legislation," with illegal reentry laws as one of "few laws still in effect from that era." (ECF No. 26 at 16.) Further, the discussions departed from typical conclusions underlying immigration law because the "racial vitriol expressed during the debates was directed almost exclusively at Mexicans—even though Canadians were also entering the United States in record numbers." (Id. (citing ECF No. 26-4 at 9.))

Taking these factors into account, the Court is persuaded that Carrillo-Lopez has proffered sufficient evidence under the Arlington Heights framework to demonstrate that racial animus was a strong motivating factor in the passage of the Act of 1929. The evidence clearly indicates, as both parties and other district courts agree, that the Act of 1929 was passed during a time when nativism and eugenics were widely accepted, both in the country at large and by Congress, and that these racist theories ultimately fueled the Act's passage.

3. The 1952 reenactment did not cleanse Section 1326 of its racist origins and was also motivated by discriminatory intent.

The government argues that evidence relating to the Act of 1929 has "no bearing on the passage of the law [Carrillo-Lopez] actually challenges."[18] (ECF No. 29 at 15.) Instead, the government argues that reenactment of an existing law, in the absence of

[18]The original briefs on the Motion focused on the Act of 1929. (ECF Nos. 26, 29, 30.) Following the Hearing, the Court ordered post-hearing briefing specifically addressing the question of whether the racial animus motivating the Act of 1929 tainted the statute's reenactment in 1952 through the INA. (ECF Nos. 50, 51.)

discriminatory intent, cleanses the law of prior discriminatory motivation.[19] (ECF No. 51 at 4-5.) The government there argues that the history of 1929 is therefore irrelevant to the Court's inquiry under Arlington Heights and the Court must limit its attention to the passage of the INA in 1952.

Carrillo-Lopez counters that "the absence of any repudiation of the racial animus that led to the adoption of the statute in 1929 should be construed as the defendant meeting his burden."[20] (ECF No. 50 at 5.) But in the alternative, Carrillo-Lopez argues that he exceeds his burden by further demonstrating that the 1952 Congress not only remained silent, but repeatedly recodified Section 1326 with more punitive measures with knowledge of the law's disparate impact, over a presidential veto addressing the bill's racism, and at a moment in history when Congress was simultaneously passing other legislation disparately impacting Latinx migrants. (ECF No. 50 at 1-2.) The Court will therefore consider whether the racial animus exhibited in the Act of 1929's passage can and did infect Section 1326's enactment in 1952.

While the Court might be persuaded that the 1952 Congress' silence alone is evidence of a failure to repudiate a racially discriminatory taint, the Court need not decide that issue. Instead, the Court finds the evidence that racial animus motivated the Act of 1929 is relevant to the 1952 Arlington Heights inquiry in two ways. First, evidence from the 1929 Congress is relevant as historical background for the passage of the INA in 1952. See Machic-Xiap, 2021 WL 2021 WL 3362738 at *12 (finding the history of the 1929 statute "strong" historical background evidence). The Court incorporates by reference this prior evidence as evidence of the historical background motivating the passage of Section 1326 in 1952. The Court will further explain below how the other

[19]The government relies specifically on the Supreme Court's decision in Abbott v. Perez, 138 S. Ct. 2305, 2324 (2018), and three circuit courts of appeals decisions, *see Hayden v. AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Arlington Heights factors also support the finding that Section 1326's enactment was motivated at least in part by discriminatory intent.

But second, the Court finds the government is incorrect in its reliance on Abbott, because a prior version of a statute known to be motivated by racial animus may be considered as infecting its present iteration if it was not, in fact, substantially altered. See Hunter, 471 U.S. 222, 232-33 (1985) (finding that when a statute's original enactment was clearly motivated by racial animus, later amendments did not "legitimate[]" the provision); see also Abbott, 138 S. Ct. at 2324-25 (distinguishing its holding from Hunter because the statute in Abbott was substantially different from its predecessor and there was no evidence that the reenacting legislature "carried forward the effects of any discriminatory intent"). After the Court addresses the 1952-specific evidence, the Court will explain why the 1952 Congress cannot be presumed to have cured the animus present in 1929.

In light of these reasons, the Court considers that the totality of the evidence demonstrates racial animus motivated the 1952 enactment of Section 1326, regardless of whether silence alone would have been sufficient to demonstrate discriminatory intent.[21]

a. The 1952 enactment of Section 1326 was also motivated by discriminatory intent.

The Court does not rely solely on the evidence from 1929, but also considers contemporaneous evidence from 1952. In evaluating that evidence, the Court looks at the interplay between legislative history and relevant historical evidence. Specifically, the [21]The Court notes that the authority the government relies upon specifies that courts must presume legislatures act in good faith in redistricting cases. See Abbott, 138 S. Ct. at 2324 ("'[I]n assessing the sufficiency of a challenge to a districting plan,' a court 'must be sensitive to the complex interplay of forces that enter a legislature's redistricting calculus . . . [a]nd the 'good faith of [the] state legislature must be presumed.'") (citing Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900, 915-16 (1995)). Both Miller and Abbott emphasize the complexity of redistricting in the need for presumption of legislative good faith. The Court is not convinced that reasoning is analogous to this comparatively less complex statutory scheme, especially when animus has been demonstrated and the reenacted statute is nearly identical to its improper predecessor.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Court considers: a relative lack of discussion compared to robust Congressional debate regarding other provisions of the INA; explicit, recorded use of the derogatory term "wetback" by supporters of Section 1326; Congressional silence while increasingly making the provision more punitive; Congress' failure to revise in the face of President Truman's veto statement calling for a reimagination of immigration policy; knowledge of the disparate impact of Section 1326 on Mexican and Latinx people; and passage of the so-called "Wetback Bill" by the same Congress only months prior. The Court recognizes that this evidence is circumstantial, and that each instance may not be as probative when considered alone. But in its totality, the cited evidence is sufficient to demonstrate that racial animus was at least one motivating factor behind the enactment of Section 1326.[22] The evidence specific to the 1952 enactment will be discussed in turn.

i. Silence Compared to Robust Debate on Other Provisions

As stated above, the Court does not now determine if silence alone is enough for Carrillo-Lopez to meet his burden. But the Court does consider whether a lack of debate regarding recodification of Section 1326 in 1952, when other provisions of the INA were debated and discussed, supports Carrillo-Lopez's argument that discriminatory intent was a motivating factor in its reenactment in 1952. The Court finds that it does.

Defense expert Professor Gonzalez O'Brien testified that the contrast between extensive congressional debate about other national origin provisions and the comparative lack thereof around Section 1326 suggests an acceptance of its history. (ECF No. 49 at 181.) Other instances of discriminatory immigration policy, Professor Gonzalez O'Brien notes, prompted the Congress to debate about what was deemed a problematic aspect of the original enactment—including during the 1952 enactment of the [22]The Court notes that a recent district court decision from this circuit disagrees. See Machic-Xiap, 2021 WL 3362738 at *11-14. After considering the same evidence that is now before the Court—Truman's veto statement, the letter from DAG Ford, testimony from Professors Gonzalez O'Brien and Lytle Hernández—the court in that case found that the legislative history of Section 1326 is "inconclusive." Id. at *13. But this Court cannot agree that the evidence, when viewed in its totality, is insufficient to demonstrate that racial animus was at least one motivating factor for the passage of Section 1326. The Court explains its reasoning more fully below.

INA.[23] (Id. at 180.) Professor Gonzalez O'Brien concludes "that's one of the reasons that I'm willing to say that this is a demonstration of racial—of continued racial animus, is that you're acknowledging in the debate over the McCarran-Walter Act, members of Congress are acknowledging that there are problematic racial aspects to the 1924 Johnson-Reed Act, which comes five years before the Undesirable Aliens Act, and yet they choose to not only recodify the 1326, but to recodify it[] without any examination." (ECF No. 49 at 180-81.)

Professor Gonzalez O'Brien's testimony depicts a Congress that was more concerned with which racial and ethnic groups warranted continued discriminatory exclusion, rather than any desire to confront or revise the nativism reflected in the Act of 1929. As a matter of logic, the 1952 Congress could have either examined that history or ignored it. If the 1952 Congress ignored the express nativist intent behind the Act of 1929, there is no reason to assume that the later enactment arose from some wholly unrelated motivation cleansed from discriminatory intent. If it did not ignore the Act of 1929's history, there was opportunity to either adopt its racial animus or refute its improper motivation and clarify a purpose for the statute that did not violate the Equal Protection Clause. Here, the 1952 Congress remained silent, even when other provisions of the law were being debated. When considered in comparison with the express debate over other racially problematic predecessor statutes, Congress' silence here weighs in favor of establishing Carrillo-Lopez meets his burden.

[23]In particular, Professor Gonzalez O'Brien notes the continued debate over the use (and allocation) of quotas in the immigration scheme: "we see that debate with the McCarran-Walter Act, I mean the debate over national origins, and the kind of racial aspects of the, of the limits placed on quotas for southern and eastern Europeans. . . you see the continuation of that with the McCarran-Walter Act, and the insertion of tables during committee testimony, the insertion of tables showing that the largest quotas will still go to northern and western Europeans." (ECF No. 49 at 180.) He goes on to note that "in 1965 with debate over the Hart-Celler Act, and the elimination of national quotas and the acknowledgement that the national quota system had been one that was very clearly and explicitly meant to privilege certain groups based on perceptions of superiority and inferiority, particularly—you know, especially with 1924." (Id.)

ii. President Truman's Veto

The Court also considers that Congress declined to comment on the racist forebears of Section 1326, even in the face of President Truman's veto of the INA. On June 25, 1952, President Truman vetoed INA, and included a veto statement. (ECF No. 44-1.) President Truman condemned the INA as "legislation which would perpetuate injustices of long standing against many other nations of the world" and "intensify the repressive and inhumane aspects of our immigration procedures." (Id. at 3.) Finding that the positive aspects of the INA were "heavily outweighed" by other provisions, President Truman expressed dismay that so much of the INA "would continue, practically without change" discriminatory practices first enacted in 1924 and 1929. (Id. at 4.)

On June 27, Congress overrode President Truman's veto and passed the INA. (Id.) Carrillo-Lopez argues that Congress' decision to pass the INA over a presidential veto that "explicitly called out the law for its racism" is evidence of racial animus. (ECF No. 50 at 5-6.) While President Truman did not explicitly address racism as to Mexican or Latinx individuals, he commented on the negative implications of expanding the grounds for deportation,[24] and implored Congress to reconsider the INA's passage: "Should we not undertake a reassessment of our immigration policies and practices in the light of the conditions that face us in the second half of the twentieth century? . . . I hope the Congress will agree to a careful reexamination of this entire matter." (ECF No. 44-1 at 10.) President Truman clearly wanted Congress to review the INA and reconsider its objectives, admonishing it was "the time to shake off this dead weight of past mistakes . . . time to develop a decent policy of immigration—a fitting instrument for our foreign policy and a true reflection of the ideals we stand for, at home and abroad . . .” (Id. at 6.) Professor Gonzalez O’Brien confirms that despite the fact that the INA is “sometimes characterized as racially progressive,” President Truman’s veto “explicitly notes” the INA was unnecessarily punitive, and inequitably so. (ECF No. 49 at 116-117).

[24]President Truman specifically criticized the "unnecessarily severe" and inflexible penalties for deportation. (Id. at 8.) He continued, "[t]he bill would sharply restrict the present opportunity of citizens and alien residents to save family members from deportation. Under the procedures of present law, the Attorney General can exercise his discretion to suspend deportation in meritorious cases. In each such case, at the present time, the exercise of administrative discretion is subject to the scrutiny and approval of the Congress. Nevertheless, the bill would prevent this discretion from being used in many cases where it is now available and would narrow the circle of those who can obtain relief from the letter of the law. This is most unfortunate, because the bill, in its other provisions, would impose harsher restrictions and greatly increase the number of cases deserving equitable relief." (Id. at 9.)

As another court noted, the veto statement largely objected to the national origin quota system, not Section 1326. See Machic-Xiap, 2021 WL 3362738, at *13. But although President Truman did not address Section 1326 specifically, the veto statement represents in no uncertain terms a contemporary admonishment of an overly punitive and discriminatory immigration policy. Truman expressly drew the INA into dialogue with prior immigration legislation, from both 1924 and 1929, which were concededly racist. But the 1952 Congress rejected that call and overrode the veto. The Court finds that Congress’ failure to heed President Truman’s call to “reimagine” immigration while simultaneously making the INA, and particularly Section 1326, more punitive in nature, is evidence of at least indifference to the nativist motivations of the statute’s predecessor. The Court accordingly finds that Congress’ decision to proceed with the INA that President Truman denounced as discriminatory contributes to its finding that Carrillo-Lopez has met his burden.

iii. Deputy Attorney General Peyton Ford Letter

The Court considers additional legislative history—a letter of support from Deputy Attorney General Peyton Ford, which includes use of the racially derogatory word “wetback” as well as testimony in support of expanding the grounds for prosecution and conviction of unlawful reentry under Section 1326. On May 14, 1951, Attorney General Ford wrote to Pat McCarran, Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, in “response to [McCarran’s] request for the views of the Department of Justice relative to the bill (S. 716) to revise the laws relating to immigration, naturalization, and nationality; and for other purposes . . .” (ECF No. 44-2.) Congress’ decision to adopt this recommendation, the only substantive change made to Section 1326 in 1952, in light of its silence regarding all other aspects of the provision, is further evidence of racial animus.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

First, Attorney General Ford's letter expressly includes the racial slur "wetback." The letter specifically quotes from the report of the President's Commission on Migratory Labor, Migratory Labor in American Agriculture, March 26, 1951, which says: "Statutory clarification on the above points will aid in taking action against the conveyors and receivers of the wetback. These clarifications of the statute, together with increased funds and personnel for enforcement, are possibly all that are needed to deal effectively with the smuggler and the intermediary." (ECF No. 44-2 at 9 (emphasis added).) Common sense dictates, and many courts have acknowledged, that the term "wetback" is racist.[25] See, e.g., Machic-Xiap, 2021 WL 3362738, at *13 ("Again, 'wetback' is a racial epithet."). Its use in testimony from a supporter of the bill is significant here. First, it evidences the racial environment and rhetoric in 1952, even among high-ranking government officials and committees, specifically with regard to Mexican and Latinx people. But it is also significant considering that Ford's recommendation was the only recommendation adopted by Congress as to Section 1326. Not only does Ford's letter employ racially derogatory language, but it advises Congress to expand the grounds for deportation. Specifically, the letter recommended amendments to the bill including clarifying the "found in" clause in Section 276 by:

> add[ing] to existing law by creating a crime which will be committed if a previously deported alien is subsequently found in the United States. This change would overcome the inadequacies in existing law which have been observed in those cases in which it is not possible for the Immigration and Naturalization Service to establish the place of reentry, and hence the proper venue, arising in prosecutions against a deported alien under the 1929 act.

[25]Professor Gonzalez O'Brien goes on to explain that "the term with 'wetback' comes from the idea that individuals who are entering without inspection have to do so at an area where there is no bridge over the Rio Grande River and, therefore, they get wet and, therefore, the term wetback. But across the period of the 1940s and 1950s, this term has—is associated, and almost synonymous with Mexicans. And in addition to being synonymous with Mexicans and racialized in much the same way, it also has the attribution of a lot of the negative stereotypes that were associated with Mexican immigrants in the push, or [sic] quotas to be applied to immigration from Mexico and south of the Rio Grande, as well as during debate over the Undesirable Aliens Act." (ECF No. 49 at 89-90.)

At the Hearing, Professor Gonzalez O'Brien explained that this amendment was incorporated "explicitly to make it easier to enforce the 1929 law, by allowing prosecution of immigrants wherever they were found, even if you couldn't establish where they crossed." (ECF No. 49 at 184-85). This legislative history confirms, as Carrillo-Lopez argues, that the only substantive change made to Section 1326 in 1952 was this amendment which expanded the government's authority to enforce the original 1929 provision, thereby making Section 1326 more punitive in nature. Attorney General Ford's recommendation, conveyed to Congress along with racial slurs, was adopted by the 1952 Congress and became a part of Section 1326.

Again, while Attorney General Ford's recommendation alone may not be enough to prove discriminatory intent, the Court considers this evidence in context. The only significant alteration between the unlawful reentry provision in the Act of 1929 and Section 1326 was this one, recommended by Ford.[26] The 1952 Congress' silence does not evince a neutral viewpoint, but worked to expand the enforceability of an admittedly racist law. The Court therefore finds that this evidence contributes to its finding that Carrillo-Lopez meets his burden.

iv. Wetback Bill

The Court further considers the passage of the so-called "Wetback Bill" as evidence of historical background. The bill's passage is particularly probative because it was "passed by the same congress during the same time frame and with the same express aim as illegal reentry . . ." (ECF No. 50 at 10.) Senate Bill 1851, nicknamed the "Wetback Bill," was passed March 20, 1952, just a few months before the INA. See United Statutes at Large, 82 Cong. ch. 108, 66 Stat. 26 (March 20, 1952). The bill's stated aim was to "assist in preventing aliens from entering or remaining in the United States illegally." Id. Yet, as Carrillo-Lopez argues, the bill was reflective of Congress' racially

[26] See notes 9 & 10.

First, the Wetback Bill evidences discriminatory motive simply in its use of the racial epithet "wetback." As Professor Gonzalez O'Brien testified: "In 1952, prior to the passage of the McCarran-Walter Act, you have a Bill that is introduced and passed on March 20th that is nicknamed the Wetback Bill. And this is a piece of anti-harboring legislature where, throughout the debate, Mexican undocumented entrants are regularly referenced as wetbacks. And Senator McFarland [of Arizona], during the debate over the Act of March 20th, 1952, notes that Senate Bill 1851, a Bill known as the Wetback Bill, was going to be debated. Initially, this legislation was aimed strictly at Mexicans." (ECF No. 49 at 97-98.)[27]

Aside from the use of derogatory language, the incongruities between the stated intent of the bill and the actual language of the bill demonstrate the Congress' racist motives and intent. While the stated aim of the bill was to prevent "aliens from entering or remaining in the United States illegally", as Carrillo-Lopez argues, it actually "illustrates the intent of congress to preserve the influx of cheap and exploitable labor, while simultaneously marginalizing those workers and excluding them from full participation in American life." (ECF No. 50 at 10.) By failing to punish employers who hired illegal immigrants and instead only punishing the laborers themselves, the "1952 and 1929 congresses were both balancing the hunger of the agricultural industry for exploitable labor and the desire to keep America's identity white." (Id.)

The Court agrees that the "context in which [] Mexican immigration was being discussed at that historical moment" is illustrative of the 1952 Congress' intent. (ECF No. 49 at 129-30.) Despite the lack of official debate surrounding the enactment of Section 1326, Professor Gonzalez O'Brien connects the Ford letter with the Wetback Bill to give a more nuanced understanding of the 1952 Congress' approach:

> what you do have is that you do have this note that's entered in the support for 1326 by the Department of Justice, and it's a letter from the Deputy Attorney General, Peyton Ford . . .So, again, you have the use of this

[27]Relatedly, Professor Gonzalez O'Brien notes that this "debate around wetbacks is—also enters into the McCarran-Walter Act." (ECF No. 49 at 99-100.)

> racialized term to describe Mexican immigrants, even though you don't have debate around Mexican immigration in the McCarran-Walter Act itself, or during debate for the McCarran-Walter Act, in part, because you have this Bill that precedes it by two months, where much of the debate is how do we limit the number of Mexican immigrants and the trafficking of undocumented Mexican immigrants into the United States? And that Bill also contained the Texas proviso, which gave workers the kind of loophole of, you know, if you're employing undocumented laborers, it doesn't constitute harboring.

(ECF No. 49 at 129-30.) Professor Gonzalez O'Brien notably concludes that "understanding the recodification under McCarran-Walter, it has to be done in the context both of what came before it, but also what was occurring at that historical moment, and at that moment in time." (Id.)[28]

This context assists the Court in its "sensitive" inquiry demanded by Arlington Heights. See 429 U.S. at 564. In short, both the derogatory nickname of the Wetback Bill and its criminalization of Mexican immigrant laborers while shielding employers evidences the racially discriminatory motives and intent of the same Congress who enacted Section 1326 only two months later.

v. Congressional Awareness of Disparate Impact

Finally, the Court considers Congress' silence in light of their knowledge that Section 1326 disparately impacts Latinx people as further evidence of continued racial animus. Professor Lytle Hernández outlined the disparate impact of the criminal unlawful reentry statute over the 23 years between the law's enactment 1929 and reenactment in 1952. (ECF No. 26-1.) She specifically highlighted that "some years, Mexicans comprised 99 percent of immigration offenders" and by the 1930s "tens of thousands of Mexicans had been arrested, charged, prosecuted, and imprisoned for unlawfully entering the United States." (Id.)

[28]"Q: And part of the legislative background also is the Wetback Bill that occurred two months earlier. Is that fair? A: That is fair. Q: And the Wetback Bill explicitly carved out from the harboring of aliens [sic] employers? A: That is correct. Q: And that tension between employers and the utilization of south of the border migrants was the same sort of tension that we see animating that debate in 1929. Is that fair? A: That's fair." (ECF No. 49 at 184-86 (excerpts of Professor O'Brien's testimony under defense counsel's examination.)

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Congress' knowledge that Section 1326 continued to disparately impact Mexican and Latinx people is evidenced by criticism from President Truman in his veto statement when he specifically critiqued the INA for expanding grounds for deportation[29] and from testimony provided by enforcers of the law—the Immigration and Naturalization Service. The Immigration and Naturalization Service testified regarding the "difficulties encountered in getting prosecutions and convictions, especially in the Mexican border area" because many violators of immigration law "are not prosecuted or, if prosecuted, get off with suspended sentences or probation." (ECF No. 45 at 2.) Congress' silence about the prior racist iterations of this bill coupled with its decision to expand the grounds for deportation and carceral punishment, despite its knowledge of the disparate impact of this provision on Mexican and Latinx people, is some evidence that racial animus was a motivating factor.

When these factors are considered together, the Court finds there is sufficient evidence to conclude that racial animus continued to be a motivating factor in the recodification of 1952. As Professor Gonzalez O'Brien testified:

> if you look at all of those things, including the racial animus that was demonstrated in the McCarran-Walter Act itself . . . then I think all of those things suggest that the decision to pass this without debate, was largely driven by the same things that drove the original codification of 1326; and that was, in part, a desire to control access to Mexican labor, and also a tendency to view Mexicans, individuals from south of the Rio Grande, and at least in the terms of the 1950s, the wetback, as a problematic population. And you don't see any significant debate over – you have a stretch between 1959 and 1952, where you have 1326 in effect, and you don't see any debate over that policy on its merits. We've been doing this for over 20 years by that point. What are the merits of 1326? . . . You don't have debate over that in 1952.

The totality of evidence shows that the same factors motivating the passage of Section 1326 in 1929 were present in 1952. Not only did Congress fail to repudiate the racial animus clearly present in 1929, but it expanded the government's power to enforce unlawful reentry, despite President Truman's call to reimagine immigration laws. The

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

1952 Congress incorporated the advice of supporters of the bill who used racial epithets in official documents, while contemporaneously passing another bill targeting "wetbacks." Although it is "not easy" to prove that racism motivated the passage of a particular statute, the Court reasons that it cannot be impossible, or Arlington Heights would stand for nothing.[30]

The Court therefore finds that Carrillo-Lopez has met his burden.

b. The authority cited by the government does not preclude consideration of the Act of 1929.

Essential to the government's position is its proposition that improper motivations infecting prior versions of legislation do not carry over to reenacted versions of a law. The government argues that the Supreme Court "ha[s] viewed variants of the 'taint argument' with equal skepticism," and several circuit and district courts have found that "the ultimate focus in subsequent litigation is the intent of the reenacting legislature, not the original one." (ECF No. 29 at 24.) As explained below, the Court finds these cases do not support the government's argument that a re-enacting Congress is always shielded from the legislation's prior motivations, and instead instruct the reviewing court to consider how much the reenacting Congress actually altered the legislation.

The government relies on Abbott v. Perez to argue that "the presumption of legislative good faith [is] not changed by a finding of past discrimination" nor can past discrimination "condemn governmental action that is not itself unlawful." (ECF No. 51 at 3-4.) In Abbott, electoral redistricting plans developed in 2011 were challenged as discriminatory. Responding to that concern, Texas adopted interim plans overseen by a federal district court that were later adopted by the 2013 Legislature. See Abbott, 138 S. Ct. at 2315. When reviewing the 2013 plans, the district court found discriminatory intent

[30] Machic-Xiap, 2021 WL 3362738 at *1. The Machic-Xiap court noted it was "unaware of any federal appellate decision holding that a facially neutral act passed by Congress was motivated by racial, ethnic, or religious animus." Id. When faced with the record before it and lacking clear guiding or distinguishing authority from federal appellate courts, this Court cannot ignore the extensive history—both from 1929 and contemporaneously in 1952—that suggests discrimination was in part motivating Congress' enactment of Section 1326.

because the 2013 Legislature "failed to 'engage[] in a deliberative process to ensure that the 2013 plans cured any taint from the 2011 plans." Id. at 2318. The Supreme Court disagreed and ultimately upheld the 2013 districting plan because the "2013 Texas Legislature did not reenact the plan previously passed by its 2011 predecessor. Nor did it use criteria that arguably carried forward the effects of any discriminatory intent on the part of the 2011 Legislature." Id. at 2325. The Supreme Court reasoned that although a court had previously found that the 2011 Legislature "acted with discriminatory intent in framing the congressional plan, that finding was based on evidence about districts that the interim plan later changed." Id. Therefore "there can be no doubt about what matters: it is the intent of the 2013 Legislature." Id.

The facts here are distinguishable. Most importantly, here, the initial and recodified unlawful reentry statutes are nearly identical, with the exception of broader enforcement measures. In Abbott, the 2013 Legislature was not simply reenacting an earlier version of the districting plan, but an entirely new plan was implemented following a lower court's finding of discriminatory intent. In so doing, the new plan was explicitly created to "fix[] the problems identified," id. at 2329, or "cure[]" any prior discriminatory intent, id. at 2325. The holding in Abbott is based on the legislature's active response and engagement with the prior challenged statute. The Supreme Court in fact clarified:

> We do not suggest either that the intent of the 2011 Legislature is irrelevant or that the plans enacted in 2013 are unassailable because they were previously adopted on an interim basis by the Texas court. Rather, both the intent of the 2011 Legislature and the court's adoption of the interim plans are relevant to the extent that they naturally give rise to—or tend to refute—inferences regarding the intent of the 2013 Legislature. They must be weighed together with any other direct and circumstantial evidence of that Legislature's intent. But when all the relevant evidence in the record is taken into account, it is plainly insufficient to prove that the 2013 Legislature acted in bad faith and engaged in intentional discrimination.

Id. at 2327 (emphasis added). The Court found the new legislature lacked discriminatory intent precisely because of the way that it responded to the challenged provision. Moreover, the Court expressly stated that how the reenacting legislature responds to a prior discriminatory statute is probative of the reenacting legislature's intent. Unlike in

Abbott, the 1952 Congress adopted Section 1326 almost wholesale from the Act of 1929, revising it only to make it more punitive.[31]

The government's reliance on three circuit courts of appeals decisions is similarly unpersuasive. (ECF No. 51 at 4-5 (citing Hayden v. Paterson, 594 F.3d 150, 164-68 (2d Cir. 2010); Cotton v. Fordice, 157 F.3d 388, 391-92 (5th Cir. 1998); Johnson v. Governor of State of Fla., 405 F.3d 1214, 1223-26 (11th Cir. 2005).) Contrary to the government's argument that re-enactment of an existing law "cleanses" it from "any discriminatory aspects of its history" (id. at 5), the Second Circuit in Hayden expressly warned against the possibility that a legislative body "might seek to insulate from challenge a law known to have been originally enacted with a discriminatory purpose by (quietly) reenacting it without significant change." Hayden, 594 F.3d at 167 (reasoning that subsequent changes to legislation tainted by racial animus should "substantively change" the prior issue in a way that is "not inconsequential"). Clearly aware of this issue, the Fifth Circuit in Cotton and the Eleventh Circuit in Johnson also stress that the challenged amendments made substantive revisions to their racist predecessors which meaningfully impacted how they would be enforced.[32] The Second Circuit reasoned that its concerns were "ameliorated" because (i) there was no allegation of bad faith on the part of the re-enacting legislature, (ii) there was adequate deliberation that resulted in substantive changes when

[31]The government further relies on the Supreme Court's decision in McKlesky v. Kemp to argue that "unless historical evidence is reasonably contemporaneous with the challenged decision, it has little probative value." 481 U.S. 279, 289 n.20 (1987). There, the Court looked at Georgia laws in force during and just after the Civil War, finding that "historical background of the decision is one evidentiary source" for proof of discrimination under Arlington Heights, but it has little probative value if it is not "reasonably contemporaneous" ultimately deciding that "although the history of racial discrimination in this country is undeniable, we cannot accept official actions taken long ago as evidence of current intent." Id. Here, the evidence offered and accepted by this Court regarding the 1952 reenactment was contemporaneous in time. Thus, McKlesky has no bearing on the Court's decision here.

[32]See Cotton, 157 F.3d at 391-92 (explaining that the amendment in question removed burglary, an offense commonly relied on to disenfranchise Black people, and broadened the applicability of the statute to include murder and rape to better fit the state's race-neutral disenfranchisement purposes); Johnson, 405 F.3d at 1223-24 (similarly reasoning that the specific amendment at issue went through multiple revisions and committee reviews with the purpose of removing the racial taint from a prior felon-disenfranchisement statute).

the statute in question was reenacted, and (iii) there was no evidence of discriminatory intent of the reenacting legislature. See Hayden, 594 F.3d at 167.

Carrillo-Lopez's case is completely distinguishable. The legislatures in Hayden, Cotton, and Johnson substantively amended the prior iterations of the laws in question in an attempt to make them less racially targeted. But Section 1326 was not substantively changed, or even genuinely debated. Instead, the 1952 Congress sought only to ease law enforcement's burden in prosecuting those subject to Section 1326. While the Hayden, Cotton, and Johnson legislatures were expressly revising felon-disenfranchisement laws to make them more race-neutral, the 1952 Congress did not depart from the original enactment of Section 1326 and instead adopted it in its entirety into the INA. Moreover, that addition happened at a time that Congress did not appear to be overly concerned with its animus toward Mexican and Latinx people, but instead welcomed racist epithets. Carrillo-Lopez has demonstrated that the 1952 reenactment not only failed to reconcile with the racial animus of the Act of 1929, but was further embroiled by contemporary racial animus and discriminatory intent. The Court therefore concludes that Abbott, Hayden, Cotton, and Johnson do not prohibit considering the motivations of the Act of 1929 when determining whether the 1952 Congress was motivated by a similar discriminatory intent.

4. The Court disagrees with the conclusions of other district courts that have addressed this issue.

The Court notes that Section 1326 has lately faced scrutiny in several district courts. The parties have routinely supplemented their briefing in response to these developments,[33] and the Court has worked to stay abreast of recent decisions.[34] As the Court understands the present status, no court that has addressed this issue has found that Section 1326 is unconstitutional under Arlington Heights. The Court will therefore explain its reasons for departing from the holdings of its sister courts.

The two cases cited by the government, Medina-Zepeda and Palacios-Arias, are distinguishable because they considered solely evidence from the 1952 reenactment. (ECF Nos. 43-1, 29-1.) Unlike in those cases, the Court here considers the surrounding legislative history and context of both the Act of 1929 and 1952 INA. The Central District of California reasoned in Medina-Zepeda that dicta in Ramos v. Louisiana, 140 S. Ct. 1390 2020), and Espinoza v. Mont. Dep't of Revenue, 140 S. Ct. 2246 (2020), was insufficient authority to justify relying solely on legislative history from the 1920s. (ECF No. 43-1 at 6 ("Defendant provides no authority or basis for the court to evaluate the 1952 statute solely on the basis of the legislative history relating to the Undesirable Aliens Act of 1929.").) The Court agrees with that reasoning. However, the Court here does not only consider historical background from the 1920s. Medina-Zepeda therefore cannot guide the Court's determination of whether Carrillo-Lopez has met his burden under Arlington Heights.

[33]The parties supplemented their briefing with the following cases: United States v. Palacios-Arias, Case No. 3:20-cr-62-JAG (E.D. Va. Oct. 13, 2020) (ECF No. 29-1); United States v. Rios-Montano, Case No. 19-cr-2123 (S.D. Cal. Dec. 8, 2020) (ECF No. 31-1); United States v. Medina-Zepeda, Case No. CR 20-0057 (C.D. Cal. Jan. 5, 2021) (ECF No. 43-1). The government additionally cites to United States v. Morales-Roblero, 2020 WL 5517594 (S.D. Cal. Sept. 14, 2020) (ECF No. 29 at 6 n.6) and United States v. Ruiz-Rivera, Case No. 20-mj-20306-AHG (S.D. Cal. Sept. 2, 2020) (ECF No. 29 at 22 n.13) in its opposition brief. Palacios-Arias and Medina-Zepeda address the constitutionality of Section 1326, and will be discussed below. Rios-Montano, Morales-Roblero, and Ruiz-Rivera address the constitutionality of Section 1325, which is also part of the INA but has a separate legislative history. Accordingly, the Court will focus on cases that challenge Section 1326 specifically.

[34]In addition to the parties' briefing, the Court notes that several courts have lately ruled on this issue. See United States v. Machic-Xiap, Case No. 3:19-cr-407-SI, 2021 WL 3362738 (D. Or. Aug. 3, 2021); United States v. Wence, Case No. 3:20-cr-0027, 2021 WL 2463567 (D.V.I. Jun. 16, 2021); United States v. Gutierrez-Barba, Case No. CR-19-01224-001-PHX-DJH, 2021 WL 2138801 (D. Ariz. May 25, 2021). The Court will address the arguments in Machic-Xiap and Wence below. However, the Court will not address Gutierrez-Barba, which applied a deferential rational-basis review instead of Arlington Heights, and is therefore unhelpful to the Court's analysis. See 2021 WL 2138801 at *5.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The Court similarly finds Palacios-Arias distinguishable. (ECF No. 29-1.) The Eastern District of Virginia reasoned that evidence of animus from the 70th Congress cannot necessarily be imputed to the 82nd Congress. Again, the Court agrees. But Carrillo-Lopez has provided evidence of contemporaneous discriminatory intent motivating the passage of the 1952 INA. Moreover, the Court will not ignore that Congress in 1952 adopted the language of Section 1326 without substantially changing the law and without debate or discussion of the invidious racism that motivated the Act of 1929, only to make it more punitive.

Two district courts, however, have recently found that substantially similar evidence to that which the Court here considers is insufficient for a defendant to meet their burden. Ultimately, the Court disagrees.

In United States v. Wence, the District Court of the Virgin Islands applied Arlington Heights but found the defendant had not met his burden because "Wence has failed to provide any legislative history or other evidence suggestive of the motives of the 82nd Congress." See 2021 WL 2463567, at *7. After considering the "problematic rhetoric" surrounding the INA's passage, as well as the Truman veto statement and override, that court concluded "Wence has not cited any part of the legislative history which discloses any racial animus in the law against Latinx aliens" and "the legislative history for the 1952 and 1929 legislation does not reveal any discriminatory motive." Id. at *9. First, the Court disagrees with that conclusion—as explained above, the record demonstrates discriminatory motivations as to both statutes. But the Court further rejects the Wence court's conclusion because that court appeared to blur the defendant's burden under Arlington Heights, reasoning that alternative "valid immigration considerations," id., balanced out the evident "issues" with the INA, id. at *8. But see Arlington Heights, 429 U.S. at 265 (explaining that a challenger need not "prove that the challenged action rested solely on a racially discriminatory purpose"). Moreover, the Wence court relies on Hayden, Cotton, and Johnson to support that deliberation of other sections of the INA is sufficient to cleanse the reenacted Section 1326 of its original discriminatory motivation, despite the fact that Section 1326 was neither specifically debated nor substantively changed. The Court is therefore unpersuaded by Wence.

In Machic-Xiap, the District Court for the District of Oregon considered a similar challenge to Section 1326 based on similar evidence as presented here. See Machic-Xiap, 2021 WL 3362738, at *12. The Machic-Xiap court detailed an extensive historical record, and found not only that the Act of 1929 served "racist purposes," id. at *12, but also that the defendant did provide some evidence of racial animus during the 1952 reenactment, id. at *12-14. But after concluding that the historical evidence of the Act of 1929 was "strong," id. at *12, the Machic-Xiap court carefully examined the remaining evidence and found that despite evidence of racist motivation, each piece of evidence should not be given significant or conclusive weight. See id. It is apparent that the Machic-Xiap court conducted a thorough and sensitive inquiry, and this Court agrees that any individual piece of evidence alone would likely be insufficient to demonstrate that racial animus was a motivating factor. But, as stated above, the Court views the evidence—of historical background, legislative history, sequence of events, and departure from normal deliberative process—under the totality of the circumstances. While each piece of evidence may be insufficient alone, together they show discriminatory intent on behalf of the 1952 Congress specifically, and with regards to Section 1326 specifically.

The Machic-Xiap court further limited its reliance on evidence from 1929 based on its application of Abbott. See id. at *14. While the Court agrees that racial animus from a prior enacting legislature cannot be necessarily imputed to a reenacting legislature, the Court reads Abbott to require that the reenacting legislature make some substantive change before known racial animus is cleansed. See Abbott, 138 S. Ct. at 2325. Although courts have an obligation to give a reenacting legislature the presumption of good faith,[35] that presumption is not insurmountable. Here, the 1929 provision and Section 1326 are nearly identical, the only change was not substantive, and that change was motivated by [35] See Machic-Xiap, 2021 WL 3362738 at *15 (citing Abbott and N.C. St. Conf. of the NAACP v. Raymond, 981 F.3d 295, 303 (4th Cir. 2020)).

the Ford Letter which sought to expand the enforceability of the 1929 provision while referring to Latinx people as "wetbacks." As explained above, Abbott does not shield the reenacting legislature from scrutiny in light of such evidence. The Court therefore disagrees with the conclusion of the Machic-Xiap court and finds that the evidence Carrillo-Lopez presents is sufficient to meet his burden under Arlington Heights.

The Court is aware that proving discriminatory intent motivated the passage of a specific statute is difficult—in fact, unprecedented.[36] But despite the high threshold, the Court cannot deny that when considered as a whole, the evidence indicates discriminatory intent on the part of the 1952 Congress.

C. The government has failed to show that Section 1326 would have been enacted absent the discriminatory motivation.

Having found that Carrillo-Lopez met his burden under Arlington Heights, the burden shifts to the government to establish that "the same decision would have resulted even had the impermissible purpose not been considered." 429 U.S. at 270 n. 21. The government argues that it is "obvious and uncontroverted that valid, nondiscriminatory objectives motivated the passage of Section 1326 in 1952 and its later amendments." (ECF No. 51 at 11.) The government offers no independent evidence, but points instead to Carrillo-Lopez's own expert testimony to propose three allegedly permissible motivations: (1) a desire to protect American citizens from economic competition; (2) a need to maintain national security; and (3) a need to maintain foreign relations with international allies. (ECF No. 52 at 11.) As the Court explains below, the testimony does not support a conclusion that these alternative motivations can easily be separated from the demonstrated discriminatory intent.

The government advances two additional arguments that do not offer alternative motivations for the passage of Section 1326, but which it claims are sufficient to show that Section 1326 would have been enacted absent discriminatory intent. The government first argues the Ninth Circuit once found Section 1326 is "a necessary piece of the immigration-regulation framework." (ECF No. 51 at 12 (citing U.S. v. Hernandez-Guerrero, 147 F.3d 1075, 1078 (9th Cir. 1998).) Second, the government argues that because Section 1326 has been passed "six times in various amended versions, all in the absence of any evidence of discriminatory intent, the Court need not engage in a counterfactual analysis to conclude that the law would pass absent discriminatory intent." (ECF No. 51 at 13.) The Court will also address these arguments after its evaluation of the proposed nondiscriminatory motivations.

[36] See Machic-Xiap, 2021 WL 3362738 at *1.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

1. Alternative Nondiscriminatory Motivations

The government has not met its burden under Arlington Heights. By failing to offer any independent evidence of "obvious and uncontroverted . . . nondiscriminatory objectives" motivating the passage of Section 1326, the government limits itself to relying solely on the testimony of defense experts and distinguishable case law. (ECF No. 51 at 11.) But the expert testimony from Professors Lytle Hernández and Gonzalez O'Brien does not support the government's proffered alternative reasons. Instead, that testimony convincingly demonstrates that the government's proffered reasons are so intertwined with racial animus such that they cannot successfully show that the "same decision would have resulted even had the impermissible purpose not been considered." See Arlington Heights, 429 U.S. at 270 n. 21. The Court will address each argument in turn.

a. Economic Competition

The government first argues that border enforcement was driven "by a desire to protect American citizens from economic competition," citing only to Professor Lytle Hernández's testimony to support this proposition. (ECF No. 51 at 11.) At the Hearing, Professor Lytle Hernández agrees with the government's claim that leaders of the Mexican-American middle class supported immigration enforcement because "they thought that increased border enforcement would improve job security" (ECF No. 49 at 42-43), but she goes on to explain that this economic competition was rooted in racialization and played up to "create the notion that they were in competition with each other." (ECF No. 49 at 42-43). Specifically, she notes:

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

> There was a notion that there was a, sort of, zero sum game of jobs, right, and that people of Mexican descent, largely because of segregation in the United States and because of that racial subrogation, gave this notion that Mexican-origin folks had to fight for the same jobs as to opposed to having all jobs open to them, and that certainly helped to create this notion that they were in competition with each other.

(Id.)

Moreover, some economic programs like the Bracero program targeted non-white populations. Professor Lytle Hernández explains that targeting is a "key indicator[] of the dynamics at play, that it's not just labor, it's a racialized labor form." (ECF No. 49 at 75-76.) Bracero workers were "an exploited labor force," subjected to racialized stereotyping and inhumane treatment. She details in her testimony that Bracero workers were routinely gassed with DDT and subjected to invasive inspections. The workers were racially stereotyped as being "fit for agricultural labor," unlike their white immigrant or domestic counterparts. (Id. at 77-78.) Professor Lytle Hernández's testimony concludes that any stated desire to protect American citizens from economic competition cannot reasonably be divorced from the underlying racialization of Mexican migrant laborers.

The Court agrees that even—or in this case, especially—under the auspice of economic motivation, immigration is not intrinsically separate from racial animus. Without offering any additional evidence, the government fails show that economic competition was a potential motivating factor absent the impermissible motivation: racial animus.

b. National Security

The Court is similarly unpersuaded by the government's argument that Section 1326 was recodified due to "a need to maintain national security." (ECF No. 51 at 11.) Again, the government cites only to Professor Lytle Hernández's testimony[37] to suggest [37]Professor Lytle Hernández further explains how the national security concerns of the period relevant to the INA's passage were motivated by racialized labor policies like the Bracero Program. "Q: So the start of the Bracero program happened roughly around the onset of World War II, correct? A: Yes. Post-U.S. entry into the war. Q: Right. And you wrote in Migra that this triggered increased national security and geopolitical concerns, given that the U.S. shared a 2000-mile border with Mexico, correct? A: Correct. Q: And you wrote that the U.S. State Department put pressure on the INS and Border Patrol to close the door to undocumented migrants during this time, correct? A: Correct.

that Section 1326 was reenacted to maintain national security interests. (Id.) But, following the testimony cited in the government's brief, Professor Lytle-Hernández went on to say:

> I mean, all of this activity is happening, you know, I would argue, uh, yes, within foreign relations, with an (unintelligible) of foreign relations, with an integrated economy, around labor concerns, concerns about what's emerging as the Cold War. Racial animus is also at play. There is no way in which we can understand the politics of head shaving as something that would have been tolerable for other than Mexican immigrants in this time period. And the involvement of the Mexican government does not mean that racial animus is not at play. Mexico has a long and deep history of race and subrogation, especially for indigenous folks. So, the story of race transcends the border.

(ECF No. 49 at 53 (emphasis added).) When considered in the context that the government omits, Professor Lytle Hernández's testimony indicates that the desire to maintain national security cannot be viewed alone because it only offers an explanation in part. But her more complete answer turned on the conclusion that "racial animus is also at play."[38]

The Court cannot consider that Professor Lytle Hernández's testimony, standing alone, is sufficient to demonstrate that the need to maintain national security is an "obvious and uncontroverted . . . nondiscriminatory objective motivat[ing] the passage of Section 1326 in 1952" as the government argues. With no further evidence, the government has again failed to meet its burden.

c. Foreign Relations

Finally, the government fails to show that "a need to maintain foreign relations with international allies, including Mexico" was a motivating factor independent from the demonstrated racial animus. (ECF No. 51 at 11.) Again, the government relies solely on

Q: In part, because of the national security concern presented by having a forced border during the world war, correct? A: In part, yeah." (ECF No. 49 at 50 (excerpts of government counsel's cross-examination of Professor Lytle Hernández).)

[38]In response to the government's prompting to restrict her testimony to the questions asked, Professor Lytle Hernández responded: "Well I just want to be full in my answers, so—everything is complicated so yes/no is not always the accurate answer. So when I think I need to give a little bit more context, I would like to be able to do that." (ECF No. 49 at 53-54.)

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Professor Lytle Hernández's testimony. (ECF Nos. 49 at 44-47; 51 at 11-12.) But contrary to the government's conclusions, Professor Lytle Hernández testified that a nuanced understanding of foreign relations shows the dynamic in 1952 was still grounded in racial animus. While Professor Lytle Hernández acknowledges there was a concern about maintaining foreign relations with Mexico, she again goes on to say, as quoted in full above, that "racial animus is also at play" when considering the United States' foreign policy with Mexico during that period, and "the involvement of the Mexican government does not mean that rational animus is not at play." (ECF No. 49 at 53.) She further explains that during this period, Mexico "is a junior partner" in the two countries' partnership and that "they're not dictating, by any means, to the Untied States Government about how this is going to go." (Id. at 47.) The government's selective citation ignores repeated testimony emphasizing the connection between foreign relations and racial animus, and Professor Lytle Hernández's qualification that the United States felt free to enact legislation it felt was appropriate. It is therefore not possible for the Court to conclude based upon the record before it that the need to maintain a relationship with the government of Mexico is a factor extricable from the demonstrated discriminatory motives of the period.

Without more, the government has failed to show that valid, nondiscriminatory objectives motivated the passage of 1326 and later amendments.

2. Inferred Nondiscriminatory Intent

The government argues that even absent a nondiscriminatory motive, the Court can infer that the 1952 Congress had a valid, nondiscriminatory objective in passing Section 1326. (ECF No. 51 at 11-12.) The Court finds the government's proffered alternative reasoning in support of Section 1326 nonresponsive and unpersuasive. The government's only proffered evidence is the Ninth Circuit's language in United States v. Hernandez-Guerrero, in which the court stated it is "plain" that Section 1326 "is a necessary piece of the immigration-regulation framework." 147 F.3d 1075, 1078 (9th Cir. 1998). But the issue before the court in Hernandez-Guerrero was whether Congress exceeded the scope of its constitutional authority when enacting Section 1326, a criminal immigration statute. See id. The Ninth Circuit held that because Section 1326 was a piece of immigration regulation, Congress acted within its authority to enact the statute. See id.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

But Hernandez-Guerrero has no bearing on this case because the limits of Congress' immigration powers are not at issue here. The question is not whether Congress functionally had the authority to pass a criminal immigration statute, but whether the motivation behind Section 1326's enactment was racially discriminatory in violation of the Equal Protection Clause. That issue was not raised or discussed in Hernandez-Guerrero and the Court accordingly finds its application of limited use.

Ultimately, the fact that Congress has the authority to pass immigration regulations like Section 1326 does not foreclose the possibility that such legislation was passed with discriminatory intent, nor does it preclude the Court from determining whether Section 1326 is unconstitutional on other grounds. The government's own briefing concedes that courts may infer that nondiscriminatory motivation sufficient to displace discriminatory motivation only absent evidence of discriminatory intent. (ECF No. 51 at 12.) But here, Carrillo-Lopez offers substantial evidence that improper discriminatory motives were at least a factor in Section 1326's passage. Accordingly, the Court declines to infer that Section 1326's utility to the overall immigration scheme justifies an inference of nondiscriminatory motive.

3. Repeated Amendment

Finally, the government argues that it has met its burden under the second prong of Arlington Heights "given that Section 1326 has been passed six times in various amended versions, all in the absence of any evidence of discriminatory intent . . ." (ECF No. 51 at 13.) The government relies on the Eleventh Circuit's reasoning in Johnson v. Governor of State of Florida, in which the court held that "the state met its burden as a matter of law by substantively reenacting the law for race-neutral reasons" because repassage of an amended version of the statute "conclusively demonstrates that the [legislature] would enact the provision without an impermissible motive." 405 F.3d 1214,

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

1224 (11th Cir. 2005) (en banc). The Court finds Johnson is distinguishable and is unpersuaded that subsequent Congresses have cleansed § 1326 of its racial taint through amendment alone.

First, the Court does not agree that the subsequent amendments were "substantive." In addressing whether an 1868 felon disenfranchisement provision was alleviated of its racial taint by a subsequent 1968 reenactment, the Johnson court considered that the reenactment "narrowed the class of persons" to whom the disenfranchisement provision would be applicable. See id. Moreover, the Eleventh Circuit noted that the Florida legislature engaged in an extensive deliberative process in which many alternatives were considered to revise the 1868 law in conformance with modern goals. See id. at 1221-22.

But Section 1326's reenactment and subsequent amendments never substantively altered the original provision, making this case distinguishable from Johnson. Since 1952, Section 1326 has been amended five times—in 1988, 1990, 1994, and twice in 1996.[39] These amendments did not change the operation of Section 1326, but instead served to increase financial and carceral penalties. The 1988 amendments added increased imprisonment time for those with prior felony convictions.[40] The 1990 amendment removed the $1,000 cap on financial penalties.[41] The 1994 amendments increased the penalties for persons convicted of felonies from five years to 10, and for those convicted of aggravated felonies from 15 years to 20, while also drawing in additional penalties for persons with certain misdemeanor convictions.[42] And the 1996 amendments to §

Second, there has been no attempt at any point to grapple with the racist history of Section 1326 or remove its influence on the legislation. The Supreme Court has noted in concurrences on two recent occasions that a legislature's failure to confront a provision's racist past may keep it "'[t]ethered' to its original 'bias.'" Espinoza v. Mont. Dep't of Revenue, 140 S. Ct. 2246, 2274 (2020) (Alito, J., concurring); see also Ramos v. Louisiana, 140 S. Ct. 1390, 1410 (2020) (Sotomayor, J., concurring) ("Where a law otherwise is untethered to racial bias—and perhaps also where a legislature actually confronts a law's tawdry past in reenacting it—the new law may well be free of discriminatory taint. That cannot be said of the laws at issue here.").[45] This reasoning is [43]Carrillo-Lopez was charged only with violating §§ 1326(a) and (b), while the AEDPA amendments added §§ 1326(c) and (d), which deal with collateral habeas corpus relief. See Pub. L. 104-132, title IV §§ 401(c), 438(b), 441(a), 110 Stat. 1267-68, 1276, 1279 (Apr. 24, 1996) (codified at 8 U.S.C. § 1326 (2000)).Those provisions, too, function to add a 10 year sentence to a conviction.

[45]Other district courts in this circuit have rejected applying Ramos and Espinoza to similar challenges, but those cases are distinguishable. The clearest distinguishable reason is that other courts reject the relevancy of the 1929 legislative history absent something contemporaneous with the 1952 reenactment. See United States v. Lazcano-Neria, Case No. 3:20-mj-04538-AHG, 2020 WL 6363685, at *8 (S.D. Cal. Oct. 29, 2020) (rejecting the argument that § 1325 of the INA must reckon with the racist legislative history that happened "decades before" because the defendant did not supply an analysis of "relevant legislative history"); see also United States v. Rios-Montano, Case No. 19-CR-2123-GPC, 2020 WL 7226441, at *3 (S.D. Cal. Dec. 8, 2020) (same); United State v. Lucas-Hernandez, Case No. 19MJ24522-LL, 2020 WL 6161150, at *3 (S.D. Cal. Oct. 21, 2020) (same); United States v. Ruiz-Rivera, Case No. 3:20-mj-20306-AHG2020 WL 5230519, at *3 (S.D. Cal. Sept. 2, 2020) (same).

In United States v. Gutierrez-Barba, the district court declined to apply Ramos and Espinoza because it found the statute had been cleansed by a later amendment. See Case No. CR-19-01224-001-PHX-DJH, 2021 WL 2138801, at *3-4 (D. Ariz. May 25, 2021). But that court addressed only the discriminatory intent of the Act of 1929 and did not consider evidence that the 1952 reenactment was also motivated by not binding precedent, nor does the fact that a prior iteration of a statute was tainted by racial animus necessarily mean that every subsequent reenactment will be. See, e.g., Abbott, 138 S. Ct. at 2325 (confirming that, while past discrimination does not "flip[] the evidentiary burden on its head," the historical background of legislative enactment is "relevant to the question of intent"). But this reasoning is instructive and, here, persuasive.

Carrillo-Lopez has established, and the government concedes, that the Act of 1929 was motivated by racial animus. The government does not assert the 1952 Congress addressed that history when it reenacted Section 1326. Moreover, the government fails to demonstrate how any subsequent amending Congress addressed either the racism that initially motivated the Act of 1929 or the discriminatory intent that was contemporaneous with the 1952 reenactment. The record before the Court reflects that at no point has Congress confronted the racist, nativist roots of Section 1326. Instead, the amendments to Section 1326 over the past ninety years have not changed its function but have simply made the provision more punitive and broadened its reach. Accordingly, the Court cannot find that subsequent amendments somehow cleansed the statute of its history while retaining the language and functional operation of the original statute.

In conclusion, the government has failed to establish that a nondiscriminatory motivation existed in 1952 for reenacting Section 1326 that exists independently from the discriminatory motivations, in either 1929 or 1952. Moreover, the government's alternative arguments—that a nondiscriminatory motive was "plain" or that subsequent amendments somehow imply the racial taint was cleansed—are not supported by caselaw nor borne out by the evidentiary record. In sum, on the record before the Court, the Court can only conclude that the government has not met its burden. Because Section 1326 violates the contemporaneous discriminatory intent. Moreover, the Court disagrees with that court's conclusion that Section 1326 was ultimately cleansed of any racial animus by a 1965 amendment elsewhere in the INA which purported to prohibit discrimination on the basis of race, sex, nationality, place of birth, or place of residence. See id. at *4 (referencing Pub. L. No. 89-236, 66 Stat. 175, 911 (Oct. 3, 1965)). That amendment was added to 8 U.S.C. § 1152, a subsection that prohibited discrimination between members of "any single foreign state." The Court will not extend this provision, which does not even address discrimination between immigrants from different countries, to a criminal statute with demonstrated racist origins in a separate section of the subchapter.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Equal Protection Clause of the Fifth Amendment, the Court will grant Carrillo-Lopez's Motion.

III. CONCLUSION

The Court notes that the parties made several arguments and cited to several cases not discussed above. The Court has reviewed these arguments and cases and determines that they do not warrant discussion as they do not affect the outcome of the motions before the Court.

It is therefore ordered that Carrillo-Lopez's motion to dismiss (ECF No. 26) is granted.

It is further ordered that Carrillo-Lopez's indictment (ECF No. 1) is dismissed.

The Clerk of Court is directed to enter judgment accordingly and close the case.

INTEREST OF AMICI STATES

The States of Indiana, Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Mississippi, Montana, Ohio, Oklahoma, South Carolina, and West Virginia respectfully submit this brief as amici curiae in opposition to the Motion for Administrative Stay and for Stay Pending Appeal. Illegal immigration across the southwest border levies significant costs on the States and their citizens. In recent years, States have borne billions of dollars in new expenses related to education, healthcare, and other government-assistance programs because of the rising influx of illegal aliens. AR 440, 442, 452, 555, 587–88. And this is more than a localized problem or limited to those States on our nation's southwest border; illegal immigration's effects are felt nationwide. Indeed, in many communities the costly upward trend in illegal entries at the border has been associated with a spike in violent crime—including predation on migrants by drug cartels and other bad actors. AR 406, 409–10, 418, 423.

In January 2019, in response to the historic surge in encounters of aliens at the southwest border, the Department of Homeland Security

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

(DHS) issued a memorandum entitled "Policy Guidance for Implementation of the Migrant Protection Protocols." AR 151. Exercising the agency's express authority under the Immigration and Nationality Act, 8 U.S.C. § 1101 et seq., the Migrant Protection Protocols (MPP) requires aliens who have no legal entitlement to enter the United States but depart from a third country and transit through Mexico to be returned temporarily to Mexico while awaiting the outcome of their removal proceedings. See 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C). DHS has now issued a seven-page Memorandum purporting to rescind MPP—a Memorandum the district court below found to be unlawfully deficient in multiple respects.

Amici States submit this brief to explain why this Court should leave the district court's order in place, for Amici States have a strong interest in ensuring that any decision lifting MPP is undertaken according to law and after consideration of the consequences for States and their citizens.

ARGUMENT

I. MPP Is a Vital Tool to Combat Illegal Immigration

A. MPP promotes a fairer and more operationally effective immigration system

MPP has proven to be a vital tool in the fight against illegal immigration and has yielded both a fairer and more operationally effective means of processing aliens. Before its implementation, each year thousands of aliens were paroled in the United States while awaiting a hearing—a process that often took several years. See AR 684; Op. 17. And as the district court noted below, among those aliens referred to the Executive Office for Immigration Review, more than thirty percent failed to appear for their hearing and were ordered removed in absentia. Id. at 7–8. After the introduction of MPP, however, fewer aliens were paroled into the United States and pre-pandemic processing time was significantly diminished. See id. at 17; AR 555, 684.

MPP also likely led to an overall reduction of encounters at the border and likely encouraged many asylum seekers without meritorious claims to remain in or return to their country of origin. AR 555–56, 683–84. These positive changes have most certainly lessened the variety of costs imposed by illegal immigration on the States and their citizens.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

B. The Biden Administration's termination of MPP jeopardizes the interests of the States

The Biden Administration's termination of MPP has had the predictable effect of undermining the interests of the States and further taxing an immigration system still hampered by the COVID-19 pandemic.

The rescission is a long-promised goal of the new administration. In December 2019, more than a year before taking office, then-candidate Biden decried that "through his Migrant Protection Protocol policies, [President] Trump has effectively closed our country to asylum seekers, forcing them instead to choose between waiting in dangerous situations, vulnerable to exploitation by cartels and other bad actors, or taking a risk to try crossing between the ports of entry." See The Biden Plan for Securing Our Values as a Nation of Immigrants, Biden Harris, https://joebiden.com/immigration/; see also @JoeBiden, Twitter (Dec. 11, 2019), https://twitter.com/JoeBiden/status/1204835741554987008. Biden pledged to "end [the Trump Administration's] policies, starting with Trump's Migrant Protection Protocols, and restore our asylum laws so that they do what they should be designed to do—protect people fleeing persecution and who cannot return home safely." The Biden Plan for Securing Our Values as a Nation of Immigrants, supra.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

As promised, on the first day of the new administration DHS Acting Secretary David Pekoske issued a one-page declaration announcing that MPP would be suspended pending further review. AR 581. Despite the evident time to plan such a move, however, DHS provided no reasoning for its decision. Id. And DHS offered no rationale at all until June 2021, when—after Texas and Missouri had brought this challenge to the suspension—the DHS Secretary issued a seven-page Memorandum announcing the immediate and permanent termination of MPP. AR 1–7.

The consequences of the Biden Administration's termination of MPP are both unsurprising and significant. Without MPP, thousands of illegal aliens—the vast majority of whom do not have any legal entitlement to remain in the United States, see AR 689—will be paroled in the United States while awaiting the outcome of their removal proceedings. This is certain to impose new, sweeping costs on the States in supporting the parolees during the pendency of their removal proceedings—not to mention the thousands who will fail to appear and instead choose to remain in the United States illegally.

This shift in policy also comes at a time when the number of encounters at the southwest border continues to rise and, due to the COVID-19 pandemic, DHS's capacity to process aliens has precipitously declined. For example, in May and June 2021, U.S. Customs and Border Protection recorded over 180,000 and 188,000 encounters, respectively, at the southwest border. See Southwest Land Border Encounters, U.S. Customs & Border Protection (Aug. 12, 2021), https://www.cbp.gov/news-room/stats/southwest-land-border-encounters. And in July 2021 the count soared to over 210,000. These constitute the highest numbers of monthly encounters recorded by United States Customs and Border Protection in more than twenty years—a period that includes several previous surges that took place at times when processing was not constrained by recent COVID-19 capacity considerations.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Ultimately, the States rely on the federal government to enforce immigration law and to protect their interests in this area. See Arizona v. United States, 567 U.S. 387, 394–400 (2012); id. at 397 ("The pervasiveness of federal regulation does not diminish the importance of immigration policy to the States."). Indeed, while "[t]he National Government has significant power to regulate immigration," the Supreme Court has made clear that "with [this] power comes responsibility." Id. at 416. The Biden Administration's efforts to eliminate MPP, without consideration of the States' significant vested interests and the litany of evident harms it would cause, is an abdication of that responsibility.

II. The Memorandum Rescinding MPP Fails to Consider Important Aspects of the Policy Problem and Is Thus Arbitrary and Capricious under the APA

The Biden Administration's refusal to consider the costs of rescinding MPP is not just bad policy. It is unlawful as well. The Administrative Procedure Act (APA) requires agencies to "'consider . . . important aspect[s] of the problem'" before them. Dep't of Homeland Sec. v. Regents of the Univ. of Cal., 140 S. Ct. 1891, 1910 (2020) (quoting Motor Vehicle Mfrs. Ass'n of U.S., Inc. v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 463 U.S. 29, 43 (1983)) (alterations in original); see also 5 U.S.C. § 706(2)(A). DHS has not done so.

Despite MPP's evident benefits and the corresponding costs of revoking the policy, DHS suspended MPP in January via a three-line, two-sentence declaration announcing—without any explanation whatever—that DHS would be suspending new enrollments in MPP "pending further review of the program." AR 581. This unreasoned change in policy plainly violated the APA: It lacked consideration of any aspects of the problems confronting American immigration policy.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

More than four months after DHS suspended MPP—and several weeks after Texas and Missouri filed this lawsuit challenging this unreasoned change in policy—the DHS Secretary issued the Memorandum at issue here, which "direct[s] DHS personnel to take all appropriate actions to terminate MPP, including taking all steps necessary to rescind implementing guidance and other directives or policy guidance issued to implement the program." AR 2. And while this Memorandum contains some explanation, it too violates the APA for failing to consider all aspects of the problem.

Indeed, the Memorandum suffers—at the very least—from the same two deficiencies for which the Supreme Court invalidated the rescission of the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals (DACA) program in Regents: It fails to consider (1) "alternatives that are within the ambit of the existing policy" and (2) "whether there was legitimate reliance" on the existing MPP policy. Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1913 (internal quotation marks, brackets, and citations omitted). And each of these failures are independently sufficient to render the Memorandum unlawful.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

A. The Memorandum fails to consider alternatives

The obligation of federal agencies to consider alternatives to their chosen policies was definitively established at least as far back as State Farm, but the Court's recent decision in Regents confirms just how significant and unwavering this obligation is: Agencies retain this obligation even if they correctly conclude that some change must be made to existing policy.

In Regents, DHS had rescinded DACA on the ground that the program was unlawful, and the Court expressly declined to "evaluate the claims challenging the explanation and correctness of th[at] illegality conclusion." Id. at 1910. Yet the Court nevertheless held that, even if that conclusion were correct, DHS could not completely rescind the program without giving meaningful consideration to alternative options—in particular, keeping elements of the program that may have been lawful. See id. at 1912 ("Even if it is illegal for DHS to extend work authorization and other benefits to DACA recipients . . . the DACA Memorandum could not be rescinded in full 'without any consideration whatsoever' of a forbearance-only policy." (quoting State Farm, 463 U.S. at 51)).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Accordingly, it is not enough for DHS to provide sufficient policy reasons for discontinuing MPP—and it is far from clear the agency did so here in any case. Regents holds that even if the Memorandum clears that bar, it still must specifically identify—and explain why DHS rejected—alternatives to completely rescinding current policy.

The Memorandum fails to do so. While it claims DHS "considered various alternatives" to terminating MPP, the Memorandum's discussion of this aspect of the problem is limited to a single paragraph that neither identifies specific alternatives nor advances any rationale beyond conclusory assertions. AR 5.

Underscoring its all-or-nothing approach, the Memorandum's discussion of "alternatives" begins by noting that DHS could "maintain[] the status quo"—which, given its earlier suspension of MPP, would effectively amount to terminating the program—or it could keep MPP and "resum[e] new enrollments in the program." Id. Beyond this, the Memorandum does nothing more than briefly suggest that "the program could be modified in some fashion" without specifically identifying any such potential modifications. Id. The Memorandum thus fails to establish the agency considered any alternatives short of terminating the entire MPP program. It therefore violates the rule "that when an agency rescinds a prior policy its reasoned analysis must consider the 'alternative[s]' that are 'within the ambit of the existing [policy].'" Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1913 (quoting State Farm, 463 U.S. at 51 (alterations in original)).

Further, in addition to not identifying alternatives, the Memorandum fails to provide any reasoned explanation for rejecting them. It simply asserts that preserving MPP "would not be consistent with this Administration's vision and values and would be a poor use of the Department's resources," and that modifying MPP "would require a total redesign that would involve significant additional investments in personnel and resources." AR 5. The APA demands more than such conclusory statements. Even if "there may be a valid reason" ultimately to reject a particular alternative policy, the APA requires the agency to "establish that DHS considered that option." Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1913. The Memorandum here fails to do so, and that "omission alone renders . . . [the] decision arbitrary and capricious." Id.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

B. The Memorandum fails to consider reliance interests

Nor do the Memorandum's deficiencies stop there. It also "fail[s] to address whether there was 'legitimate reliance'" on the existing MPP policy. Id. (quoting Smiley v. Citibank (South Dakota), N.A., 517 U.S. 735, 742 (1996)). As the district court observed below, the Memorandum "fail[s] to consider the costs to Plaintiffs and Plaintiffs' reliance interests in the proper enforcement of federal immigration law." Op. 37. Indeed, "the agency did not consider the costs to the States at all." Id.

Notably, the United States scarcely challenges these observations. Its response on this point does not identify any discussion in the Memorandum of reliance interests that could be affected by terminating MPP, but merely quotes the Memorandum's assertion that DHS considered "'the impact such a decision could have on border management and border communities.'" Mot. 18 (quoting AR 5). Such an isolated suggestion obviously cannot constitute sufficient consideration of anything, and in any case there is nothing to suggest that this particular phrase has anything to do with reliance at all. This phrase does not mention reliance—on the part of States or anyone else—and is immediately followed by the puzzling announcement that the Secretary "considered the Department's experience designing and operating a phased process, together with interagency and nongovernmental partners, to facilitate the safe and orderly entry into the United States of certain individuals who had been placed in MPP." AR 5. Whatever this means, it certainly does not have anything to do with States' reliance on MPP.

Left without any actual discussion of reliance interests in the Memorandum, the United States instead insists that DHS was not required to "consider State reliance interests" at all because "the States have no cognizable reliance interest in a discretionary program." Mot. 18. This argument, however, is squarely foreclosed by Regents. There the Court acknowledged that the DHS Secretary "plainly exercised such discretionary authority in winding down [DACA]," 140 S. Ct. at 1910, but it held that the Secretary was nevertheless obligated to "consider[] potential reliance interests," id. at 1913. Indeed, it reiterated that the Secretary was obligated to do so even though "the DACA Memorandum stated that the program 'conferred no substantive rights' and provided benefits only in two-year increments," and even though DHS—if it had addressed the issue—may have eventually concluded that "reliance interests in benefits that it views as unlawful are entitled to no or diminished weight." Id. at 1913–14 (internal citation omitted). While such factors "are surely pertinent in considering the strength of any reliance interests," the APA still requires that such "consideration must be undertaken by the agency in the first instance, subject to normal APA review." Id.

In rescinding MPP—as in rescinding DACA—DHS "was not writing on a blank slate," and it was therefore "required to assess whether there were reliance interests, determine whether they were significant, and weigh any such interests against competing policy concerns." Id. at 1915 (internal quotation marks and citation omitted). Because this Memorandum fails to do so, it is arbitrary, capricious, and unlawful under the APA.

INTRODUCTION

There is an "unsustainable" crisis on the southern border, one well-recognized by top leadership at DHS.[1] This crisis can be directly traced to DHS's arbitrary and capricious decision to terminate the Migrant Protection Protocols ("MPP")—a decision that the federal government has reportedly been reconsidering for "weeks."[2] And it harms Texas and Missouri in many ways ("Plaintiffs" or the "States")—including increases in various costs that the States cannot avoid.

Defendants ask this Court for an extraordinary stay of the district court's final judgment and injunction issued with a meticulous, 54-page opinion and after a full bench trial, where Defendants were entitled to introduce whatever evidence they chose. The trial court carefully set forth findings of fact and conclusions of law showing Defendants' June 1 Memorandum terminating the MPP was arbitrary and capricious and violated the Immigration and Nationality Act.

The district court got it right, and Defendants are entitled neither to an administrative stay nor to stay the injunction pending appeal. The June 1 Memorandum was arbitrary and capricious for failing to consider benefits of the MPP that DHS had itself previously identified, for arbitrarily considering factors related to the termination of the MPP, and for failing to consider that termination of the MPP leads to violations of DHS's statutory obligation to detain certain aliens entering the United States. Viewing the statutory scheme—and DHS's obligation to detain certain aliens—as a whole, the district court also correctly concluded that the June 1 Memorandum caused Defendants to abandon those obligations.

Defendants' complaints of irreparable harm ring hollow. Public reports indicate that they "have privately discussed reviving the Trump-era policy Migrant Protection Protocols (MPP), colloquially known as "Remain in Mexico," in order to manage the number of migrants arriving at the border." Green, supra n.2.[3] Any harms Defendants claim to show arise from their decision to violate federal law—and so those harms are of their own making. This Court does not grant a stay under such circumstances, let alone on an emergency basis. Texas v. United States, 787 F.3d 733, 768 (5th Cir. 2015). This Court should issue neither an administrative stay nor a stay pending appeal.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

I. The Border Crisis and Its Impact on the States

In 2018, an immigration surge caused a "humanitarian and border security crisis," with "severe impacts on U.S. border security and immigration operations." Op. 7. Many thousands of migrants came from Central American countries through Mexico and claimed asylum upon arrival. Most of these claims were without merit, as "only 14 percent of aliens who claimed credible fear of persecution or torture were [3] Under Circuit Rule 27.3, Defendants must "[c]ertify that the facts supporting emergency consideration of the motion are true and complete." While Defendants insist that MPP's re-imposition would lead to a litany of irreparable harms, they did not disclose to the Court that they are considering re-implementing it, if true.

granted asylum between Fiscal Year 2008 and Fiscal Year 2019." Id. Many "simply bec[a]me fugitives" after they "disappeared into the country before a judge denie[d] their claim." Id.

This influx of illegal aliens imposes non-recoverable costs on the States, including those associated with providing driver's licenses, public education, and healthcare. Id. at 18-19. It also increases law enforcement and correctional costs, the victimization of migrants by human traffickers, and resultant fiscal harms. Id. at 20.

II. The Migrant Protection Protocols

In response, on December 20, 2018, the Trump Administration implemented MPP. Id. at 8. Relying on the federal government's authority under 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C), under MPP, DHS began to return to Mexico certain aliens who were not nationals or citizens of Mexico, but who arrived in the United States from Mexico, for the duration of their removal proceedings under 8 U.S.C. § 1229a. Id. The same day, the United States obtained Mexico's agreement to permit entry of MPP enrollees back into Mexico. Id. The goal of MPP was to ensure that "[c]ertain aliens attempting to enter the U.S. illegally or without documentation . . . will no longer be released into the country," only to "fail to file an asylum application and/or disappear before an immigration judge can determine the merits of any claim." Id.

On October 28, 2019, DHS assessed MPP and found "a rapid and substantial decline in apprehensions in those areas where the most amenable aliens have been processed and returned to Mexico pursuant to MPP." Op. 10 (quoting AR 683). It also found that "aliens without meritorious claims—which no longer constitute a free ticket into the United States—are beginning to voluntarily return home." Id.

III. Procedural History

On January 20, 2021, the Biden Administration suspended further enrollments in MPP in a three-line memorandum. Enforcement encounters on the southwest border immediately skyrocketed: encounters jumped from 75,000 in January, to 173,000 in April, to nearly 189,000 in June, Op. 17 (citing AR 670), to 212,000 in July. U.S. Customs and Border Protection, Southwest Land Border Encounters, CBP (Aug. 12, 2021), https://www.cbp.gov/newsroom/stats/southwest-land-border-encounters. This amplified the ongoing border crisis into an outright disaster, emboldening criminal cartels and human traffickers who prey on vulnerable migrants.

On April 20, Texas and Missouri challenged DHS's suspension of MPP, alleging that the suspension of the program violated the Administrative Procedure Act and the INA, 8 U.S.C § 1225. Op. 1-2. Plaintiffs moved for a preliminary injunction, but before briefing was concluded, DHS issued a new memorandum (the "June 1 Memorandum") that permanently terminated MPP. Id. The June 1 Memorandum failed to consider MPP's role in discouraging illegal border crossings, DHS's own favorable 2019 assessment of MPP, the States' reliance interests, or any alternatives less burdensome on the States other than terminating MPP altogether. Id. at 36-38.

Plaintiffs promptly amended their complaint to challenge the June 1 Memorandum. Id. at 2. The parties agreed to consolidate the preliminary injunction hearing with the trial on the merits pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 65(a)(2). Id. at 3. After a bench trial, the district court concluded that Plaintiffs "are entitled to relief on their APA and statutory claims against Defendants," and vacated the June 1 Memorandum. Id. at 1. The district court also "craft[ed] injunctive relief to ensure Plaintiffs receive a full remedy" because an injunction would have "meaningful practical effect independent of . . . vacatur." Id. at 1, 51-52 (quoting Monsanto Co. v. Geertson Seed Farms, 561 U.S. 139, 165 (2010)).

ARGUMENT

The federal government is not entitled to a stay because it cannot satisfy the "four factors [courts consider] in deciding whether to grant a stay pending appeal: (1) whether the stay applicant has made a strong showing that he is likely to succeed on the merits; (2) whether the applicant will be irreparably injured absent a stay; (3) whether issuance of the stay will substantially injure the other parties interested in the proceeding; and (4) where the public interest lies." Texas. v. United States, 787 F.3d 733, 746-47 (5th Cir. 2015) (cleaned up). "A stay is not a matter of right, even if irreparable injury might otherwise result to the appellant." Id. (cleaned up).

I. Defendants Are Unlikely to Succeed on the Merits Because They Violated Federal Law.

Defendants are not entitled to a stay because they cannot make "a strong showing that [they are] likely to succeed on the merits." Texas, 787 F.3d at 746. This "strong showing" requires the government to demonstrate that the district court abused its discretion by entering an injunction. Id. at 747. Legal issues are "reviewed de novo," but "findings of fact are reviewed for clear error." Id. Defendants categorically ignore this deferential standard of review. Cf. Mot. 7.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

A. Defendants cannot escape judicial review of their unlawful agency action.

Defendants provide (at 7-11) a laundry list of reasons for the Court to avoid reaching the merits of Plaintiffs' claims, but the district court correctly rejected each argument. Op. 21-34.

1. Plaintiffs have standing.

Defendants' standing argument ignores the district court's fact findings supporting standing. Compare Mot. 7-8, with Op. 17-20.

Evidence before the district court supports its conclusion that both Texas and Missouri had standing based on costs associated with (1) driver's licenses, (2) education, (3) healthcare, and (4) law enforcement and corrections. Op. 18-20. Defendants mention only one of these: "the driver's-license rationale," which this Court approved in the DAPA case. Texas v. United States, 809 F.3d 134, 150 (5th Cir. 2015). That ruling compels the conclusion that Plaintiffs have standing here because the relevant evidence in the two cases was indistinguishable. Compare id. at 748, and Texas v. United States, 86 F. Supp. 3d 591, 616-17 (S.D. Tex. 2015), with Op. 18-19, and ECF 54-2, Ex. F (App. 425-29). And in any event, Defendants provide no basis for this Court to conclude that the district court clearly erred in these findings.

Defendants dispute redressability (at 8) "because MPP did not require that" any particular alien remain in Mexico. True, MPP gave immigration officers some discretion, but when they exercised that discretion, they ordered more than 68,000 aliens to remain in Mexico, ECF 61 at AR555, including more than 50,000 aliens on the Texas border, ECF 11 at 2. Reinstating MPP would allow immigration officers to make similar choices, thereby redressing the States' harms stemming from the presence of too many illegal aliens. Op. 23.

Next, Defendants challenge redressability (at 8) on the theory that aliens cannot "be returned pursuant to MPP without Mexico's agreement." But they cite no record evidence for this claim. To the contrary, the record supports the district court's conclusion that the federal government could initiate—and had initiated—MPP unilaterally. Op. 49 n.15 (citing ECF 54-2 at App.303, App.307). As the district court explained, "even if Mexico's cooperation may be required to return an alien who has already been admitted, nothing prevents DHS from refusing to admit asylum applicants at ports of entry in the first place—before they ever enter the United States." Id. To the contrary, DHS's regulations provide that the federal government "may require" any apparently inadmissible alien "who arrives at a land border port-of-entry from Canada or Mexico, to remain in that country while awaiting a removal hearing." 8 C.F.R. § 235.3(d).

2. The June 1 Memorandum is reviewable.

Defendants next insist (at 8-10) that the termination of MPP is unreviewable. Wrong again—for three reasons. First, Defendants rely (at 8) on 8 U.S.C. § 1252(a)(2)(B)(ii), but four courts have rejected this argument in cases about MPP. See Op. at 29-30 (collecting cases). Defendants cite no precedent showing that a statute barring aliens' challenges to certain "[d]enials of discretionary relief" prevents States from challenging the termination of an entire program. 8 U.S.C. § 1252(a)(2)(B).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Section 1252(a)(2)(B)(ii) prevents aliens from challenging the federal government's refusal to grant discretionary relief "as a matter of grace." Kucana v. Holder, 558 U.S. 233, 247-48 (2010); see ECF 67 at 17-19. It does not apply when a plaintiff "challenge[s] the extent of the [official's] authority" because "authority is not a matter of discretion." Zadvydas v. Davis, 533 U.S. 678, 688 (2001). Merely labeling a federal official's decision "discretionary" does not "trigger[] § (a)(2)(B)(ii)'s discretionary review bar." Arbid v. Holder, 700 F.3d 379, 384 (9th Cir. 2012) (per curiam).

Second, Defendants argue (at 8) that terminating MPP was committed to agency discretion by law under 5 U.S.C. § 701(a)(2). This ignores the APA's "basic presumption of judicial review." DHS v. Regents of the Univ. of Cal., 140 S. Ct. 1891, 1905 (2020) (cleaned up). "To honor the presumption of review," the Supreme Court has read "§ 701(a)(2) quite narrowly, confining it to those rare administrative decisions traditionally left to agency discretion." Id.

Terminating MPP is not one of "those rare circumstances where the relevant statute is drawn so that a court would have no meaningful standard against which to judge the agency's exercise of discretion." Weyerhaeuser Co. v. U.S. Fish & Wildlife Serv., 139 S. Ct. 361, 370 (2018). Defendants lack discretion in these circumstances because the June 1 Memorandum violates mandatory duties under Section 1225. See infra Part I.C.

Moreover, Defendants conflate the exercise of ordinary discretion—which can be "aside" if "abuse[d]," 5 U.S.C. § 706(2)(A)—with unreviewable agency action "committed to agency discretion by law." Id. § 701(a)(2); see Weyerhaeuser, 139 S.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Ct. at 370. When Congress wants to grant "sole and unreviewable discretion," it knows how, as it did elsewhere in Section 1225. 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(1)(A)(iii)(I). But when Congress grants only ordinary discretion, as through the use of "may" in Section 1225(b)(2)(C), agency action can be set aside "if it [is] made without a rational explanation, inexplicably depart[s] from established policies, or rest[s] on an impermissible basis." Wong Wing Hang v. INS, 360 F.2d 715, 718 (2d Cir. 1966). The mere presence of some discretion does not render decisions unreviewable. E.g., Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1905-07 (holding the rescission of DACA was reviewable even though "DHS may rescind DACA"). Even if the statute "leave[s] much to the Secretary's discretion," it "do[es] not leave his discretion unbounded." Dep't of Commerce v. New York, 139 S. Ct. 2551, 2568 (2019).

Defendants' authority (at 8-9) is not to the contrary. Most either rejected their reviewability arguments or did not consider APA reviewability. Texas, 809 F.3d at 164, 168; Jama v. ICE, 543 U.S. 335, 346 (2005). The remainder address straightforward non-enforcement policies, but the district court correctly found that terminating MPP is more than a non-enforcement policy: by increasing the use of parole, DHS "create[s] affirmative benefits for aliens such as work authorization." Op. at 31. "Moreover, the MPP program is not about enforcement proceedings at all" because "[a]ny alien eligible for MPP has already been placed into enforcement proceedings under Section 1229a." Id. at 32.

3. The June 1 Memorandum is final agency action.

Defendants' remaining argument (at 10-11) that terminating MPP was not final agency action because it did not "produce 'legal consequences'" is equally wrong.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The June 1 Memorandum indisputably "direct[ed] DHS personnel, effective immediately." ECF 61 at AR 007. "That the agency's action binds its staff demonstrates that legal consequences flow from it." Texas v. EEOC, 933 F.3d 433, 442 (5th Cir. 2019). Defendants cannot avoid that conclusion by asserting (at 10-11) that the June 1 Memorandum was a mere policy statement: in this Circuit, a "policy statement" can be "'final agency action' within the meaning of" the APA. Merchants Fast Motor Lines, Inc. v. ICC, 5 F.3d 911, 919-20 (5th Cir. 1993). The district court therefore correctly found the June 1 Memorandum reviewable.

B. The June 1 Memorandum was arbitrary and capricious.

The district court correctly found the Memorandum unlawful. "The APA sets forth the procedures by which federal agencies are accountable to the public and their actions subject to review by the courts." Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1905 (cleaned up). Among other things, it prohibits agency actions that are arbitrary and capricious, 5 U.S.C. § 706(2)(A), and requires agencies to engage in "reasoned decisionmaking." Michigan v. EPA, 576 U.S. 788, 796 (1992).

The district court concluded that the Secretary's June 1 Memorandum was arbitrary and capricious for numerous reasons, including because the agency failed to consider the benefits of MPP, relied on reasons for terminating MPP that were arbitrary, and failed to consider the effect terminating MPP would have on DHS's ability to detain aliens subject to mandatory detention. Op. 34-42. Any of these failures would be fatal to the June 1 Memorandum.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

1. The district court correctly concluded that the June 1 Memorandum improperly failed to consider the MPP's benefits.

The June 1 Memorandum is unlawful because it failed to consider key parts of the record on MPP. First, as DHS concluded in October 2019, asylum applicants "with non-meritorious claims often remain in the country for lengthy periods of time," creating "perverse incentives." Op. 12 (citing AR 687). After implementing the MPP, DHS found "'aliens without meritorious claims—which no longer constitute[d] a free ticket into the United States—[were] beginning to voluntarily return home." Op. 36 (citing AR 684). "The June 1 Memorandum never once mentions these benefits." Id. Second, "the Secretary failed to consider the warnings by career DHS personnel that 'the suspension of the MPP, along with other policies, would lead to a resurgence of illegal aliens attempting to illegally cross the border.'" Id. at 37. Third, "[t]he Secretary failed to consider the costs to Plaintiffs and Plaintiffs' reliance interests in the proper enforcement of federal immigration law" and "the ongoing implementation of the MPP." Id. Fourth, "the Secretary also failed to meaningfully consider more limited policies than the total termination of the MPP." Id. at 38.

Defendants insist (at 15) that none of this is right because "the Secretary evaluated all 'prior DHS assessments of the program,' and the 'anticipated benefits and goals articulated at the outset of the program and over its course.'" Besides the Secretary's ipse dixit, the record does not support this claim. The June 1 Memorandum does not show that DHS actually identified those benefits, let alone evaluated them or explained why they are outweighed by MPP's costs. This contravenes the Supreme Court's instruction that DHS must "supply a reasoned analysis for [its] change" in position. Motor Vehicle Mfrs. Ass'n of U.S., Inc. v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 463 U.S. 29, 42 (1983). Defendant's talismanic "stat[ement] that a factor was considered" cannot suffice. Getty v. Fed. Sav. & Loan Ins. Corp., 805 F.2d 1050, 1055 (D.C. Cir. 1986); see also United Techs. Corp. v. U.S. Dep't of Def., 601 F.3d 557, 562 (D.C. Cir. 2010).

Defendants' four specific objections also lack merit. First, Defendants concede (at 7) that the June 1 Memorandum fails to consider warnings by career DHS personnel, complaining that those warnings are not in the administrative record. That is a confession not a defense: if these warnings—credited by the district court—were not in the administrative record, the June 1 Memorandum could not have considered them. Together with the increase in border encounters after MPP's termination, this shows that the June 1 Memorandum unlawfully failed to consider the relevant facts and data. State Farm, 463 U.S. at 43.

Second, defendants challenge (at 18) as unsupported the conclusion that the June 1 Memorandum failed to consider costs to States. But the Supreme Court has recognized that States "bear[] many of the consequences of unlawful immigration." Arizona v. United States, 567 U.S. 387, 397 (2012). As discussed above, the record supports the district court's standing finding because costs for States did increase—and again, Defendants have not even attempted to show clear error.

Third, Defendants erroneously contend (Mot. 18) that the States have no reliance interests. But this contradicts the Supreme Court's decision in Regents, where the Court considered loss of tax revenue to State governments. 140 S. Ct. at 1914.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Fourth, Defendants object (at 18-19) to the district court's conclusion that the June 1 Memorandum fails to consider more limited policies than MPP's termination. Defendants attack a straw man, arguing that the district court required DHS to set out examples of alternate versions of the MPP. The district court actually concluded that the agency's cursory analysis meant that it had failed to meaningfully consider alternatives, noting that the "entirety of the Secretary's reasoning in not modifying the MPP is contained" in one sentence. Op. 38. The Secretary "should have considered those matters" but did not. Regents, 140 S. Ct. 1915.

2. The district court correctly concluded that the June 1 Memorandum reached arbitrary conclusions.

The district court also concluded DHS arbitrarily justified terminating MPP based on the "high percentage of cases completed through the entry of in absentia removal orders"—specifically, 44%. Op. 38-40 (quoting AR 4). The district court noted two defects in this analysis. First, the district court concluded that this analysis reaches no policy conclusion at all. Id. at 39 (quoting State Farm, 463 U.S. at 52). Second, the district court concluded that DHS's own data suggest comparable in absentia removal rates before MPP's implementation. Thus, the June 1 Memorandum did not conclude that 44 percent was a high rate of in absentia removal, whether MPP was the cause, and if so whether that meant the MPP performed as intended. Id. at 40-41. The evidence supports each conclusion.

Defendants contend only (at 19) that the Secretary found that the MPP "did not adequately 'ensure that conditions in Mexico enabled migrants to attend their proceedings.'" Even if true, that is beside the point because the June 1 Memorandum reaches no conclusion concerning that number, only observes that it "raises questions." AR 4. At a minimum, the Secretary needed to explain why his conclusion was contrary to DHS's previous conclusion that MPP caused aliens to abandon meritless asylum claims. FCC v. Fox Television Stations, Inc., 556 U.S. 502, 515-16 (2009).

The district court further concluded that reliance on COVID-19 court closures was arbitrary and capricious because immigration courts reopened before the program was cancelled. Op. 41. Defendants' footnote response states that "infrastructure used for MPP remains shuttered." Mot. 19 n. 4. But the evidence Defendants point to does not suggest that infrastructure remains closed for any reason other than that Defendants themselves have declined to reopen it. See ECF 98-2, ¶¶10-11.

3. The district court correctly concluded that the June 1 Memorandum was arbitrary and capricious because it failed to consider the effect on compliance with section 1225.

Finally, the district court correctly concluded that the June 1 Memorandum was arbitrary and capricious because it failed to consider DHS's mandatory detention obligations. Op. 41-42. Defendants' primary contention (at 20) that DHS has no mandatory detention obligation contravenes the INA.

C. The June 1 Memorandum caused systematic violations of Section 1225.

The district court concluded that, "Section 1225 provides the government two options vis-à-vis aliens seeking asylum: (1) mandatory detention; or (2) return to a contiguous territory"; "[f]ailing to detain or return aliens pending their immigration proceedings violates Section 1225." Op. 43. Because "[u]nder these particular circumstances, where Defendants cannot meet their detention obligations, terminating

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

MPP necessarily leads to the systemic violation of Section 1225." Id. at 44. Put simply, "aliens are released into the United States because Defendants are unable to detain them." Id. Parole is an alternative, but only on a "only on a case-by-case basis for urgent humanitarian reasons or significant public benefit." Id. (quoting 8 U.S.C. § 1182(d)(5)(A)).

Defendants contend (at 11) that the district court "misconceived the statutory scheme." But the district court's ruling follows the plain statutory text. If an alien subject to expedited removal lacks credible fear of persecution, the alien can invoke further administrative proceedings but "shall be detained pending a final determination of credible fear of persecution and, if found not to have such a fear, until removed." 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(1)(B)(iii)(IV). Even if the officer determines that the "alien has a credible fear of persecution . . . the alien shall be detained for further consideration of the application for asylum." Id. § 1225(b)(1)(B)(ii).

For aliens not going through expedited removal (that is, aliens given a Notice to Appear), the INA typically mandates detention: "if the examining immigration officer determines that an alien seeking admission is not clearly and beyond a doubt entitled to be admitted, the alien shall be detained for" removal proceedings. Id. § 1225(b)(2)(A). The INA does give the federal government an alternative choice if the alien "is arriving on land . . . from a foreign territory contiguous to the United States"—namely, the government "may return the alien to that territory pending" asylum proceedings. Id. § 1225(b)(2)(C). Thus, the government has two options for the default rule governing asylum seekers: (1) detention or (2) return to a contiguous territory (as required by MPP). What the government cannot do is release them into the interior (as required by the June 1 Memorandum).

The States do not, and have never, contended that this scheme mandates MPP. The second option is optional. See 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C) (providing that the federal government "may return the alien to that territory"). The federal government can always choose the first option: detention. And the States recognize that Defendants may grant parole, but only "only on a case-by-case basis for urgent humanitarian reasons or significant public benefit," and not on a class-wide basis. 8 U.S.C. § 1182(d)(5)(A).

But Defendants are not paroling individuals for the reasons specified by statute. Instead, "[t]he number of asylum seekers who will remain in potentially indefinite detention pending disposition of their cases will be almost entirely a question of DHS's detention capacity, and not whether the individual circumstances of individual cases warrant release or detention." OP. 43 n.11 (citing AR 184). "DHS has the discretion to parole people who are not eligible for bond and frequently does so due to insufficient detention space or other humanitarian reasons." AR 183. Thus, after a "preliminary finding" of "credible fear," Defendants are "convert[ing]" an alien's status from "Expedited Removal" to "Notice to Appear" and then allowing the alien to be "released on recognizance." ECF 54-2, App.330 n.7.

According to Defendants, the aliens' "[l]egal status while out of custody is parole until asylum is granted." Id. They claim to be doing so because "[c]ontinued detention of a migrant who has more likely than not demonstrated credible fear is not in the interest of resource allocation or justice." Id. But this class-based determination is not the "case-by-case" determination required by section 1182(d)(5)(A).

Put differently, the reason there are so many aliens requiring detention (or, purportedly, in need of parole) is Defendants' suspension of MPP. Thus, the district court properly found that Defendants' suspension of MPP is causing their ongoing violation of Section 1225, Op. 42-43, and Defendants cannot show the remaining factor in the stay test—a likelihood of success on the merits.

II. Defendants Cannot Satisfy the Remaining Factors.

Defendants cannot satisfy the remaining stay factors because whatever harm they may suffer is self-inflicted, and while there is a public interest in enforcing immigration laws, there is neither a public interest in failing to enforce them nor in unlawful agency action.

A. Self-inflicted inconvenience is not irreparable harm.

The Court considers whether the government will be "irreparably injured absent a stay." Texas, 787 F.3d at 746-47. The government merely offers (at 7), in conclusory fashion, that it "will be severely and irreparably harmed without a stay[.]" But such conclusory allegations of irreparable injury are insufficient. Am. Passage Media Corp. v. Cass Commc'ns, Inc., 750 F.2d 1470, 1473 (9th Cir. 1985). And it was Plaintiffs—not Defendants—who during trial "show[ed] that they are suffering ongoing and future injuries as a result of the termination of MPP." Ex. [x] at 49.

Defendants counter (at 20-23) that the district court's injunction will be disruptive. The district court rejected such "problems [as] entirely self-inflicted." Op. 46-

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

47. "That the government's asserted harm is largely self-inflicted 'severely undermines' its claim for equitable relief." Al Otro Lado v. Wolf, 952 F.3d 999, 1008 (9th Cir. 2020); see also 11A Wright & Miller, Federal Practice and Procedure § 2948.1 (3d ed.). Defendants "could have avoided" these problems "by delaying preparatory work until the litigation was resolved." Op. 46-47 (quoting Texas, 809 F.3d at 187). Or Defendants "'could have avoided' any disruptions by informing Mexico that termination of MPP would be subject to judicial review 'until the litigation was resolved.'" Id. at 47 (quoting Texas, 809 F.3d at 187). And "Mexico is capable of understanding that [Defendants are] required to follow the laws of the United States which includes the APA and INA." Id.

Insofar as Defendants' claim disruption because "MPP had been in the process of termination for months[,]" that establishes only that the June 1 Memorandum was a "post hoc" rationalization "for a decision that was already made," which does not reflect good faith (and would itself be arbitrary and capricious under the APA). Id. at 48. Such inequitable conduct is "sufficient to deny" Defendants' request for an equitable stay pending appeal. In re GGW Brands, LLC, No. 2:13-bk-15130, 2013 WL 6906375, at *26-*27 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. Nov. 15, 2013).

Defendants claim (at 20) that they "cannot restart MPP without . . . cooperation from Mexico." Again, "MPP was adopted and launched unilaterally, just as it was later terminated unilaterally." Op. 49 n.15. "And even if Mexico's cooperation may be required to return an alien who has already been admitted, nothing prevents DHS from refusing to admit asylum applicants at ports of entry in the first place—before they ever enter the United States." Id.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

B. The balance of equities and public interest favor enforcing federal law, not implementing an unlawful memorandum.

The district court also correctly found that "Defendants have no 'interest in the perpetuation of unlawful agency action." Op. 50 (quoting League of Women Voters of United States, v. Newby, 838 F.3d 1, 12 (D.C. Cir. 2016)). "Rather, there is a 'public interest in having governmental agencies abide by the federal laws that govern their existence and operations.'" Id. (quoting Washington v. Reno, 35 F.3d 1093, 1103 (6th Cir. 1994)). Moreover, "the public has an 'interest in stemming the flow of illegal immigration.'" Id. at 50 (citing United States v. Escobar, No. 2:17-CR-529, 2017 WL 5749620 at *2 (S.D. Tex. Nov. 28, 2017)). "And the public has interest in the enforcement of immigration laws, including Section 1225." Id. Defendants' arguments to the contrary lack merit.

First, Defendants suggest (at 20) that the balance of harms always favors the federal government in immigration cases. Not so. Texas and other States successfully challenged DAPA, and this Court properly refused to stay Judge Hanen's injunction. See Texas, 787 F.3d at 769. To be sure, when a federal court prevents the Executive Branch from enforcing the nation's immigration laws, a stay may be appropriate. For instance, "[t]here is always a public interest in prompt execution of removal orders." Nken v. Holder, 556 U.S. 418, 436 (2009). Thus, courts often stay injunctions that would have prevented the enforcement of immigration restrictions. See, e.g., Wolf v. Innovation L. Lab, 140 S. Ct. 1564 (2020); Innovation L. Lab v. McAleenan, 924 F.3d 503, 510 (9th Cir. 2019). But here, the federal government is violating, not enforcing, federal immigration law. E.g. Op. 42-44. "There is always a public interest in prompt" enforcement of the immigration laws. Nken, 556 U.S. at 436. But there is no public interest in abdicating statutory obligations. See Texas, 787 F.3d at 768.

Second, Defendants suggest that the district court's permanent injunction threatens the separation of powers, but the court simply ordered the relief authorized by Congress. See, e.g., id. at 45. In any event, the Executive Branch's "claims that the injunction offends separation of powers" goes to "the resolution of the case on the merits, not whether the injunction is stayed pending appeal." Texas, 787 F.3d at 767-68.

CONCLUSION

The Court should deny Defendants' motion.

Subject: RE: 2021 Prosecutors' Softball Challenge - Friday, August 20, 2021

All,
Tomorrow evening, the Missouri Attorney General's Office will play in a round-robin softball tournament against the Federal Public Defender's Office, St. Louis County Prosecutor's Office, U.S. Attorneys' Offices in the Eastern District of Missouri and Southern District of Illinois, and the St. Louis Circuit Attorney's Office.

Unfortunately, I have received a large amount of cancellations this afternoon. So, in order to avoid having to forfeit, I am once again putting out a call for people to play.

If you have not attended in the past, it is a great time in a relaxed atmosphere and a good opportunity to support the office and get to know your coworkers. We had a great turnout two years ago with players of all skill levels and spectators.

All are welcome to attend and cheer us on, but if you are interested in playing and have not already responded to me today, please let me know. Please email me separately without replying all, as this is being sent to the entire St. Louis. If not, no need to send regrets. If any Section Chiefs are able to help recruit, I would greatly appreciate it.

If you have any questions, there are more details below, or feel free to contact me directly. Thank you!

Happy Friday, everyone. A few updates. Apologies for all of the emails.

1. Softball Tournament is tentative at this point due to all of the rain and more expected this evening. The organizer is waiting to hear from the Parks Department as to whether we can play. I will send a follow-up email either way to let you all know. If we do play, please try to arrive by 4:00pm. We will have a first-round bye so I don't expect to play until 4:30pm, but there is a chance that some offices, perhaps those with a history of not showing up to court, may not show up to play, so we could play sooner.
2. If you ordered merchandise, it is available for pickup from Rachael Houser's office. Please go get it this morning or this afternoon.

Thanks!

All,
Tomorrow is the day! This casual event is open to both attorneys and support staff (so long as your schedule accommodates), and we would love to see as many people as possible come out. As of now, we have 11 people committed to playing, but we could definitely use more. So if you are on the fence, I urge you to come by even if you are in as bad of shape as I am currently. Especially if you identify as female, your presence would be greatly appreciated, as 4 females are required in the field at all times and the batting order must alternate men and women. If you have not already, please let me know if you are able to play!

If you have a ball glove or bat, please bring it with you. Parking is available in the park and also directly across Hampton on the side of Schnucks. I would encourage you to patronize the store if possible and put the receipt on your dashboard. Please do not park in the Walgreens lot.

If you ordered a t-shirt through the AGO Pop-Up Shop that Rachael Houser so graciously organized, those will arrive in the St. Louis office tomorrow morning after Rachael picks them up. If you did not order one, I would suggest wearing the blue AGO t-shirts we wore last time (pictured below) or any other shirt with a similar color.

There is a good possibility that it rains and storms tomorrow, unfortunately, so if the tournament is canceled, I will inform everyone as soon as I know, but I would still plan on playing at this point.

Any questions, please feel free to reach out!

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Friday, August 13, 2021 at 4:00pm, Wilmore Park (Hampton & Gravois, STL City) - Following last year's cancellation due to COVID, the Missouri Attorney General's Office will fight to defend its title against the likes of the Federal Public Defender's Office, St. Louis County Prosecutor's Office, U.S. Attorneys' Offices in the Eastern District of Missouri and Southern District of Illinois, and the St. Louis Circuit Attorney's Office in a round-robin softball tournament.

If you have not attended in the past, it is a great time in a relaxed atmosphere and a good opportunity to support the office and get to know your coworkers. We had a great turnout two years ago with players of all skill levels and spectators.

We will likely order new shirts this year featuring the logo above. More details to come about those from either myself or Rachael Houser, but please let either of us know if you are interested in one.

My apologies if you have already received an email about the tournament from either me or your section chief.

JURISDICTIONAL STATEMENT

This is an appeal in a workers' compensation case in which Patricia Otwell (hereinafter "Employee") settled her case with the Employer Chrysler and sought permanent total disability (hereinafter "PTD") from the Treasurer, State of Missouri, as Custodian of the Second Injury Fund (hereinafter "the Fund"). The claim arose when the Employee developed occupational injuries to her hands due to repetitive activity. The claim against the Employer Chrysler was settled. A hearing was held on March 6, 2019 with Administrative Law Judge (hereinafter "ALJ"), Joseph Denigan found in favor of Employee and against the Fund for Permanent Partial Disability (hereinafter "PPD") combining her hand injuries representing 33 per cent of a body, or 133.32 weeks with pre-existing conditions referable to incontinence of 2.5 percent of the body (10 weeks) and 15 percent of the right shoulder (34.8 weeks) on June 27, 2019. The Labor Industrial Relations Commission (hereinafter "Commission") affirmed the Award on December 30, 2020. Thereafter, Employee filed a Notice of Appeal on January 27, 2021.

The subject matter of this appeal does not concern any exclusive ground for jurisdiction with the Missouri Supreme Court in MO. Const. Art V, Section 3. The accident arose in Saint Louis County which lies within the territorial jurisdiction of this Court. Section 477.050 RSMo.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

Employee was born on May 25, 1958 (Tr.3). On the date of the hearing, she was 60 years-old and married to Tony Otwell. She previously had been married and divorced four times (T.3). She attended school to the 8th grade and later obtained a GED (T.4). At the age of 14 she married and began work as a waitress, then worked at Ryder International from 1980 to 1984 (T.5-6 & 7). In 1984 she was hired by Chrysler in Alabama to assemble and pack parts (T.8). The repetitive nature of the work led to physical problems and work restrictions for her right hand and shoulder and other body parts in 2003, 2007 and 2008 (T.92).

On March 6, 2003 she was picking up junction blocks when she developed burning sensation in her right arm and shoulder. She was seen by an orthopedic, Dr. Miller who diagnosed right shoulder tendonitis and ordered work restrictions of no lifting greater than one (1) pound, overhead or repetitive use of her right arm from April 25, 2003 to May 19, 2003. When she was released from care, she was removed from that job (T.11 & 95).

In 2005, Chrysler sold the Alabama Parts Plant and she moved to Chrysler in St. Louis (T.6). She was assigned to the Paint Department. There she used a sander, which vibrated and irritated both hands due to a strong torque that jerked her wrists (T.18). The torque was so forceful that she tied it to her right hand and held it with her left hand to sand (T.19). On October 6, 2005, she went to the Chrysler Clinic (hereinafter Clinic) with complaints in both shoulders, arms and hand numbness and tingling. She was given wrist supports, and medications and a Nerve Conduction Test was suggested (T.95-96). The Claimant sought private treatment for her neck, bilateral shoulders, arms and wrist/hands with Traci Lepper DC from October 5, 2005 to September of 2006 (T.20-21 and T.113-118). The Employee reported repetitive hand use in multiple jobs, using tools, clamps, clippers, power screwdriver (T.23-24). She drove a forklift and worked underneath a van with a powerful metal Ergo arm that placed screws overhead in elevated trucks and vans. The Employee's short stature required her to be on her tiptoes, the Ergo would jerk her up and down as she guided the arm. (T.22-26). While operating the Ergo arm in March, 2008 she was injured. Attorney Susan Roach filed a claim for injuries to her bladder (T.77). She had a sling suspension for stress incontinence October 21, 2008 and was released back to work with restrictions of no lifting greater than 10 lbs. for one month (T.37, 103 and 156-157).

Bilateral Carpal Tunnel and Medical Care

On February 4, 2009 the Employee reported bilateral pain, numbness and weakness in her hands at the Clinic (T.103-105). Chrysler's Plant physician, Dr. Malik ordered thyroid and diabetic testing and a nerve conduction velocity test (hereinafter "NCV") (T.103-104). She also saw Elaine Toon, her therapist, with suicidal ideation (hereinafter "SI") but no plan, feeling physically unwell and spoke of applying for disability. She reported mental and verbal abuse from her husband (T.202). On February 12, 2009 she reported to Toon symptoms of depression, increase anxiety related to health and severe pain in hands and the closing of Chrysler Plant. Dr. Phillips preformed a nerve conduction study (hereinafter "NCS") on February 10, 2009 (T. 106). It showed moderate sensory median neuropathy on the right wrist and mild medium neuropathy on the left wrist (T. 106 and 227- 229). On February 16, 2009 was seen for bilateral hand/wrist pain and had concerns about over the counter medication to control symptoms (T.106). She reported difficulty sleeping and taking Effexor and Wellbutrin for depression (T.106). She was started on Neurontin 300 mg. and Relafen 750 mg. and made aware that Neurontin could have a side effect of increasing depression (T.106). On February 18, 2009, the lab testing for thyroid and diabetic conditions were negative (T.107). She reported to Toon depression with SI, resulting from physical problems especially pain in her abdomen, hands and wrists (T.202). On February 23, 2009, Neurontin and Relafen were discontinued and she was prescribed Ultram 5 g. (T.107). Dr. Malik explained he could not take her off work for her carpal tunnel syndrome (hereinafter "CTS") and she should see her doctor for adjustment of hormonal therapy. He noted her complaints of hot flashes and an emotional demeanor (T.107).

On February 25, 2009, the Employee was admitted to Chrysler's Partial Day Hospital Program[1] (T.203). On March 4, 2009 Dr. German diagnosed bilateral carpal tunnel syndrome and gave her injections in both wrists. He suggested surgery if her symptoms did not improve (T.207).

Due to increase symptoms of depression, SI with a plan and homicide ideation (hereinafter "HI"), she was admitted March 23 to 27, 2009 to the hospital by psychiatrist Dr. Chilikamarri (T. 246-250). She was diagnosed with Major Depression, recurrent, severe without psychosis, PTSD and panic disorder. It was noted she had thoughts to shoot her boss, divorce issues and recurrent flashbacks of childhood physical abuse (T.306-310, 316-319). The Admission noted a history of prior suicide attempt at age 13 by overdosing with pills, and SI for many years (T.317).

Dr. German operated on her right wrist on April 4, 2009 and the left on April 17, 2009 (T.208, 217-218, 224-225). She was prescribed physical therapy on April 9, 2009 for 12 visits (T.221).

She saw Dr. Malik on April 9, 2009 reporting she was on sick leave for depression (T.108). Malik advised a job was available for her if she were not on sick leave (T.107).

Gary E. Meier P.T. exam on April 9, 2009 noted strength in her right wrist flexion, extensors and radial deviators was 3/5 and 3/5 at the ulnar deviators (T.213). Grip strength on the right was 4 lbs. and not tested on the left hand (T. 214).

Dr. German saw her on April 22, 2009, and deferred to Dr. Malik on work restrictions (T.216).

On May 1, 2009 Malik felt she had excellent healing and could be assigned to full duty work but for her sick leave status for mental health issues (T.108).

On May 20, 2009, PT Meier noted tenderness at the wrist and hypo-thenar eminence, decrease range of motion and weakness in her right wrist of 4/5 and left wrist 3/5 for flexors, extensors, ulnar and radial deviators. Her grip strength on the right was 22 lbs. and left 11 lbs. (T.213- 214).

On May 27, 2009, she complained of burning sensation and tingling radiating into her shoulder to German (T.208-209). He felt that her symptoms may relate to a hypersensitive nerve and should settle down. She told him she was moving back to Alabama where she has a good support system. She was to continue anti-inflammatories and gentle exercises (T.209). She saw Toon on May 27, 2009 for depression and anxiety arising from temporary housing and Chrysler closing down both plants and freezing all sick leaves (T.203). German saw her on June 24, 2009 and noted continued numbness and tingling in her palms, aching with cold weather, waking at night, increased symptoms when talking on phone, and inability to push a granddaughter on a swing (T.209). On exam he recorded 2-point sensation in left wrist of 4 mm, on right 5 mm. Her grip on left was 22 pounds and right 30 pounds.[2] (T.209). He advised her that despite the cold sensitivity, she did not yet have reflex dystrophy. He stated she was a stoic and very nervous person who had been through a lot. He encouraged her to use her hands as much as possible and take anti-inflammatories (T.209). He commented that she had a history of panic attacks and was essentially a nervous person (T.209).

She saw therapist Toon on June 24, 2009, and was depressed with SI and anxious about her future and application for disability as she felt she was unable to work. Toon noted that she was dealing with many past issues with soon to be ex-husband and daughter (T.203). She last saw Toon for depression and SI due to stress with changes in her life and inability to work (T.204).

German last saw her on September 14, 2009. She was still symptomatic with numbness and tingling. He did not test her grip strength. He wanted her to return in three (3) months, but since she had returned to live in Alabama, he released her (T.210).

At the hearing, Employee testified she was on medical leave for mental conditions beginning February 26 and attended Chrysler's stress day program. She did not recall returning to work at the plant except possibly a day or two (T.41). She felt she unable to work and accepted an offer to retire as the Plant was closing (T.6, 43). She has not worked since her retirement with the Employer, stating she had no qualifications for most jobs and could not use her hands (T.44). She applied for social security disability benefits (T.43). She testified that she had abdominal surgery to remove mesh following her retirement and this relieved some symptoms except incontinence (T.45).

Prior Psychiatric Illness

The Employee testified to symptoms of depression and anxiety dating from childhood from an abusive parent (T.5, 16). She testified that she was treated for "nerves" and severe depression by Dr. Cometa, PhD, and Drs. Isenberg and Calhoun (T.12, 15). Cometa took her off work on March 19-26, 2002, following a car accident that triggered an increase in symptoms (T.93, 110). The Employee kept copies of two letters given to her by Cometa (T.13). The Chrysler Clinic (hereinafter "Clinic") documents receipt of the letters from Cometa concerning her off work status (T.93). The Clinic records also note Employee was off work from March 15, 2002 to March 26, 2002 for depression (T.93).

The Employee testified to great difficulty performing her job due to physical problem causing her to be slow and anxious about her performance. She was referred to the Chrysler Stress Program and attended the 9:00 a.m. to 3:00 p.m. program daily instead of working (T.31-32). She first was admitted to the program on October 29 to November 20, 2007 (T.22, 98). Upon release, she continued with mental difficulties. Her supervisor, Tom Weston, sent her to the Clinic to be checked on her ability to work, as she was crying. At the Clinic she reported severe depression and anxiety stating she had been released from the stress program too soon and needed more treatment. She was driving a fork truck and stated "I am slow" (T.22, 31, 98).

At the Stress Program she came under the care of Dr. Chilikamarri and therapist Toon, LCS (T.34 and 36). She began treating privately with Toon on November 22, 2008 (T.195). She began treating privately with Chilikamarri upon admission to the Hospital on March 23, 2009.

The Employee participated in the Stress Program February 26, 2009 to March 23, 2009 (T.34–35, 98, 203). She was admitted to the Hospital on March 23, 2009 to March 27, 2009 for psychosis, SI with a plan, HI and severe depression (T.319, 338). Chilikamarri's admission notes reported a prior suicide attempt with overdose of pills at age 13 (T.304).

The Employee treated with therapist Toon, privately from December 15, 2007 to July 31, 2009 (T.35, 194-204). Toon's records reflect a lifelong depression, anxiety, daily SI, childhood neglect and abuse. Toon's diagnosis: Major Depression, recurrent, PTSD and Generalized Anxiety Disorder with gambling addiction (T.195). Toon documents the Employee's SI in 11 out of 19 visits, prior to the primary claim (T.196-202). On December 6, 2008 and January 8 and 9 of 2009, Toon notes severe depression, anxiety with SI related to her health and her husband's mental/verbal abuse and suggests a Partial Day Hospital program. The Employee declined (T.201-202). She eventually enters the Partial Day program on February 25, 2009 (T.203).

The Employee treated with her primary care physician, Dr. Pope on October 16, 2007:

> … reports also s/a. Physical/emotional abuse as a child. Raised in very abusive environment, was in counseling on Paxil, took Wellbutrin, Paxil and Klonopin…. Depressed, transient thoughts of self-harm, husband is ETOH abuser" (T.133).

His records also reflect problems with sleeping, migraine headaches, depression/mood changes, chronic stress, moderate anxiety (T.45-46, 121, 125, 133). On January 12, 2008 she was stable and her depression was chronic and moderate in severity (T.129 -130).

At the Hearing, the Employee became upset twice :

> It did begin in my childhood because I did not have a normal childhood at all. I – there was always fear and dread. I never knew what was going to happen to me. As a small child, at 13, I was sleeping on the back porch, it was screened in. And in the middle of the night, daddy woke me up dragging mother in there and saying, look at you whore, look at you whore. I didn't know what a whore was. And he drugged me out of the bed and beat me. There was days we did not have food. One time, all we had was some flour and the weasels had gotten in it and mother, mother strained it and we – that's what we had. And I always wanted to work because I knew I had to – and I had my children. And I wanted them to be able to have a better life. I tried my best to raise them right. I'm sorry, it's just real painful.

Q. No, it's fine. I don't want to get you too upset. We'll kind of, just going to switch gears a little bit. I just want to get – take your time.

A. It just hurts me to go through it and talk about it. It's like I relive it. (T.16-17)

Later in the hearing while speaking about her difficulty working, she stated she felt like she was having a panic attack (T.22).

Prior Relevant Medical History

Following the injury to her bladder in March of 2008, Dr. Hugge suggested surgery (T.158, 160). She also was found to have a hernia (T.133-135, 137- 39, 150). She underwent a sling bladder surgery and hernia repair on October 21, 2008 (T.188-192). Following surgery, she was restricted to no lifting, pushing or pulling greater than 10 pounds (T.103). Post -surgery she continued to have pain, bleeding and incontinence (T.382). She was laid off October 31, 2008 to January 20, 2009 (T.103). She underwent removal of infected mesh with Dr. Veronikis on July 20, 2009 (T.44-45, 384). Her bleeding and pain stopped, but she continued to have incontinence (T.45). She felt her supervisors were irritated with her because she was too short, slow, weak and cried, which slowed the lines down (T.47).

Deposition of David Volarich, D.O.

Dr. Volarich is board certified in nuclear medicine (diagnostic imaging), occupational medicine, and independent medical examiner (T.485). Volarich examined the Employee on September 13, 2018 (T.487). She reported the 2008 injuries of repetitive pulling and pushing caused ongoing incontinence and genitourinary pain requiring her to use the restroom frequently (T.503). She reported extreme weakness in her hands and diminished sensation which caused great difficulty caring for her hair, manipulating buttons and zippers, driving, food preparation, and various household chores (T.503, 505). She reported persistent symptoms from her right shoulder strain injury in 2004 that caused limitations and pain with reaching, lifting, pushing and pulling. She reported these problems slowed down her work pace and she took Tylenol for pain (T.505-506).

On exam of her shoulder there was a 10% loss of motion, moderately positive impingement, trace crepitus with abduction and 1/5 atrophy or mild atrophy of the deltoid nerve to the cuff (T.506). On the hand/wrists exam, she had a positive Compression Provocative test over both carpal tunnels and a three-centimeter scar at each wrist. She was not able to grab the grip on the Jaymar device of the left hand at all. On the right hand she barely registered 3-foot pounds at setting number two, and 2-foot pounds at setting number 3, which represented very poor strength (T.508-509). He found the pinch testing was 4, 3 and 3 on the right, and all 4s on the left. The 2-point discrimination normally should be 4 mm or less, 5 mm is a gray zone and 6 or more is abnormal. His examination of Ms. Otwell showed on the right hand 2-point discrimination from thumb to little finger was 8, 7, 5, 5 and 6, on the left hand it was 6, 5, 5 and 4. She also had sensory loss on the right hand, severe, and the left hand, moderate (T.509).

Volarich diagnosed 1) stress incontinence; 2) occupational conditions of overuse syndrome of right and left upper extremity causing median nerve entrapment at the wrist or carpal tunnel syndrome, status post open carpal tunnel release (T.509-510). He also found pre-existing conditions due to right shoulder sprain/strain with residual rotator cuff tendonitis and shoulder bursitis (T.510). He felt the stress incontinence resulted in 2.5 percent permanent partial disability (hereafter "PPD") to the body as a whole and 20 PPD disability for both wrists, due continued discomfort, paresthesia and weakness (T.512-513). He did not perform a mental examination (T.510).

Volarich stated the 20% PPD of the right shoulder was due to chronic strain syndrome, rotator cuff tendinitis and bursitis which caused loss of motion, crepitus and difficulties using her right arm away from her body and overhead. He found her incontinence, right shoulder and bilateral hand/wrist conditions created hindrances and obstacles to employment or re-employment (T.514). He also testified as to the synergistic combination between the right shoulder symptoms and the residual carpal tunnel syndrome problems. He noted that he discussed this with the Claimant who reported manipulating objects with her hands were more difficult, especially if she was working overhead or had to manipulate objects away from her body. The interplay between her injuries and medical conditions made it more difficult for her to function sufficiently at work and home. She had not described synergy because of the urinary incontinence, other than the fact that she had to go to the bathroom frequently which interrupted the work production (T.515-516).

He testified that the disabilities arising from her hands, incontinence and shoulder combined, and a loading factor should be considered. He reviewed both vocational expert Lalk's and Dr. Sky's reports (T.499). He reviewed medical records from her psychiatrist Chilikamarri, and Dr. Pope, noting her medications for psychiatric conditions of Cymbalta and Klonopin (T.510-511). He concluded, based on his evaluation of the medical records, his exam and findings and Lalk's vocational assessment, that he could not identify a job for which she could return to work (T.499). He found she was permanently and totally disabled primarily because of the combined pre-existing physical and psychiatric disorders and the conditions of her hands (T.517). Dr. Volarich felt she had a psychiatric condition, but deferred to psychiatry for that assessment (T.514-515). He restricted her to minor repetitive gripping, pinching, squeezing, pulling, pushing, twisting and rotating motions and similar tasks as needed, recommended she avoid impact vibratory trauma to the arms and use appropriate braces, anti-vibration gloves and support straps, and not handle weights greater than two to three pounds with either upper extremity. He thought she could handle weights to tolerance with her arms close to her body, but recommended no more than 10 lbs. He deferred to a urologist or gynecologist for limitations from the incontinence. On cross examination he was asked if he relied on the reports of Dr. Poetz and Dr. Shuter, both deceased, at the time of his examination, in coming to his conclusions regarding her disability. He testified he did not rely on opinions from Poetz or Shuter (T.520-521). He noted that the Employee had difficulty communicating due to psychiatric problems that interfered with her train of thought conveying incomplete and conflicting information (T.504).

Deposition of Adam Sky M.D. DFAPA

Dr. Adam Sky is a medical doctor and board-certified in Psychiatry and Neurology with added qualification in Geriatric Psychiatry (T.459). No objections were made at the time of the hearing to admission of the Deposition and Exhibits 1 – 4 into evidence (T.52). Dr. Sky examined the Employee on May 15, 2017 (T.403, 464). She reported both physical and mental problems (T.406-407). She gave a history of past medical treatment for mental illness, describing a long history of depression going back to when she was a child. He noted that she reported a suicide attempt when she was 13 (documented by Dr. Chilikamarri in the admission records). She sought mental health treatment with Dr. Cometa and a psychiatrist, Dr. Calhoun, in Alabama beginning in 1990 (T.407). In St. Louis, she began seeing Dr. Chilikamarri through the Chrysler's Stress Day Program who treated while in the program beginning in 2007. She came to St. Louis in 2005 (T.407-408). Dr. Sky knew Dr. Chilikamarri and commented that his notes are difficult to read. Chilikamarri notes suggested she had a diagnosis of depression and he had tried her on several antidepressants (T.408-409). He also reviewed Daimler-Chrysler Medical Clinic's and psychologist Elaine Toon's treatment records (T.409-410). On December 15, 2017 Elaine Toon diagnosed Ms. Otwell with major depression, anxiety, post-traumatic stress disorder, as well as a gambling condition (T.195, 410). Dr. Sky noted Ms. Otwell's current medication included a very high dose of the antidepressant Cymbalta, and Rexulti, a mood stabilizer, used to augment the effects of the antidepressant. Other medications were for high blood pressure, glaucoma, and chronic headaches (T.411). She gave a history of a difficult childhood, the middle of five (5) children. Her family was poor, and her father was both physically and verbally abusive (T.412). She declined discussing past sexual abuse. Dr. Sky commented that this was not an uncommon response to a first-time interview. As a result of the difficulties at home, she had a suicide attempt at age 13. She did not run away, but she ended up getting married and dropping out of school after 8th grade at the age of 14 (T.412). She had a series of marriages that ended in divorce. The final marriage lasted barely a year. One of the gentlemen she married was an alcoholic, mean and abusive (T.413).

Dr. Sky reported her history of working at Chrysler and the various jobs she had as well as physical problems that interfered with her job from the need for a hysterectomy, urinary stress incontinence and her upper extremity problems, especially with her hands (T.414-415). Dr. Sky had many patients from the Chrysler plant and the plant physician invited him and others to tour the plant which he found very helpful providing insight into the different positions all the Employees had (T.414).

Dr. Sky conducted a mental status exam of the Employee (T.416). He felt she was alert, appeared her listed age, and was cooperative, but tearful throughout the interview (T.417). She did have symptoms of anhedonia, or the absence of pleasure, which he felt was the cardinal symptom of depression (T.417). She endorsed feelings of hopelessness and helplessness, consistent with a depression diagnosis. Reported poor sleep, waking early, consistent with depression. She had put on weight (T.418). She currently denied suicidal/homicidal ideation, but she had them previously. He tested her with the Montgomery-Asberg Depression Rating Scale which was consistent with moderate to severe depression and anxiety with the Hamilton Anxiety rating scale (HAM-A), which showed moderate to severe anxiety (T.418-419, 470- 473). Finally, he conducted screening for Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder, the PCL-5, for which she scored 47, consistent with severe Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder (T.420, 474-476). Dr. Sky diagnosed Major Depression Disorder, moderate to severe and recurrent (T.420); generalized anxiety disorder based on her symptoms of a lot of complaints, worries, anticipation of the worst, fearful anticipation, feelings of tension, startled response, restlessness, inability to relax (T.423); and Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder he related to her childhood experiences which continued to produce symptoms (T.424). He concluded there was a lot of overlap between Depression, Anxiety and Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder from her childhood abuse (T.424). He felt the gambling addiction was no longer a factor (T.424-425).

He testified that based on the records he had reviewed and the mental evaluation he conducted, her pre-existing psychiatric disability represented a 35% permanent partial disability based on the body as a whole. This pre-existing mental disability combined and synergistically worsened with the occupational conditions to her hands, making her permanently totally disabled and unable to compete in the open labor market (100%) (T.426-427). He testified the Employee would not be capable of working in any job that required focus, concentration or pace, with special concern on her ability to follow safety guidelines and with production quotas (T.431-432). Sky further concluded her pre-existing mental conditions combined with the problems from incontinence and her bilateral carpal tunnel, to render her unable to compete in the open labor market (T.434).

Sky testify that he regularly treats people who are working and provides restrictions on work activities (T.428-429). Sky concluded that Employee's pre-existing psychiatric condition was a significant hindrance to gainful employment prior to the primary claim. He found that the combination of her mental and difficulties with her hands created a complete obstacle and hindrance to gainful employment in the open labor market (T.468). He testified that someone with a history of depression, anxiety and PTSD, in a work environment where they are required to work with accuracy, with speed and where shutting down the line is a very big deal, would make the individual's anxiety and mental conditions worse. (T.432). Sky indicated that his review of the Clinic records supported the history of depression/anxiety prior to the primary claim (T.433, 434).

On cross examination, Sky agreed that he could not give an exact start date of when her symptoms of depression/anxiety occurred (T.439-440). On redirect, he agreed that the history he was given which coincided with the history that appeared in the medical records, was that it dates to childhood and was chronic (T.442). He reviewed the Clinic records showed a March 26, 2002 diagnosis of clinical depression and anxiety, as well as copious documentation that she was on antidepressants (T.443). He noted she had been on leave of absence/stress classes in 2007, and the records reflect that she was on a very substantial antidepressant, Venlafaxine, in 2007 (T.444). He found the 2007 records of Toon, the counselor, documented Employee's SI, feelings of overwhelmed anxiousness and attendance at a partial hospital day program sponsored by Chrysler prior to the primary claim (T.446-449). He opined Employee's depression was tied into many things that happened dating back to her abusive childhood. (T.450) He noted that she had been on numerous anti depression medications for many years prior to the primary claim (T.451).

On re-cross Sky was asked about Employee's inconsistencies regarding doctors and dates (T.437). He found those were not significant a frequent issue with patients (T.452). Dr. Sky testified it was his conclusion Employee was not that he did not 100% disabled prior to the primary claim (T.453-454).

In a supplemental report dated November 16, 2018, Sky reviewed Lalk's August 4, 2017 report and found Lalk's conclusions on employability concurred with his conclusions (T.477). Sky also reviewed Clinic records, Cometa's two letters and Volarich's report, which did not change any of his prior conclusions regarding the Employee's mental evaluation as set forth in his report of May 15, 2018 (T.478).
He noted that a psychiatric condition could get worse over time and also could be made worse by an external event, like a physical injury or medical illness (T. 454).

Timothy Lalk Vocational Rehabilitation Counselor

Lalk, a certified vocational rehabilitation counselor, interviewed the Employee on July 15, 2014 at the request of Ms. Otwell's attorney Susan Roach, who was representing her in a 2008 claim for urinary incontinence (T.593). At the time of the request from Ms. Roach he was not provided with any information regarding injuries from work (T.594-595). He requested additional records from Ms. Roach following the interview, but never received the additional records (T.594). Additional records were provided to Mr. Lalk by Nancy Mogab, including reports of Dr. Volarich and Dr. Sky prior to the issuance of his report dated August 4, 2017 (T.641–642, 647).

During the Employee's interview, Mr. Lalk noted that she was cooperating, but did cry frequently and seemed quite distressed. He commented that her crying did interfere with her answering questions (T.596-597). He opined her ability to communicate, however was not because of reluctance to tell him things. He felt it was due to difficulty forming ideas, collecting thoughts and organizing her thoughts (T. 596-597). He gave her the Wide Range Achievement Test, Revision 3. Reading and arithmetic showed she was at fifth-grade level reading, and sixth grade in arithmetic. He noted the reading is scored only if the person correctly pronounces the word but does not evaluate comprehension of the words (T.626). The Adult Basic Learning Examination, Level 2, showed a post-high school level, indicating she could glean meaning by context in reading (T.626). Mr. Lalk concluded after his interview, testing and review of the medical evidence, that she was not able to compete, secure and maintain employment in the open labor market. He concluded she could do unskilled sedentary or near sedentary position with access to a restroom on an as needed basis (T.630). He felt the primary inability to work arose due to psychiatric conditions that involved contact with coworkers, supervisors and the public (T.629 -630, 651). He opined the psychiatric problems had prevented her from certain types of work in the past and currently and referenced medical records of depression and anxiety prior to her 2008 bladder incident (T.630-631). Her psychiatric symptoms were likely to increase during events and interfere with various kinds of work and social activities prior to both the 2008 bladder injury, and the 2009 diagnosis of bilateral carpal tunnel syndrome, and after these claims (T.652). He opined that her ability to work in the future was dependent on whether her psychiatric symptoms changed (T.633). Lalk had unique experience working with adults suffering from mental conditions at the Independence Center, St. Louis (T.677).[3]

On cross, Lalk was asked if he "relied" on Dr Shuter's August 4, 2017 report (T.634 & 684). "Relied" was defined as "reviewed, read, looked at and then subsequently came to your conclusions because of the reviewing, reading and looking at those things" (T.634). Mr. Lalk answered yes, based on that definition. Lalk affirmed he did not have the start date of Employee's mental symptoms (T.639, 640).

On redirect, Lalk addressed Volarich's restrictions concluding the extreme weakness in the Employee's hands would prevent her from doing any kind of assembly work and packaging, leaving only jobs which would primarily require her to interact with customers, co-workers, etc. and for which due to her psychiatric problems, would not be able to perform (T.647-648).

ALJ's Award

The ALJ awarded PPD of 32.52 weeks against the Fund for a combination from her hands and pre-existing conditions right shoulder and incontinence (L.F.61). He found she was likely PTD only after considering unrelated post-primary injury progression of psychiatric conditions (L.F.61). The ALJ found that §287.190.6(2) RSMo. (2016) required Volarich or Sky to certify that the Employee is PTD (L.F.59). The ALJ cited

Volarich's failure to describe any combination of the Claimant's incontinence with her hands, and that he only found her PTD after considering Lalk's assessment (L.F.59).

The ALJ opined the primary settlement amount did not reflect a severe condition of PPD from which to find a PTD combination (L.F.59-60). He thought the medical records did not eliminate all employment, only those with heavy lifting or repetitive arm work (L.F.60). He felt Otwell could perform sedentary or retail work as she was ambulatory, could drive, manage her personal needs, had no domestic help. He concluded that this was substantial evidence that the Claimant's permanent injury is partial not total (L.F.60).

The ALJ found no evidence that her psychiatric disability was causally related to the work incident, as the claimant's appearance at trial was normal and lacking in any demeanor suggestive of anger or sadness (L.F.60). He further found no medical or lay evidence corroborated a severe depression or suicidal ideations prior to 2009 and she was not credible. Specifically, her single reference she felt suicidal "was not supported by any evidence that she had previously been hospitalized or treated for her assertion that she felt suicidal" (L.F.60). He found Sky's conclusions of a pre-existing psychiatric condition was based only on Otwell's anecdotal recollection or Dr. Chilikamarri's history, who treated her post injury" (L.F. 60). He found no objective pre-claim evidence of psychiatric disability, and Sky's analysis and testimony as simply unpersuasive and not enough to impose PTD liability against the SIF (L.F.61).

Fund introduced no evidence. The Fund objected to admissibility of Cometa's letters as they were not certified (L.F..50-51). The ALJ found the letters were not medical records, sustained the objection and excluded the letters (L.F. 57).

The Fund objected to Volarich's deposition, on the basis he relied on Dr. Shuter's report (L.F.52). The ALJ apparently overruled the objection on that basis.

The Fund objected to Lalk's deposition on the basis he relied on Shuter's report (L.F.53). The ALJ noted Lalk detailed Shuter's report twice and expressly admitted he relied on it in forming his own conclusions (L.F.56, T. 684, 696). Lalk did not have Poetz's report as evidenced by his testimony (T.642-643). The ALJ excluded Lalk's entire deposition testimony based on hearsay (L.F. 56).

The ALJ on his own, and without a raised objection by the Fund, excluded portions of Volarich's deposition that concurred with Lalk's assessment Employee was PTD because of her psychiatric disorders and combined hand injuries (L.F.57). The ALJ found that Volarich's report only mentioned Employee's chronic psychiatric illness once (L.F.57). He further found Volarich did not review any psychiatric medical records (L.F.56).

The ALJ highlighted, but did not overrule, a seven-day rule objection to Sky's testimony that incorporated Employee's incontinence as combining with other pre-existing conditions and the hand injuries to render the claimant PTD. The objection was not raised at the hearing by the Fund (T.52).

Labor and Industrial Relations Commission Award

In a 2-1 decision, the Commission affirmed the ALJ decision with a Supplemental Opinion. They corrected the ALJ's mistakes that the primary injury was to her hands and not her back and that the award for future medical was also a mistake (L.F.45). The Commission adopted the ALJ's evidentiary rulings and found no abuse of discretion (LF.45).

The Commission noted the ALJ's personal observations:

> Employee's demeanor as normal, not angry or sad; that she had domestic issues throughout adulthood which impacted her psychological condition; credibility was questioned as to a severe psychiatric condition, due to no records of hospitalization or treatment that corroborated her claim of suicidal thoughts predating the primary injury (LF.45).

The Commission agreed Employee chose to retire due to life factors impacting that decision aside from the level of disability she was experiencing (LF.47).

The Commission agreed Employee's psychological conditions were not proven as disabling at the time of the primary claim and felt she had post-injury worsening of her psychiatric and bladder conditions. (LF.48).

The Commission found Fund liability based on the synergistic effect of the pre-existing incontinence issue and the right shoulder injury with the primary carpal tunnel injuries amounting to 32.52 weeks of PPD based on the disability ratings found of the ALJ and his loading of a 33 1/3% load factor (L.F.48).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Commissioner Curls filed a dissenting opinion that argued evidence supported a disabling pre-existing psychiatric condition that combined with the primary injury (L.F.49). She found the ALJ's decision to exclude of the entire deposition of Lalk was an abuse of discretion as Lalk examined many different admissible sources in coming to his conclusion (LF. 49).

She would admit the Cometa letters in conjunction with the Employee's testimony recalling her encounter with Cometa (LF. 50).

She would reverse the excluded portions of Volarich's testimony that referenced Lalk's testimony as he did not rely on Lalk's conclusions (L.F. 50).

She concluded that the ALJ's credibility finding to Sky's testimony regarding pre-existing psychiatric illness were not substantiated, and she would give greater weight to Sky's testimony (LF. 50)

Finally she finds that the records from the Clinic, Toon's records from 2007 to 2009, admissions to Chrysler's stress day program on multiple occasions prior to February 10, 2009, Sky's diagnosis of PTSD, major depressive disorder, recurrent and generalized anxiety disorder, support a finding of a pre-existing psychological disorder in the range of 20-35% body as a whole, which created an obstacle and hindrance to obtaining and maintaining employment which synergistically combined with her primary injury, right shoulder, incontinence to be greater than a 33 1/3% load, but short of permanent total disability (L.F. 51).

POINTS RELIED ON

I.

The Commission misapplied the law when it ruled to exclude the entire deposition of Lalk based on a finding that the testimony relied on an inadmissible report of Dr. Shuter when substantial evidence shows that Shuter did not express an opinion on employability or PTD and exclusion of Lalk's testimony is an abuse of discretion when the testimony was unimpeached by contrary evidence from the Fund and does not demonstrate that Lalk was acting as a conduit for Shuter's conclusions on PTD as there is no evidence Shuter's report discussed PTD.

The Commission misapplied the law in excluding Dr. Volarich's testimony that concurred with Lalk's assessment that the Employee was PTD as there was no objection timely made on this issue, Volarich did not rely only stated they concurred on this issue, and Volarich did review psychiatric records so the exclusion of Volarich's conclusions on PTD is an abuse of discretion and should be reversed.

The Commission misapplied the law in finding require symptoms of psychiatric condition pre-existed and that there likely was only post injury worsening as psychiatric issues are complex and not within the understanding of lay understanding and here the Commission improperly disregarded competent, substantial and expert evidence and relied on lay conjecture and opinion unsupported by sufficient evidence and there is no requirement that a pre-existing condition be symptomatic.

ARGUMENT

I.

The Commission misapplied the law when it ruled to exclude the entire deposition of Lalk based on a finding that the testimony relied on an inadmissible report of Dr. Shuter when substantial evidence shows that Shuter did not express an opinion on employability or PTD and exclusion of Lalk's testimony is an abuse of discretion when the testimony was unimpeached by contrary evidence from the Fund and does not demonstrate that Lalk was acting as a conduit for Shuter's conclusions on PTD as there is no evidence Shuter's report discussed PTD.

Standard of Review

The Commission's factual findings are binding and conclusive to the extent they are supported by sufficient competent evidence and were reached in the absence of fraud. Archer v. City of Cameron, 460 S.W.3d 775, 778 (Mo. banc 2014). However, "this Court reviews decisions of the Commission which are clearly interpretations or applications of law for correctness without deference to the Commission's judgment." M*otton v. Outsource Intern.*, 77 S.W.3d 669, 672 (Mo.App.E.D. 2002) (quoting West v. Posten Const. Co., 804 S.W.3d 743, 744 (Mo. banc 1991). Said review of issues of Law is de novo. *Scholastic, Inc. v. as adopted by the Commission. Cardwell v. Treasurer of the State of Missouri, 249 S.W.3d 902, 906 (Mo.App.E.D. 2008).

Argument

Lalk examined Employee at the request of Susan Roach for her 2008 injury to her bladder July 15, 2014 (T.593-594). Following the evaluation, he contacted Roach for additional medical records but never received a response (T.595). Later Employee's current counsel, provided medical records to complete the evaluation.

At Lalk's deposition, the Fund asked if he "relied" on the summary of Shuter's March 3, 2012 in coming to his conclusions that Employee was PTD (T.634). Based on the Fund's definition of "rely," Lalk said yes.

The Commission found Lalk detailed Shuter's comprehensive rating report at two places in his "Review" portion and, later in the report, under "Functional Restrictions/Limitations" just preceding Summary and Conclusions (L.F. 56). He further found because, Lalk expressly admitted he relied on Shuter's findings in forming his own conclusions, he excluded the entire deposition from evidence based on hearsay. Bruflat v. Mister Guy, Inc., 933 S.W.2d 829, 833 (Mo.App. 1996) (L.F. 22).

In the Bruflat case the Commission excluded portions of a medical expert testimony concerning disability that reflected reliance on an inadmissible report of a psychologist. The court noted that the testimony as to the amount of disability did not rely solely on facts outside the inadmissible opinion of the psychologist but instead totally deferred to the opinion of another expert as to disability. Id at 834. The court held that a testifying expert cannot be a mere conduit for another non-testifying expert and agreed that the Commission's order to exclude that portion of the medical expert's opinion that parroted the inadmissible medical expert opinion was not an abuse of discretion.

A fair review of Lalk's testimony shows that it was Sky's limitations from her mental conditions that led to his conclusion that she was unable to compete in the open labor market and unemployable:

> .....Now what was important to me is a psychiatrist to comment about prognosis and/or any restrictions for the individual or at least a discussion of what he thought would be difficult for an individual to do, and he indicated that because of her psychiatric condition, that she would have poor focus, concentration and attention and would be very difficult for her to follow both simple as well as complex instructions. It would be very difficult for her to adapt to both routine as well as more complex work changes, as well as perform repetitive work according to set procedures, sequences or pace, and he expected her to respond inappropriately to the customer pressures at work and have difficulty with production quotas as well as interactions with co-workers and supervisors. So that would indicate to me that the types of work environment that she needs to avoid (T.613).

Lalk's summaries of Shuter's report references only medical causation, PPD ratings of both wrists and the existence of pre-existing medical conditions that were hindrances or obstacles to obtaining employment (T.685, 694). Lalk's summaries cite no opinion from Dr. Shuter commenting on the Employee's PTD status.

In Garrett v. Treasurer, 215 S.W.3d 244, 249 (Mo.App.S.D. 2007), the court cited §490.065, RSMo., which provides that an expert opinion based on another expert's opinion is not necessarily inadmissible. The record here does not support that Lalk "parroted" opinions of Shuter. To the contrary Lalk's 3+ hour interview, testing and review of admissible medical evidence clearly provided the basis for his opinion that the Employee was not able to compete, secure and maintain employment in the open labor market (T.630). Lalk testified that physically the Employee could perform in an unskilled, sedentary or near sedentary position, if she had access to a restroom. He concluded that her primary reason that prevented her from employment is due to her pre-existing psychiatric conditions that would affect her concentration, pace and place her near co-workers or the public giving rise to increase in her psychiatric conditions (T.630). He cited Dr. Sky's diagnosis of severe recurrent depression, anxiety disorder and PTSD that damaged the Employee's focus, concentration and attention for other types of work. He concluded she would be ineffective with both routine, complex and repetitive work and difficulty responding to the customer pressures, production quotas and interactions with co-workers and supervisors (T.613). Lalk has expert experience in placing individuals with mental conditions having worked at the Independence Center in St. Louis which placed individuals with mental conditions in jobs (T.585-586). Lalk's conclusions regarding employability did not parrot what he cited by Shuter. Information about the Employee's physical limitations from Dr. German, physical therapist Meier, and later Dr. Volarich all document the extreme weakness in her hands that eliminated her past unskilled work. Lalk's report written prior to Dr. Shuter's death that may have consider physical difficulties in employability cannot be removed from that report. But he again reviewed the additional information from Dr. Volarich which supported the weaknesses documented by the physical therapist Greg Meier in May as 22 lbs. on right and 11 lbs. on left (T.214). Dr. German on June 24, 2009 found 30 lbs. on right and 22 lbs. on left (T.209). Both significantly below normal findings. Dr. German does not measure her grip strength on his last visit, but notes she is still symptomatic and would like for her to return and does not release her to work, only to use her hands as much as possible (T.209).

The Commission's exclusion of Lalk's entire deposition is an abuse of discretion as the minor references to Shuter's findings did not comment on employability. Lalk's analysis was based on review of multiple admissible records, his experience and expertise, testing he performed and the age, education and work experience of the Employee. He has unique expertise from his work at the Independent Center, St. Louis, in assessing the employability of individuals who suffer from mental conditions.

II.

The Commission misapplied the law in excluding Dr. Volarich's testimony that concurred with Lalk's assessment that the Employee was PTD as there was no objection timely made on this issue, Volarich did not rely only stated they concurred on this issue, and Volarich did review psychiatric records so the exclusion of Volarich's conclusions on PTD is an abuse of discretion and should be reversed.

Treasurer of the State of Missouri,* 249 S.W.3d 902, 906 (Mo.App.E.D. 2008).

Argument

The Commission adopted the evidentiary decisions of the ALJ who on his own and without an objection raised by the Fund, excluded portions of Dr. Volarich's opinion that specifically referenced Lalk's assessment that the Employee was permanently and totally disabled in large part due to her psychiatric disorders (T.52). At the Hearing, the Fund only objected to any portion of Volarich's report that referenced reliance on Shuter's opinion (T.52). Volarich's deposition was submitted without an objection regarding Lalk's testimony and as such is admissible in this instance as he only concurred

and did not rely on Lalk's testimony (T.517). Nichols v. Belleview R-IIII School District, 528 S.W.3d 918, 930 (Mo.App.S.D. 2017); Proffer v. Federal Mogul Corp., 341 S.W.3d 184, 187 (Mo.App.S.D. 2011). Adequacy of the factual or scientific foundation for expert opinion is an admissibility issue which is waived absent a timely objection or motion to strike. Proffer, 341 S.W.3d at 187. Expert testimony, admitted without objection, can be considered as any other evidence in determining the submissibility of the case. Id.

As stated in Point I, there is no evidence that Shuter had opined that the Employee was PTD. Volarich testified he reviewed a great deal of medical records and reports, but came to his own conclusions regarding his assessments of the Employee's conditions (T.520-521). Finally he never said he relied on Lalk's testimony on employability:

> Based on my evaluation, review of the medical records and review of the vocational assessment that was completed on 8/4/17 by Mr. Lalk, vocational assessment could not identify a job for which she could return to, I thought that she was permanently and totally disabled primarily as a result of her psychiatric disorders, I concurred with that assessment (T.517).

The Commission's second proffered basis for excluding Volarich's testimony on employability was a finding that Volarich had failed to review any medical evidence regarding her treatment for psychiatric conditions in forming his conclusion (L.F.56). The ALJ found only one reference in Volarich's report that referenced the Employee's chronic psychiatric illness (L.F.56). This overlooks Volarich's testimony that he did review Lalk's and Sky's reports (T.499); records of Psychiatrist Chilikamarri and treatment records of Dr. Pope. Volarich also noted her medications for psychiatric conditions (T.510-511). He also reviewed the Chrysler Clinic records which provided references of treatment for mental conditions. He noticed and commented on her psychiatric problems that affected her ability to communicate to him at the evaluation (T.503-504). He testified that he felt she had a psychiatric disability but deferred to psychiatry for that assessment. Clearly the Commission has the authority and function to determine factual findings and credibility of witnesses and the weight to be given to their testimony. Cook v. Missouri Highway & Transp. Comm'n, 500 S.W.3d 917, 923 (Mo.App.S.D. 2016). However, here the Commission's determination that Volarich testified he relied on Lalk's opinion for employability is not present as that is not a correct statement of his testimony. The conclusion he reviewed no psychiatric records is also contrary to his testimony. The Commission's decision to exclude is not based on substantial evidence that supports the exclusion of a portion of Volarich's testimony that concerned his conclusion that she is PTD because of combined conditions from her pre-existing physical and psychiatric conditions and the primary injury to her hands.

III.

The Commission misapplied the law in requiring symptoms of a pre-existing psychiatric condition for a PTD finding as it is not required and in failing to find "actual and measurable" conditions for PPD as psychiatric conditions are complex and the Commission improperly disregarded competent substantial expert evidence and erroneously relied on lay conjecture and opinion.

Standard of Review

The Commission's factual findings are binding and conclusive to the extent they are supported by sufficient competent evidence and were reached in the absence of fraud. Archer v. City of Cameron, 460 S.W.3d 775, 778 (Mo. banc 2014). Argument

The Commission found there was no pre-existing psychiatric condition only post claim worsening. They outline their reasons to disregard expert testimony and rely on their lay opinion as follows:

1. Sky relied on inadmissible evidence, two letters from Cometa (L.F.61).
2. ALJ found a "timely" objection in Sky's deposition testimony that characterized the Cometa letters as "records" was "misleading to the reader" and weighed against Sky's opinion (LF.57, 407).
3. No medical records from Chilikamarri pre- accident to review (LF.57).
4. Sky admitted he did not review the records from the Employee's hospitalization in March 23-27, 2009, at St Anthony's Hospital (LF.57).
5. Lack of treating records for mental conditions prior to 2009, except for Pope, who was not a psychiatrist and who noted "undeveloped references to "mild distress" and "mood disorder" (LF.58).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT
MO-AG-22-0644-A-003259
Electronically Filed - EASTERN DISTRICT CT OF APPEALS - June 04, 2021 - 03:47 PM

6. Sky's opinion relied only on anecdotal evidence from the Employee (LF.58).

7. The ALJ observed the Employee's demeanor at trial as normal, not suggestive of anger or sadness. He mentioned her domestic issues throughout adulthood as impacting her psychological condition. He further found the Employee's single reference that she felt "suicidal" was not credible when there were no pre-claim hospitalization or treatment records corroborate this assertion (LF 46, 60)

8. Therapist Toon treated Employee from 2008-2009 for difficulties dealing with personal, family and martial illness (LF.46).

9. Employee attended a part-time day clinic for stress in late February 2009 (LF.46).

10. The Employee's mental conditions got worse post primary injury (T.46).

Dr. Sky is a board-certified psychiatrist (T.459). He conducted a medical examination of the Employee which included a history of mental health difficulties and treatment. He diagnosed major depression, recurrent, anxiety and PTSD. He testified that all three overlapped on each other adding to a difficult and worse impact on the Employee (T.424). It was his unrefuted expert opinion that these psychiatric conditions were present prior to the claim filed and synergistically combined and were made worse by the difficulties she had using her hands as a result of the development of bilateral carpal tunnel syndrome (T.425). He also concluded that her pre-existing psychiatric condition, which was well documented, represented a pre-existing PPD of 35% body as a whole pre-claim, and due to the claim and limited improvement following medical care she became 100% disabled in combination (T.426).

The reasons the Commission provided in disregarding expert opinion on the Employee's mental conditions is not sufficient, substantial and also mistaken. Sky did not have the Cometa letters at the time of his May 15, 2017, report in which he made his conclusions, so no reliance on the letters (T.464). The reference of treatment in his report came from the Employee's medical history (T.465). Next, the Commission and ALJ found Sky's testimony less credible as he referred to the Cometa letters as records. The ALJ alleges that an objection was made at the time of this statement, but none appears at the cite the ALJ provides which was page 14 of Dr. Sky's deposition (T.407). Objections to improper form during a deposition should be stated concisely on the record during the deposition, to provide a reasonable opportunity to correct the form of the question. Dr. Sky did not use the word records, he only stated that he reviewed the letters (T.405). In addition, other evidence of treatment of Employee by Cometa is documented in admissible evidence from Chrysler Clinic (T.93). The Commission's finding that Sky could not consider facts not in evidence to form an opinion or inference misapplies the law as it is permissible if the facts otherwise comply with §490.065.2 RSMo. 2017. Information of prior psychiatric treatment from medical history is such permissible evidence.

The Employee testified that she first came under the care of Dr. Chilikamarri when she was sent by her employer to the Stress Program in 2007 (T.34, 36, 98). Because Chilikamarri treated her at the program, he was the psychiatrist who admitted her to the hospital in March, 2009 (T.242). She began privately treating with him after the hospitalization (T.232). The Commission found that Sky did not review the St. Anthony's records of March, 2009 (T.437). Sky did not have the records at the time of the Employee's interview, but did review them later as he testified to the admission record's past reference to a suicide attempt of Employee at age 13 (T.438). Regardless of the review of the hospital records there was sufficient and substantial admissible evidence available to him that he did review that is consistent and supported of his analysis diagnosis of the Employee's mental conditions and their impact on her life.

Sky did review the records of Dr. Pope, who recorded on October 16, 2007, the Employee's mental problems arising from physical/emotional abuse as a child, and current spousal abuse (T.133). Pope's records noted Employee's past counseling and prescriptions of Paxil, Wellbutrin and Klonopin for depression. On October 16, 2007, he noted her transient thoughts of self-harm. He prescribed her Effexor for depression and Valium for anxiety (T.133). He continued to prescribe her medication for chronic depression which was moderate in severity (T.129-130). Sky also had the medical records from Dr. Hugge who prescribed medication for the Employee's depression on September 15, 2005, and May 26, 2006 (T.169, 172-173). To find Sky not credible on the inaccurate basis that he failed to read the post claim hospital records is not a reasonable basis as it cites no information that was not already available in the other admissible medical evidence listed above that he did review.

The Commission is correct that there are no prior records of a hospitalization for mental conditions prior to March, 2009. There is no requirement in the statute that any of the pre-existing injuries or conditions be "symptomatic" The requirement is simply that the Commission must find that the combination of the last injury and the pre-existing disabilities resulted in PTD.[4] Atchinson v. Mo State Treas. Custodian of the 2nd Injury Fund, 603 S.W.3d 719 (Mo.App.S.D. 2020).

The Commission also adopted the ALJ's opinion that the Employee's testimony that she felt "suicidal" prior to the claim was not credible. The Commission acknowledges that there are treating records from therapist Toon who counseled her at the stress program for 3 weeks in 2007, and then privately beginning December 15, 2007, to July 31, 2009 (T.35, 194-204). The Commission characterizes Toon's treatment as "difficulties with personal, family and martial problems". An analysis of an individual's mental conditions is a complex medical issue and not within the understanding of lay opinion. Toon's records prior to the date the claim was filed reflect the Employee's lifelong depression and anxiety with daily SI. The Employee reported childhood neglect and abuse, currently exacerbated by the amount of physical work she was doing at the [4] The determination of PTD requires the court to determine whether the Employee's last injury in and of itself rendered the Employee PTD, then the Second Injury Fund has no liability and employer is responsible for the entire amount. *Hughey v. Chrysler Fenton Plant, affecting her health. Ms. Toon's diagnosis on December 15, 2007, was Major Depression, recurrent, Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder and Generalized Anxiety Disorder with gambling addiction (T.195). Ms. Toon's records reflects SI, 11 times in 19 visits prior to the primary claim (T.196-202). On December 6, 2008, and January 8 and 9 of 2009, Toon notes severe symptoms of depression, anxiety with suicidal reports related to multiple issues, physical health and her husband's mental and verbal abuse. Toon discussed possibility of re-entering Chrysler's Partial Day Hospital program for a short period of time due to the severity of her depression, but the Employee declined (T.201-202). She eventually enters the Partial Day program on February 25, 2009 (T.203). Toon's records were reviewed by Sky in conjunction with the Employee's evaluation. The Commission's characterization of the Employee's mental conditions lacks the medical training required in this complex diagnosis of past and current trauma from abusive relationships affecting her mental functioning. The hospitalization that occurred approximately 5 weeks postdate the claim an exacerbation of her lifelong mental conditions as explained by Dr. Sky (T. 450).

Sky diagnosed the Employee with Major Depression, recurrent, Generalized Anxiety Disorder and Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder based on his evaluation and her medical records. He found that she had pre-existing permanent psychiatric disability which synergistically worsened by the primary injury to her hands that slowed her down in her job (T.426). Dr. Volarich also testified regarding the psychiatric condition contributing to the Employee's inability to compete in the open labor market. Dr. Pope, Dr. Hugge, Dr. German, therapist Toon, and Lalk all comment on her mental conditions.

Chrysler clinic records show she lost time from work due to depression/anxiety on March 26, 2002, October 7 to November 20 in 2007, and again on December 3, 2007.

The Fund presented no evidence that contradict Sky's conclusions that the Employee had a pre-existing psychiatric condition of 35%. The Fund presented no expert opinion that the psychiatric condition did not combine with her primary injury or that it worsened post claim. The diagnosis of mental illness, and its origins, is a complex medical condition which is not within common knowledge or experience of a lay person and requires medical expert testimony which here was supported by the medical expertise of psychiatrist Adam Sky, M.D. Pruett v. Fed Mogul Corp. 365 S.W.3d 296, 306 (Mo.App.S.D. 2012); Wright v. Sports Associated, Inc., 887 S.W.2d 596 (Mo.App.W.D. 1994). The Commission lay's analysis of the Employee's psychiatric conditions is grossly inadequate. The Commission took extreme measures to remove as much expert testimony as possible, but even so what remains is evidence of a 50-year-old worker whose abusive childhood regrettably affected her ability to establish and maintain work and personal relationships that led to 5 marriages, difficulties with her children and people with whom she worked.

The Commission is given deference on issues involving the credibility of witnesses and the weight to be given testimony. They also may decide a case 'upon its disbelief of uncontradicted and unimpeached testimony'. Angus v Second Injury Fund, 328 S.W.3d

However, " the commission may not substitute an ALJ's personal opinion on the question of medical causation of [an injury] for the uncontradicted testimony of a qualified medical expert." Wright v. Sports Associated, Inc. 887 S.W.2d 596, 600 (Mo. Banc 1994). "The question of causation is one for medical testimony, without which a finding for claimant would be based on mere conjecture and speculation and not substantial evidence." Elliott v. Kansas City, Mo., Sch Dist., 71 S.W.3d 652, 658 (Mo.App.W.D. 2002). When "expert medical testimony is presented, an ALJ's personal views of [the evidence] cannot provide a sufficient basis to decide the causation question, at least where the ALJ fails to account for the relevant medical testimony." Van Winkle v. Lewellens Prof'l Cleaning, Inc., 258 S.W.3d 889, 898 (Mo.App. 2008). The Commission's adoption of the ALJ's determination of the Employee's mental condition based on her demeanor at a hearing or Dr. The credibility of Dr. Sky's diagnosis of mental conditions and the effect on the Employee's functioning is based on no other expert medical testimony necessary for a complex medical condition. They are substituting their unqualified lay opinion for that of an expert witness and ignores too much of the admitted record and rests on an uneducated understanding of the effects PTSD, depression and anxiety.

On this complex issue the Commission may not arbitrarily disregard or ignore competent, substantial, and undisputed evidence of witnesses not impeached or base its finding on conjecture or its own opinion unsupported by sufficient evidence. Bond v. Site

Line Surveying, 322 S.W.3d 165, 171 (Mo.App.W.D. 2010). The Commission's finding that Dr. Sky's conclusions were less than credible are not reasonable. The determination as to the presence of a psychiatric condition pre-existing and how it combined with the un-employability of the Employee once she had additional work difficulties because of her weak hands should be properly acknowledged as the Commission cannot substitute their opinion on this complex matter. The finding of no pre-existence of a mental condition should have been considered in determining PTD and PPD.

IV.

The Commission's misapplied the law in finding that the primary injury settlement for 16% of each wrist was so "modest" that it could not combine to make her totally disabled as §287.220.1 does not require a threshold on primary injury to combine with a pre-existing condition.

Standard of Review

The Commission's factual findings are binding and conclusive to the extent they are supported by sufficient competent evidence and were reached in the absence of fraud. Archer v. City of Cameron, 460 S.W.3d 775, 778 (Mo. banc 2014). reviews findings of the Commission not the ALJ. Lawrence v. Anheuser Busch Cos. Inc., 310 S.W.3d 248, 250 (Mo.App.E.D. 2010). Where, as here, the Commission affirms and incorporates the ALJ's decision into its award, this Court reviews the findings of the ALJ as adopted by the Commission. Cardwell v. Treasurer of the State of Missouri, 249 S.W.3d 902, 906 (Mo.App.E.D. 2008).

The plain language of §287.220.1 does not require a threshold on the primary injury or occupational conditions to combine with a pre-existing disability. Further, this section only requires that the pre-existing partial disability be of some minimal hindrance or obstacle to employment or to obtaining re-employment. "[A]ny pre-existing injury which could be considered a hindrance to an Employee's competition for employment in the open labor market should trigger second injury fund liability." Lewis v. State, 435 S.W.3d 144, 160 (Mo.App.E.D. 2014) (internal quotation omitted).

V.

The commission misapplied the law in not Awarding PTD or PPD for combined mental conditions, right shoulder, incontinence and her hand injuries against the Fund as the reasonable consideration of the evidence supports including the psychiatric condition as a pre-existing condition and the Award is against the overwhelming weight of the evidence.

Standard of Review

Section 287.495.1(4) provides reversal of the Commission's Award if there is not sufficient competent evidence in the record to warrant the making of the award. "A "Sufficient competent evidence is a minimum threshold and can be satisfied by the testimony of one witness, even if there is contradictory testimony from other witnesses." Robinson v. Loxcreen Co., 571 S.W.3d 247, 249 (Mo.App.S.D. 2019) (internal quotation omitted). In determining the validity of a challenge, The court will

(1) Identify a factual proposition necessary to sustain the Commission's result.

(2) Marshal all evidence in the record supporting that factual proposition, subject to the Commission's authorized factual and credibility determinations, explicit or implicit, and viewing the record objectively where there were no explicit or implicit findings.

(3) Demonstrate why the evidence from the second step lacks sufficient probative force on the issues, such that the Commission could not have reasonably believed the factual position set forth in step one.

The Employee has the burden of proof, so the question is not whether there was sufficient evidence to support an award in his favor, but to determine whether the award of the Commission is supported by competent evidence, not whether an opposing award could have been made. Dehatre v. Smith & Nephew Equip. Grp., 892 S.W.2d 369, 371 (Mo.App.E.D. 1995) (overruled on other grounds by Hampton, 121 S.W.3d at 233).

The proper criteria for determining whether a pre-existing condition is serious enough to trigger the provisions of §287.220, RSMo. Supp. 1993 requires the condition to be a "hindrance or obstacle" to employment or to obtaining reemployment." Leutzinger v. Treas of Mo, Custodian of Second Injury Fund, 895 S.W.2d 591, 592 (Mo.App. E.D. 1995). There is no requirement that the pre-existing disability for PTD be "actual and measurable" to trigger Fund liability for PTD benefits. Lewis v. Treasurer of Mo., 435 S.W.3d 144, 160 (Mo.App.E.D. 2014). The requirement of "actual and measurable" affects applies to cases involving Fund liability for PPD benefits as such calculation requires the knowledge and consideration of the degree or percentage of disability of the pre-existing disability. Id. at 160.

Argument

In this case the Employee sought recovery for PTD pursuant to §287.220.1 The Fund is liable where the Employee establishes that she is PTD due to the combination of her present compensation injury and her pre-existing PPD or that the combination of the present compensable injury and the pre-existing PPD creates a greater overall disability than the sum of the disabilities independently. Highley v. Von Weise Gear, 247 S.W.3d 52, 55 (Mo.App.E.D. 2008). Here the Commission determined that the present injury to her hands did not render her PTD but did support a PPD of 16% of each hand and a load for bilateral injuries. The Commission further found pre-existing PPD of the right shoulder and the presence of incontinence. They found no pre-existing disability that represented an "obstacle or hinderance" to employment or was" actual and measurable" arising from a mental condition. As previously laid out in the brief, this finding is based on their lay opinion interpreting a complex medical condition. that They found the documentation in the admissible medical records prior to the primary injury represented "difficulties with personal relationships" or "mood disorder" and as such did not represent medical condition that met either requirements for PTD or PPD.

On credibility, they found the Employee less than credible based on her demeanor at trial (no display of sadness or anger) and her severity of complaints not compatible with the 16% settlement of each wrist. They also opined that there was a post claim worsening of mental problems with a hospitalization that is the cause of her PTD. Dr. Malik's note that that she could work full duty if she were not on sick leave for mental conditions as reasons (L.F. 45-46). They further concluded dislike of working as a "floater," her divorce and plant shutdown contributed to her not working. The Commission believed a reasonable inference that the Employee chose to retire due to several life factors that occurred, aside from the level of disability she was experiencing (L.F. 46).

The implicitly found Volarich credible except for his statements concerning his conclusion that she had a mental condition that pre-existed the primary claim that represented an obstacle of hindrance to employment and was the greater factor in finding her PTD.

The Commission by excluding vocational expert Lalk's deposition did not consider his conclusions.

The Commission admitted Dr. Sky's deposition as there were no Fund objections but found the psychiatrist conclusions "less credible" as set out in Point III of this brief.

What evidence is left are medical records of the Employee's therapist Toon, her family physician, Dr Pope, records from the plant Clinic and her gynecologist Dr. Hugge. The statements of treatment for mental conditions that rise above the absurd one time lay observation of the Employee's demeanor at the hearing. Toon is a mental health therapist trained and Dr. Pope as a family practitioner also trained to recognize the status of his patient's mental conditions and provided treatment as did Dr. Hugge. They all had numerous encounters with the Employee prior to the claim being filed. The plant clinic records also document disruptions from her mental health conditions for which the company directed her to the stress day program.

As previously stated the presence of a mental condition is a complex diagnosis and requires expert medical opinion (Dr. Sky), which was admitted without objections by the Fund. Deciding whether someone has PTSD, or is just crabby is based on expert analysis and not personal opinion. In finding a diagnosis of Depression the Commission required a "record of a prior hospitalization" as evidence of a pre-existing mental condition when no such evidence is required for a PTD award. But even if it were, the post hospitalization records so note a prior suicide attempt at the age of 13. There is no such requirement that a pre-existing disability must be present and measurable to trigger Fund liability for PTD benefits. Lewis v Treasurer of State 435 S.W.3d 144, 160 (Mo.App.E.D. 2014). For PPD, Dr. Sky found the Employee had 35% PPD related to her mental conditions. The Plant Clinic records document her loss time and attendance for mental health issues dating back to 2002. Her supervisor sent her to the plant clinic do to her inability to work due to crying on the line. Toon's records beginning in 2007 document her mental conditions arising from childhood and spousal abuse.

The presence of Employee's psychiatric conditions and symptoms before and after the primary claim differ not in kind, but rather in degree. When the damage to her hands removed her out of a Chrysler unskilled job that limited co- Employee/supervisor contact, she became unemployable as discussed by Dr. Sky, Dr. Volarich and Lalk. Even Dr. Malik points to her mental health issues as preventing her from returning to her job.

Dr. Sky diagnosed the Employee with Major Depression, recurrent, Generalized Anxiety Disorder and Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder based on his evaluation and her medical records. He found that she had pre-existing permanent psychiatric disability which synergistically worsened by the primary injury to her hands (T. 426). Sky explains that the Employee's lifelong mental conditions are not new, but recurrent and exacerbated at various times. Her physical problems were just enough to combine and interfere in her ability to continual in a job that did allow her to work with minimal interactions with other Employees. The hospitalization in March of 2009 was evidence of her mental conditions that have affected her ability to function in a normal way. He notes that Toon felt the Employee's inability to cope with a divorce and physical problems were on the rise shortly before she had an EMG/NCS on February 10, 2009. Her inability to cope was compromised by her mental conditions:

A. You know, I don't know that we have a specific reason why she was angry at her boss, but people who are depressed, people who have anxiety disorders, who have been traumatized, will oftentimes make comments like that, I'm so mad at you, I could just kill you …or I wish you were dead. So those kinds of impulsive comments or statements would certainly not be unusual in someone with a history of severe mood symptoms.

Q. She's the kind of person that wouldn't do well working with other people, correct?

A. In my experience, no.

Q. Okay. So doing this kind of assembly work, where she was somewhat isolated from other people would be the only kind of work, maybe , that she might be –I mean , can you think of __

A. Well as long as it did not require her to work to any degree of pace. You know – you got to work faster and you know – and someone sooner or later is going to say, hey, you know, you're not working fast enough, or that's not an accurate enough job, or you did sloppy work. Sooner or later, you're going to have to interact with a supervisor. You're going to have to follow safety guidelines. So even if you're working off by yourself in some imaginary isolated booth somewhere, there's going to be issues that come up. (T.456-457).

Dr. Volarich clearly reviewed all he medical evidence that had numerous references to the claimant's psychiatric conditions including Dr. Sky's opinion on her lack of employability due to her psychiatric conditions. Based on review of all this information he concurred that the psychological condition was a major factor interfering in her employability.

The Commission's finding that there was no evidence of psychiatric symptoms prior to the primary claim ignores the documentation of medical evidence and a lack of understanding of a complex medical condition which is found her medical providers records. The Commission does not find a reasonable basis to discredit Sky's and Volarich's testimony, that the psychiatric conditions only arose post claim. A requirement of a hospitalization prior to the primary claim is not required. The presence of a short hospitalization post primary claim represents of a temporary occurrence. The issues she had from her mental problems before her primary claim that affected her relationships and communications with people were still present after the primary claim. The Primary claim added yet another limitation that made continuing to work not an option. The degree of treatment is not in issue. The degree that her psychiatric condition compromised her ability to function in a job in conjunction with weaker hands, a bad shoulder in her dominant arm, incontinence and limitations on pushing and pulling are the factors that eliminated her from employability. Because of her psychiatric conditions and unskilled work, she was limited to a job that did not require focus, concentration or pace and would have safety and production quotas (T.431-432). Sky concluded the combine pre-existing and primary claim combine and produce a hindrance and obstacle to employment making her unable to compete in the open labor market (T.468). That expert testimony on such a complex issue of mental health is supported by the admissible documentation of mental health and physical conditions and should not be discredited.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated above, the Commission's evidentiary decisions excluding Lalk's testimony should be reversed, as the Lalk conclusions involved the employability of the Employee and there is no evidence in the record that Dr. Shuter commented on the Employee's employability. Unidentified portions of Dr. Volarich's testimony that agreed that the Employee had a psychiatric condition, and it combined with her physical disability to PTD, should not have been excluded. The Commission's finding that the disabilities had to be certified by a physician is not required by the statute. The credibility findings of all the witnesses are against the overwhelming weight of the evidence. The Employee has met her burden under (1) that her pre-existing permanent disabilities were serious enough to constitute a hindrance or obstacle to her employment or re-employment; (2) the nature and extent of her pre-existing permanent disabilities by a reasonable degree of certainty; and (3) that she is permanently and totally disabled due to combination of her pre-existing permanent disabilities and her primary injury. The court should reverse and find the Fund liable for her permanent total disability. The Commission's decision is not reasonable based on the documentation and presence of interruptions affecting the Employee's work as a result of mental illness. Their decision is not supported by sufficient competent evidence and is against the overwhelming weight of the evidence. In the alternative, if the Court finds insufficient evidence that the Employee is PTD, there is clearly presence of a pre-existing mental conditions that were "actual and measurable" as concluded by Dr. Sky in his rating of 35%. The Court should reverse and find Dr. Sky's unimpeached rating of 35% be combined with the PPD award that includes the Employee's mental conditions.

JURISDICTIONAL STATEMENT

This is an appeal in a workers' compensation case in which Patricia Otwell (hereinafter "Employee") settled her case with the Employer Chrysler and sought permanent total disability (hereinafter "PTD") from the Treasurer, State of Missouri, as Custodian of the Second Injury Fund (hereinafter "the Fund"). The claim arose when the Employee developed occupational injuries to her hands due to repetitive activity. The claim against the Employer Chrysler was settled. A hearing was held on March 6, 2019 with Administrative Law Judge (hereinafter "ALJ"), Joseph Denigan found in favor of Employee and against the Fund for Permanent Partial Disability (hereinafter "PPD") combining her hand injuries representing 33 per cent of a body, or 133.32 weeks with pre-existing conditions referable to incontinence of 2.5 percent of the body (10 weeks) and 15 percent of the right shoulder (34.8 weeks) on June 27, 2019. The Labor Industrial Relations Commission (hereinafter "Commission") affirmed the Award on December 30, 2020. Thereafter, Employee filed a Notice of Appeal on January 27, 2021.

The subject matter of this appeal does not concern any exclusive ground for jurisdiction with the Missouri Supreme Court in MO. Const. Art V, Section 3. The accident arose in Saint Louis County which lies within the territorial jurisdiction of this Court. Section 477.050 RSMo.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

Employee was born on May 25, 1958 (Tr.3). On the date of the hearing, she was 60 years-old and married to Tony Otwell. She previously had been married and divorced four times (T.3). She attended school to the 8th grade and later obtained a GED (T.4). At the age of 14 she married and began work as a waitress, then worked at Ryder International from 1980 to 1984 (T.5-6 & 7). In 1984 she was hired by Chrysler in Alabama to assemble and pack parts (T.8). The repetitive nature of the work led to physical problems and work restrictions for her right hand and shoulder and other body parts in 2003, 2007 and 2008 (T.92).

On March 6, 2003 she was picking up junction blocks when she developed burning sensation in her right arm and shoulder. She was seen by an orthopedic, Dr. Miller who diagnosed right shoulder tendonitis and ordered work restrictions of no lifting greater than one (1) pound, overhead or repetitive use of her right arm from April 25, 2003 to May 19, 2003. When she was released from care, she was removed from that job (T.11 & 95).

In 2005, Chrysler sold the Alabama Parts Plant and she moved to Chrysler in St. Louis (T.6). She was assigned to the Paint Department. There she used a sander, which vibrated and irritated both hands due to a strong torque that jerked her wrists (T.18). The torque was so forceful that she tied it to her right hand and held it with her left hand to sand (T.19). On October 6, 2005, she went to the Chrysler Clinic (hereinafter Clinic) with complaints in both shoulders, arms and hand numbness and tingling. She was given wrist supports, and medications and a Nerve Conduction Test was suggested (T.95-96). The Claimant sought private treatment for her neck, bilateral shoulders, arms and wrist/hands with Traci Lepper DC from October 5, 2005 to September of 2006 (T.20-21 and T.113-118). The Employee reported repetitive hand use in multiple jobs, using tools, clamps, clippers, power screwdriver (T.23-24). She drove a forklift and worked underneath a van with a powerful metal Ergo arm that placed screws overhead in elevated trucks and vans. The Employee's short stature required her to be on her tiptoes, the Ergo would jerk her up and down as she guided the arm. (T.22-26). While operating the Ergo arm in March, 2008 she was injured. Attorney Susan Roach filed a claim for injuries to her bladder (T.77). She had a sling suspension for stress incontinence October 21, 2008 and was released back to work with restrictions of no lifting greater than 10 lbs. for one month (T.37, 103 and 156-157).

Bilateral Carpal Tunnel and Medical Care

On February 4, 2009 the Employee reported bilateral pain, numbness and weakness in her hands at the Clinic (T.103-105). Chrysler's Plant physician, Dr. Malik ordered thyroid and diabetic testing and a nerve conduction velocity test (hereinafter "NCV") (T.103-104). She also saw Elaine Toon, her therapist, with suicidal ideation (hereinafter "SI") but no plan, feeling physically unwell and spoke of applying for disability. She reported mental and verbal abuse from her husband (T.202). On February 12, 2009 she reported to Toon symptoms of depression, increase anxiety related to health and severe pain in hands and the closing of Chrysler Plant. Dr. Phillips preformed a nerve conduction study (hereinafter "NCS") on February 10, 2009 (T. 106). It showed moderate sensory median neuropathy on the right wrist and mild medium neuropathy on the left wrist (T. 106 and 227- 229). On February 16, 2009 was seen for bilateral hand/wrist pain and had concerns about over the counter medication to control symptoms (T.106). She reported difficulty sleeping and taking Effexor and Wellbutrin for depression (T.106). She was started on Neurontin 300 mg. and Relafen 750 mg. and made aware that Neurontin could have a side effect of increasing depression (T.106). On February 18, 2009, the lab testing for thyroid and diabetic conditions were negative (T.107). She reported to Toon depression with SI, resulting from physical problems especially pain in her abdomen, hands and wrists (T.202). On February 23, 2009, Neurontin and Relafen were discontinued and she was prescribed Ultram 5 g. (T.107). Dr. Malik explained he could not take her off work for her carpal tunnel syndrome (hereinafter "CTS") and she should see her doctor for adjustment of hormonal therapy. He noted her complaints of hot flashes and an emotional demeanor (T.107).

On February 25, 2009, the Employee was admitted to Chrysler's Partial Day Hospital Program[1] (T.203). On March 4, 2009 Dr. German diagnosed bilateral carpal tunnel syndrome and gave her injections in both wrists. He suggested surgery if her symptoms did not improve (T.207).

Due to increase symptoms of depression, SI with a plan and homicide ideation (hereinafter "HI"), she was admitted March 23 to 27, 2009 to the hospital by psychiatrist Dr. Chilikamarri (T. 246-250). She was diagnosed with Major Depression, recurrent, severe without psychosis, PTSD and panic disorder. It was noted she had thoughts to shoot her boss, divorce issues and recurrent flashbacks of childhood physical abuse (T.306-310, 316-319). The Admission noted a history of prior suicide attempt at age 13 by overdosing with pills, and SI for many years (T.317).

Dr. German operated on her right wrist on April 4, 2009 and the left on April 17, 2009 (T.208, 217-218, 224-225). She was prescribed physical therapy on April 9, 2009 for 12 visits (T.221).

She saw Dr. Malik on April 9, 2009 reporting she was on sick leave for depression (T.108). Malik advised a job was available for her if she were not on sick leave (T.107).

Gary E. Meier P.T. exam on April 9, 2009 noted strength in her right wrist flexion, extensors and radial deviators was 3/5 and 3/5 at the ulnar deviators (T.213). Grip strength on the right was 4 lbs. and not tested on the left hand (T. 214).

Dr. German saw her on April 22, 2009, and deferred to Dr. Malik on work restrictions (T.216).

On May 1, 2009 Malik felt she had excellent healing and could be assigned to full duty work but for her sick leave status for mental health issues (T.108).

On May 20, 2009, PT Meier noted tenderness at the wrist and hypo-thenar eminence, decrease range of motion and weakness in her right wrist of 4/5 and left wrist 3/5 for flexors, extensors, ulnar and radial deviators. Her grip strength on the right was 22 lbs. and left 11 lbs. (T.213- 214).

On May 27, 2009, she complained of burning sensation and tingling radiating into her shoulder to German (T.208-209). He felt that her symptoms may relate to a hypersensitive nerve and should settle down. She told him she was moving back to Alabama where she has a good support system. She was to continue anti-inflammatories and gentle exercises (T.209). She saw Toon on May 27, 2009 for depression and anxiety arising from temporary housing and Chrysler closing down both plants and freezing all sick leaves (T.203). German saw her on June 24, 2009 and noted continued numbness and tingling in her palms, aching with cold weather, waking at night, increased symptoms when talking on phone, and inability to push a granddaughter on a swing (T.209). On exam he recorded 2-point sensation in left wrist of 4 mm, on right 5 mm. Her grip on left was 22 pounds and right 30 pounds.[2] (T.209). He advised her that despite the cold sensitivity, she did not yet have reflex dystrophy. He stated she was a stoic and very nervous person who had been through a lot. He encouraged her to use her hands as much as possible and take anti-inflammatories (T.209). He commented that she had a history of panic attacks and was essentially a nervous person (T.209).

She saw therapist Toon on June 24, 2009, and was depressed with SI and anxious about her future and application for disability as she felt she was unable to work. Toon noted that she was dealing with many past issues with soon to be ex-husband and daughter (T.203). She last saw Toon for depression and SI due to stress with changes in her life and inability to work (T.204).

German last saw her on September 14, 2009. She was still symptomatic with numbness and tingling. He did not test her grip strength. He wanted her to return in three (3) months, but since she had returned to live in Alabama, he released her (T.210).

At the hearing, Employee testified she was on medical leave for mental conditions beginning February 26 and attended Chrysler's stress day program. She did not recall returning to work at the plant except possibly a day or two (T.41). She felt she unable to work and accepted an offer to retire as the Plant was closing (T.6, 43). She has not worked since her retirement with the Employer, stating she had no qualifications for most jobs and could not use her hands (T.44). She applied for social security disability benefits (T.43). She testified that she had abdominal surgery to remove mesh following her retirement and this relieved some symptoms except incontinence (T.45).

Prior Psychiatric Illness

The Employee testified to symptoms of depression and anxiety dating from childhood from an abusive parent (T.5, 16). She testified that she was treated for "nerves" and severe depression by Dr. Cometa, PhD, and Drs. Isenberg and Calhoun (T.12, 15). Cometa took her off work on March 19-26, 2002, following a car accident that triggered an increase in symptoms (T.93, 110). The Employee kept copies of two letters given to her by Cometa (T.13). The Chrysler Clinic (hereinafter "Clinic") documents receipt of the letters from Cometa concerning her off work status (T.93). The Clinic records also note Employee was off work from March 15, 2002 to March 26, 2002 for depression (T.93).

The Employee testified to great difficulty performing her job due to physical problem causing her to be slow and anxious about her performance. She was referred to the Chrysler Stress Program and attended the 9:00 a.m. to 3:00 p.m. program daily instead of working (T.31-32). She first was admitted to the program on October 29 to November 20, 2007 (T.22, 98). Upon release, she continued with mental difficulties. Her supervisor, Tom Weston, sent her to the Clinic to be checked on her ability to work, as she was crying. At the Clinic she reported severe depression and anxiety stating she had been released from the stress program too soon and needed more treatment. She was driving a fork truck and stated "I am slow" (T.22, 31, 98).

At the Stress Program she came under the care of Dr. Chilikamarri and therapist Toon, LCS (T.34 and 36). She began treating privately with Toon on November 22, 2008 (T.195). She began treating privately with Chilikamarri upon admission to the Hospital on March 23, 2009.

The Employee participated in the Stress Program February 26, 2009 to March 23, 2009 (T.34–35, 98, 203). She was admitted to the Hospital on March 23, 2009 to March 27, 2009 for psychosis, SI with a plan, HI and severe depression (T.319, 338). Chilikamarri's admission notes reported a prior suicide attempt with overdose of pills at age 13 (T.304).

The Employee treated with therapist Toon, privately from December 15, 2007 to July 31, 2009 (T.35, 194-204). Toon's records reflect a lifelong depression, anxiety, daily SI, childhood neglect and abuse. Toon's diagnosis: Major Depression, recurrent, PTSD and Generalized Anxiety Disorder with gambling addiction (T.195). Toon documents the Employee's SI in 11 out of 19 visits, prior to the primary claim (T.196-202). On December 6, 2008 and January 8 and 9 of 2009, Toon notes severe depression, anxiety with SI related to her health and her husband's mental/verbal abuse and suggests a Partial Day Hospital program. The Employee declined (T.201-202). She eventually enters the Partial Day program on February 25, 2009 (T.203).

The Employee treated with her primary care physician, Dr. Pope on October 16, 2007:

> … reports also s/a. Physical/emotional abuse as a child. Raised in very abusive environment, was in counseling on Paxil, took Wellbutrin, Paxil and Klonopin…. Depressed, transient thoughts of self-harm, husband is ETOH abuser" (T.133).

His records also reflect problems with sleeping, migraine headaches, depression/mood changes, chronic stress, moderate anxiety (T.45-46, 121, 125, 133). On January 12, 2008 she was stable and her depression was chronic and moderate in severity (T.129 -130).

At the Hearing, the Employee became upset twice :

> It did begin in my childhood because I did not have a normal childhood at all. I – there was always fear and dread. I never knew what was going to happen to me. As a small child, at 13, I was sleeping on the back porch, it was screened in. And in the middle of the night, daddy woke me up dragging mother in there and saying, look at you whore, look at you whore. I didn't know what a whore was. And he drugged me out of the bed and beat me. There was days we did not have food. One time, all we had was some flour and the weasels had gotten in it and mother, mother strained it and we – that's what we had. And I always wanted to work because I knew I had to – and I had my children. And I wanted them to be able to have a better life. I tried my best to raise them right. I'm sorry, it's just real painful.

Q. No, it's fine. I don't want to get you too upset. We'll kind of, just going to switch gears a little bit. I just want to get – take your time.

A. It just hurts me to go through it and talk about it. It's like I relive it. (T.16-17)

Later in the hearing while speaking about her difficulty working, she stated she felt like she was having a panic attack (T.22).

Prior Relevant Medical History

Following the injury to her bladder in March of 2008, Dr. Hugge suggested surgery (T.158, 160). She also was found to have a hernia (T.133-135, 137- 39, 150). She underwent a sling bladder surgery and hernia repair on October 21, 2008 (T.188-192). Following surgery, she was restricted to no lifting, pushing or pulling greater than 10 pounds (T.103). Post -surgery she continued to have pain, bleeding and incontinence (T.382). She was laid off October 31, 2008 to January 20, 2009 (T.103). She underwent removal of infected mesh with Dr. Veronikis on July 20, 2009 (T.44-45, 384). Her bleeding and pain stopped, but she continued to have incontinence (T.45). She felt her supervisors were irritated with her because she was too short, slow, weak and cried, which slowed the lines down (T.47).

Deposition of David Volarich, D.O.

Dr. Volarich is board certified in nuclear medicine (diagnostic imaging), occupational medicine, and independent medical examiner (T.485). Volarich examined the Employee on September 13, 2018 (T.487). She reported the 2008 injuries of repetitive pulling and pushing caused ongoing incontinence and genitourinary pain requiring her to use the restroom frequently (T.503). She reported extreme weakness in her hands and diminished sensation which caused great difficulty caring for her hair, manipulating buttons and zippers, driving, food preparation, and various household chores (T.503, 505). She reported persistent symptoms from her right shoulder strain injury in 2004 that caused limitations and pain with reaching, lifting, pushing and pulling. She reported these problems slowed down her work pace and she took Tylenol for pain (T.505-506).

On exam of her shoulder there was a 10% loss of motion, moderately positive impingement, trace crepitus with abduction and 1/5 atrophy or mild atrophy of the deltoid nerve to the cuff (T.506). On the hand/wrists exam, she had a positive Compression Provocative test over both carpal tunnels and a three-centimeter scar at each wrist. She was not able to grab the grip on the Jaymar device of the left hand at all. On the right hand she barely registered 3-foot pounds at setting number two, and 2-foot pounds at setting number 3, which represented very poor strength (T.508-509). He found the pinch testing was 4, 3 and 3 on the right, and all 4s on the left. The 2-point discrimination normally should be 4 mm or less, 5 mm is a gray zone and 6 or more is abnormal. His examination of Ms. Otwell showed on the right hand 2-point discrimination from thumb

to little finger was 8, 7, 5, 5 and 6, on the left hand it was 6, 5, 5 and 4. She also had sensory loss on the right hand, severe, and the left hand, moderate (T.509).

Volarich diagnosed 1) stress incontinence; 2) occupational conditions of overuse syndrome of right and left upper extremity causing median nerve entrapment at the wrist or carpal tunnel syndrome, status post open carpal tunnel release (T.509-510). He also found pre-existing conditions due to right shoulder sprain/strain with residual rotator cuff tendonitis and shoulder bursitis (T.510). He felt the stress incontinence resulted in 2.5 percent permanent partial disability (hereafter "PPD") to the body as a whole and 20 PPD disability for both wrists, due continued discomfort, paresthesia and weakness (T.512-513). He did not perform a mental examination (T.510).

Volarich stated the 20% PPD of the right shoulder was due to chronic strain syndrome, rotator cuff tendinitis and bursitis which caused loss of motion, crepitus and difficulties using her right arm away from her body and overhead. He found her incontinence, right shoulder and bilateral hand/wrist conditions created hindrances and obstacles to employment or re-employment (T.514). He also testified as to the synergistic combination between the right shoulder symptoms and the residual carpal tunnel syndrome problems. He noted that he discussed this with the Claimant who reported manipulating objects with her hands were more difficult, especially if she was working overhead or had to manipulate objects away from her body. The interplay between her injuries and medical conditions made it more difficult for her to function sufficiently at work and home. She had not described synergy because of the urinary incontinence, other than the fact that she had to go to the bathroom frequently which interrupted the work production (T.515-516).

He testified that the disabilities arising from her hands, incontinence and shoulder combined, and a loading factor should be considered. He reviewed both vocational expert Lalk's and Dr. Sky's reports (T.499). He reviewed medical records from her psychiatrist Chilikamarri, and Dr. Pope, noting her medications for psychiatric conditions of Cymbalta and Klonopin (T.510-511). He concluded, based on his evaluation of the medical records, his exam and findings and Lalk's vocational assessment, that he could not identify a job for which she could return to work (T.499). He found she was permanently and totally disabled primarily because of the combined pre-existing physical and psychiatric disorders and the conditions of her hands (T.517). Dr. Volarich felt she had a psychiatric condition, but deferred to psychiatry for that assessment (T.514-515). He restricted her to minor repetitive gripping, pinching, squeezing, pulling, pushing, twisting and rotating motions and similar tasks as needed, recommended she avoid impact vibratory trauma to the arms and use appropriate braces, anti-vibration gloves and support straps, and not handle weights greater than two to three pounds with either upper extremity. He thought she could handle weights to tolerance with her arms close to her body, but recommended no more than 10 lbs. He deferred to a urologist or gynecologist for limitations from the incontinence. On cross examination he was asked if he relied on the reports of Dr. Poetz and Dr. Shuter, both deceased, at the time of his examination, in coming to his conclusions regarding her disability. He testified he did not rely on opinions from Poetz or Shuter (T.520-521). He noted that the Employee had difficulty communicating due to psychiatric problems that interfered with her train of thought conveying incomplete and conflicting information (T.504).

Deposition of Adam Sky M.D. DFAPA

Dr. Adam Sky is a medical doctor and board-certified in Psychiatry and Neurology with added qualification in Geriatric Psychiatry (T.459). No objections were made at the time of the hearing to admission of the Deposition and Exhibits 1 – 4 into evidence (T.52). Dr. Sky examined the Employee on May 15, 2017 (T.403, 464). She reported both physical and mental problems (T.406-407). She gave a history of past medical treatment for mental illness, describing a long history of depression going back to when she was a child. He noted that she reported a suicide attempt when she was 13 (documented by Dr. Chilikamarri in the admission records). She sought mental health treatment with Dr. Cometa and a psychiatrist, Dr. Calhoun, in Alabama beginning in 1990 (T.407). In St. Louis, she began seeing Dr. Chilikamarri through the Chrysler's Stress Day Program who treated while in the program beginning in 2007. She came to St. Louis in 2005 (T.407-408). Dr. Sky knew Dr. Chilikamarri and commented that his notes are difficult to read. Chilikamarri notes suggested she had a diagnosis of depression and he had tried her on several antidepressants (T.408-409). He also reviewed Daimler-Chrysler Medical Clinic's and psychologist Elaine Toon's treatment records (T.409-410). On December 15, 2017 Elaine Toon diagnosed Ms. Otwell with major depression, anxiety, post-traumatic stress disorder, as well as a gambling condition (T.195, 410). Dr. Sky noted Ms. Otwell's current medication included a very high dose of the antidepressant Cymbalta, and Rexulti, a mood stabilizer, used to augment the effects of the antidepressant. Other medications were for high blood pressure, glaucoma, and chronic headaches (T.411). She gave a history of a difficult childhood, the middle of five (5) children. Her family was poor, and her father was both physically and verbally abusive (T.412). She declined discussing past sexual abuse. Dr. Sky commented that this was not an uncommon response to a first-time interview. As a result of the difficulties at home, she had a suicide attempt at age 13. She did not run away, but she ended up getting married and dropping out of school after 8th grade at the age of 14 (T.412). She had a series of marriages that ended in divorce. The final marriage lasted barely a year. One of the gentlemen she married was an alcoholic, mean and abusive (T.413).

Dr. Sky reported her history of working at Chrysler and the various jobs she had as well as physical problems that interfered with her job from the need for a hysterectomy, urinary stress incontinence and her upper extremity problems, especially with her hands (T.414-415). Dr. Sky had many patients from the Chrysler plant and the plant physician invited him and others to tour the plant which he found very helpful providing insight into the different positions all the Employees had (T.414).

Dr. Sky conducted a mental status exam of the Employee (T.416). He felt she was alert, appeared her listed age, and was cooperative, but tearful throughout the interview (T.417). She did have symptoms of anhedonia, or the absence of pleasure, which he felt was the cardinal symptom of depression (T.417). She endorsed feelings of hopelessness and helplessness, consistent with a depression diagnosis. Reported poor sleep, waking early, consistent with depression. She had put on weight (T.418). She currently denied suicidal/homicidal ideation, but she had them previously. He tested her with the Montgomery-Asberg Depression Rating Scale which was consistent with moderate to severe depression and anxiety with the Hamilton Anxiety rating scale (HAM-A), which showed moderate to severe anxiety (T.418-419, 470- 473). Finally, he conducted screening for Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder, the PCL-5, for which she scored 47, consistent with severe Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder (T.420, 474-476). Dr. Sky diagnosed Major Depression Disorder, moderate to severe and recurrent (T.420); generalized anxiety disorder based on her symptoms of a lot of complaints, worries, anticipation of the worst, fearful anticipation, feelings of tension, startled response, restlessness, inability to relax (T.423); and Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder he related to her childhood experiences which continued to produce symptoms (T.424). He concluded there was a lot of overlap between Depression, Anxiety and Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder from her childhood abuse (T.424). He felt the gambling addiction was no longer a factor (T.424-425).

He testified that based on the records he had reviewed and the mental evaluation he conducted, her pre-existing psychiatric disability represented a 35% permanent partial disability based on the body as a whole. This pre-existing mental disability combined and synergistically worsened with the occupational conditions to her hands, making her permanently totally disabled and unable to compete in the open labor market (100%) (T.426-427). He testified the Employee would not be capable of working in any job that required focus, concentration or pace, with special concern on her ability to follow safety guidelines and with production quotas (T.431-432). Sky further concluded her pre-existing mental conditions combined with the problems from incontinence and her bilateral carpal tunnel, to render her unable to compete in the open labor market (T.434).

Sky testify that he regularly treats people who are working and provides restrictions on work activities (T.428-429). Sky concluded that Employee's pre-existing psychiatric condition was a significant hindrance to gainful employment prior to the primary claim. He found that the combination of her mental and difficulties with her hands created a complete obstacle and hindrance to gainful employment in the open labor market (T.468). He testified that someone with a history of depression, anxiety and PTSD, in a work environment where they are required to work with accuracy, with speed and where shutting down the line is a very big deal, would make the individual's anxiety and mental conditions worse. (T.432). Sky indicated that his review of the Clinic records supported the history of depression/anxiety prior to the primary claim (T.433, 434).

On cross examination, Sky agreed that he could not give an exact start date of when her symptoms of depression/anxiety occurred (T.439-440). On redirect, he agreed that the history he was given which coincided with the history that appeared in the medical records, was that it dates to childhood and was chronic (T.442). He reviewed the Clinic records showed a March 26, 2002 diagnosis of clinical depression and anxiety, as well as copious documentation that she was on antidepressants (T.443). He noted she had been on leave of absence/stress classes in 2007, and the records reflect that she was on a very substantial antidepressant, Venlafaxine, in 2007 (T.444). He found the 2007 records of Toon, the counselor, documented Employee's SI, feelings of overwhelmed anxiousness and attendance at a partial hospital day program sponsored by Chrysler prior to the primary claim (T.446-449). He opined Employee's depression was tied into many things that happened dating back to her abusive childhood. (T.450) He noted that she had been on numerous anti depression medications for many years prior to the primary claim (T.451).

On re-cross Sky was asked about Employee's inconsistencies regarding doctors and dates (T.437). He found those were not significant a frequent issue with patients (T.452). Dr. Sky testified it was his conclusion Employee was not that he did not 100% disabled prior to the primary claim (T.453-454).

In a supplemental report dated November 16, 2018, Sky reviewed Lalk's August 4, 2017 report and found Lalk's conclusions on employability concurred with his conclusions (T.477). Sky also reviewed Clinic records, Cometa's two letters and Volarich's report, which did not change any of his prior conclusions regarding the Employee's mental evaluation as set forth in his report of May 15, 2018 (T.478).
He noted that a psychiatric condition could get worse over time and also could be made worse by an external event, like a physical injury or medical illness (T. 454).

Timothy Lalk Vocational Rehabilitation Counselor

Lalk, a certified vocational rehabilitation counselor, interviewed the Employee on July 15, 2014 at the request of Ms. Otwell's attorney Susan Roach, who was representing her in a 2008 claim for urinary incontinence (T.593). At the time of the request from Ms. Roach he was not provided with any information regarding injuries from work (T.594-595). He requested additional records from Ms. Roach following the interview, but never received the additional records (T.594). Additional records were provided to Mr. Lalk by Nancy Mogab, including reports of Dr. Volarich and Dr. Sky prior to the issuance of his report dated August 4, 2017 (T.641–642, 647).

During the Employee's interview, Mr. Lalk noted that she was cooperating, but did cry frequently and seemed quite distressed. He commented that her crying did interfere with her answering questions (T.596-597). He opined her ability to communicate, however was not because of reluctance to tell him things. He felt it was due to difficulty forming ideas, collecting thoughts and organizing her thoughts (T. 596-597). He gave her the Wide Range Achievement Test, Revision 3. Reading and arithmetic showed she was at fifth-grade level reading, and sixth grade in arithmetic. He noted the reading is scored only if the person correctly pronounces the word but does not evaluate comprehension of the words (T.626). The Adult Basic Learning Examination, Level 2, showed a post-high school level, indicating she could glean meaning by context in reading (T.626). Mr. Lalk concluded after his interview, testing and review of the medical evidence, that she was not able to compete, secure and maintain employment in the open labor market. He concluded she could do unskilled sedentary or near sedentary position with access to a restroom on an as needed basis (T.630). He felt the primary inability to work arose due to psychiatric conditions that involved contact with coworkers, supervisors and the public (T.629 -630, 651). He opined the psychiatric problems had prevented her from certain types of work in the past and currently and referenced medical records of depression and anxiety prior to her 2008 bladder incident (T.630-631). Her psychiatric symptoms were likely to increase during events and interfere with various kinds of work and social activities prior to both the 2008 bladder injury, and the 2009 diagnosis of bilateral carpal tunnel syndrome, and after these claims (T.652). He opined that her ability to work in the future was dependent on whether her psychiatric symptoms changed (T.633). Lalk had unique experience working with adults suffering from mental conditions at the Independence Center, St. Louis (T.677).[3]

On cross, Lalk was asked if he "relied" on Dr Shuter's August 4, 2017 report (T.634 & 684). "Relied" was defined as "reviewed, read, looked at and then subsequently came to your conclusions because of the reviewing, reading and looking at those things" (T.634). Mr. Lalk answered yes, based on that definition. Lalk affirmed he did not have the start date of Employee's mental symptoms (T.639, 640).

On redirect, Lalk addressed Volarich's restrictions concluding the extreme weakness in the Employee's hands would prevent her from doing any kind of assembly work and packaging, leaving only jobs which would primarily require her to interact with customers, co-workers, etc. and for which due to her psychiatric problems, would not be able to perform (T.647-648).

ALJ's Award

The ALJ awarded PPD of 32.52 weeks against the Fund for a combination from her hands and pre-existing conditions right shoulder and incontinence (L.F.61). He found she was likely PTD only after considering unrelated post-primary injury progression of psychiatric conditions (L.F.61). The ALJ found that §287.190.6(2) RSMo. (2016) required Volarich or Sky to certify that the Employee is PTD (L.F.59). The ALJ cited

Volarich's failure to describe any combination of the Claimant's incontinence with her hands, and that he only found her PTD after considering Lalk's assessment (L.F.59).

The ALJ opined the primary settlement amount did not reflect a severe condition of PPD from which to find a PTD combination (L.F.59-60). He thought the medical records did not eliminate all employment, only those with heavy lifting or repetitive arm work (L.F.60). He felt Otwell could perform sedentary or retail work as she was ambulatory, could drive, manage her personal needs, had no domestic help. He concluded that this was substantial evidence that the Claimant's permanent injury is partial not total (L.F.60).

The ALJ found no evidence that her psychiatric disability was causally related to the work incident, as the claimant's appearance at trial was normal and lacking in any demeanor suggestive of anger or sadness (L.F.60). He further found no medical or lay evidence corroborated a severe depression or suicidal ideations prior to 2009 and she was not credible. Specifically, her single reference she felt suicidal "was not supported by any evidence that she had previously been hospitalized or treated for her assertion that she felt suicidal" (L.F.60). He found Sky's conclusions of a pre-existing psychiatric condition was based only on Otwell's anecdotal recollection or Dr. Chilikamarri's history, who treated her post injury" (L.F. 60). He found no objective pre-claim evidence of psychiatric disability, and Sky's analysis and testimony as simply unpersuasive and not enough to impose PTD liability against the SIF (L.F.61).

Fund introduced no evidence. The Fund objected to admissibility of Cometa's letters as they were not certified (L.F..50-51). The ALJ found the letters were not medical records, sustained the objection and excluded the letters (L.F. 57).

The Fund objected to Volarich's deposition, on the basis he relied on Dr. Shuter's report (L.F.52). The ALJ apparently overruled the objection on that basis.

The Fund objected to Lalk's deposition on the basis he relied on Shuter's report (L.F.53). The ALJ noted Lalk detailed Shuter's report twice and expressly admitted he relied on it in forming his own conclusions (L.F.56, T. 684, 696). Lalk did not have Poetz's report as evidenced by his testimony (T.642-643). The ALJ excluded Lalk's entire deposition testimony based on hearsay (L.F. 56).

The ALJ on his own, and without a raised objection by the Fund, excluded portions of Volarich's deposition that concurred with Lalk's assessment Employee was PTD because of her psychiatric disorders and combined hand injuries (L.F.57). The ALJ found that Volarich's report only mentioned Employee's chronic psychiatric illness once (L.F.57). He further found Volarich did not review any psychiatric medical records (L.F.56).

The ALJ highlighted, but did not overrule, a seven-day rule objection to Sky's testimony that incorporated Employee's incontinence as combining with other pre-existing conditions and the hand injuries to render the claimant PTD. The objection was not raised at the hearing by the Fund (T.52).

Labor and Industrial Relations Commission Award

In a 2-1 decision, the Commission affirmed the ALJ decision with a Supplemental Opinion. They corrected the ALJ's mistakes that the primary injury was to her hands and not her back and that the award for future medical was also a mistake (L.F.45). The Commission adopted the ALJ's evidentiary rulings and found no abuse of discretion (LF.45).

The Commission noted the ALJ's personal observations:

> Employee's demeanor as normal, not angry or sad; that she had domestic issues throughout adulthood which impacted her psychological condition; credibility was questioned as to a severe psychiatric condition, due to no records of hospitalization or treatment that corroborated her claim of suicidal thoughts predating the primary injury (LF.45).

The Commission agreed Employee chose to retire due to life factors impacting that decision aside from the level of disability she was experiencing (LF.47).

The Commission agreed Employee's psychological conditions were not proven as disabling at the time of the primary claim and felt she had post-injury worsening of her psychiatric and bladder conditions. (LF.48).

The Commission found Fund liability based on the synergistic effect of the pre-existing incontinence issue and the right shoulder injury with the primary carpal tunnel injuries amounting to 32.52 weeks of PPD based on the disability ratings found of the ALJ and his loading of a 33 1/3% load factor (L.F.48).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Commissioner Curls filed a dissenting opinion that argued evidence supported a disabling pre-existing psychiatric condition that combined with the primary injury (L.F.49). She found the ALJ's decision to exclude of the entire deposition of Lalk was an abuse of discretion as Lalk examined many different admissible sources in coming to his conclusion (LF. 49).

She would admit the Cometa letters in conjunction with the Employee's testimony recalling her encounter with Cometa (LF. 50).

She would reverse the excluded portions of Volarich's testimony that referenced Lalk's testimony as he did not rely on Lalk's conclusions (L.F. 50).

She concluded that the ALJ's credibility finding to Sky's testimony regarding pre-existing psychiatric illness were not substantiated, and she would give greater weight to Sky's testimony (LF. 50)

Finally she finds that the records from the Clinic, Toon's records from 2007 to 2009, admissions to Chrysler's stress day program on multiple occasions prior to February 10, 2009, Sky's diagnosis of PTSD, major depressive disorder, recurrent and generalized anxiety disorder, support a finding of a pre-existing psychological disorder in the range of 20-35% body as a whole, which created an obstacle and hindrance to obtaining and maintaining employment which synergistically combined with her primary injury, right shoulder, incontinence to be greater than a 33 1/3% load, but short of permanent total disability (L.F. 51).

POINTS RELIED ON

I.

The Commission misapplied the law when it ruled to exclude the entire deposition of Lalk based on a finding that the testimony relied on an inadmissible report of Dr. Shuter when substantial evidence shows that Shuter did not express an opinion on employability or PTD and exclusion of Lalk's testimony is an abuse of discretion when the testimony was unimpeached by contrary evidence from the Fund and does not demonstrate that Lalk was acting as a conduit for Shuter's conclusions on PTD as there is no evidence Shuter's report discussed PTD.

The Commission misapplied the law in excluding Dr. Volarich's testimony that concurred with Lalk's assessment that the Employee was PTD as there was no objection timely made on this issue, Volarich did not rely only stated they concurred on this issue, and Volarich did review psychiatric records so the exclusion of Volarich's conclusions on PTD is an abuse of discretion and should be reversed.

The Commission misapplied the law in finding require symptoms of psychiatric condition pre-existed and that there likely was only post injury worsening as psychiatric issues are complex and not within the understanding of lay understanding and here the Commission improperly disregarded competent, substantial and expert evidence and relied on lay conjecture and opinion unsupported by sufficient evidence and there is no requirement that a pre-existing condition be symptomatic.

ARGUMENT

I.

The Commission misapplied the law when it ruled to exclude the entire deposition of Lalk based on a finding that the testimony relied on an inadmissible report of Dr. Shuter when substantial evidence shows that Shuter did not express an opinion on employability or PTD and exclusion of Lalk's testimony is an abuse of discretion when the testimony was unimpeached by contrary evidence from the Fund and does not demonstrate that Lalk was acting as a conduit for Shuter's conclusions on PTD as there is no evidence Shuter's report discussed PTD.

Standard of Review

The Commission's factual findings are binding and conclusive to the extent they are supported by sufficient competent evidence and were reached in the absence of fraud. Archer v. City of Cameron, 460 S.W.3d 775, 778 (Mo. banc 2014). However, "this Court reviews decisions of the Commission which are clearly interpretations or applications of law for correctness without deference to the Commission's judgment." M*otton v. Outsource Intern.*, 77 S.W.3d 669, 672 (Mo.App.E.D. 2002) (quoting West v. Posten Const. Co., 804 S.W.3d 743, 744 (Mo. banc 1991). Said review of issues of Law is de novo. Scholastic, Inc. v. Viley 452 S.W.3d 680, 682 (Mo.App.W.D. 2014). This court reviews findings of the Commission not the ALJ. Lawrence v. Anheuser Busch Cos. Inc., 310 S.W.3d 248, 250 (Mo.App.E.D. 2010). Where, as here, the Commission affirms and incorporates the ALJ's decision into its award, this Court reviews the findings of the ALJ as adopted by the Commission. Cardwell v. Treasurer of the State of Missouri, 249 S.W.3d 902, 906 (Mo.App.E.D. 2008).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Argument

Lalk examined Employee at the request of Susan Roach for her 2008 injury to her bladder July 15, 2014 (T.593-594). Following the evaluation, he contacted Roach for additional medical records but never received a response (T.595). Later Employee's current counsel, provided medical records to complete the evaluation.

At Lalk's deposition, the Fund asked if he "relied" on the summary of Shuter's March 3, 2012 in coming to his conclusions that Employee was PTD (T.634). Based on the Fund's definition of "rely," Lalk said yes.

The Commission found Lalk detailed Shuter's comprehensive rating report at two places in his "Review" portion and, later in the report, under "Functional Restrictions/Limitations" just preceding Summary and Conclusions (L.F. 56). He further found because, Lalk expressly admitted he relied on Shuter's findings in forming his own conclusions, he excluded the entire deposition from evidence based on hearsay. Bruflat v. Mister Guy, Inc., 933 S.W.2d 829, 833 (Mo.App. 1996) (L.F. 22).

In the Bruflat case the Commission excluded portions of a medical expert testimony concerning disability that reflected reliance on an inadmissible report of a psychologist. The court noted that the testimony as to the amount of disability did not rely solely on facts outside the inadmissible opinion of the psychologist but instead totally deferred to the opinion of another expert as to disability. Id at 834. The court held that a testifying expert cannot be a mere conduit for another non-testifying expert and agreed that the Commission's order to exclude that portion of the medical expert's opinion that parroted the inadmissible medical expert opinion was not an abuse of discretion.

A fair review of Lalk's testimony shows that it was Sky's limitations from her mental conditions that led to his conclusion that she was unable to compete in the open labor market and unemployable:

> .....Now what was important to me is a psychiatrist to comment about prognosis and/or any restrictions for the individual or at least a discussion of what he thought would be difficult for an individual to do, and he indicated that because of her psychiatric condition, that she would have poor focus, concentration and attention and would be very difficult for her to follow both simple as well as complex instructions. It would be very difficult for her to adapt to both routine as well as more complex work changes, as well as perform repetitive work according to set procedures, sequences or pace, and he expected her to respond inappropriately to the customer pressures at work and have difficulty with production quotas as well as interactions with co-workers and supervisors. So that would indicate to me that the types of work environment that she needs to avoid (T.613).

Lalk's summaries of Shuter's report references only medical causation, PPD ratings of both wrists and the existence of pre-existing medical conditions that were hindrances or obstacles to obtaining employment (T.685, 694). Lalk's summaries cite no opinion from Dr. Shuter commenting on the Employee's PTD status.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

In Garrett v. Treasurer, 215 S.W.3d 244, 249 (Mo.App.S.D. 2007), the court cited §490.065, RSMo., which provides that an expert opinion based on another expert's opinion is not necessarily inadmissible. The record here does not support that Lalk "parroted" opinions of Shuter. To the contrary Lalk's 3+ hour interview, testing and review of admissible medical evidence clearly provided the basis for his opinion that the Employee was not able to compete, secure and maintain employment in the open labor market (T.630). Lalk testified that physically the Employee could perform in an unskilled, sedentary or near sedentary position, if she had access to a restroom. He concluded that her primary reason that prevented her from employment is due to her pre-existing psychiatric conditions that would affect her concentration, pace and place her near co-workers or the public giving rise to increase in her psychiatric conditions (T.630). He cited Dr. Sky's diagnosis of severe recurrent depression, anxiety disorder and PTSD that damaged the Employee's focus, concentration and attention for other types of work. He concluded she would be ineffective with both routine, complex and repetitive work and difficulty responding to the customer pressures, production quotas and interactions with co-workers and supervisors (T.613). Lalk has expert experience in placing individuals with mental conditions having worked at the Independence Center in St. Louis which placed individuals with mental conditions in jobs (T.585-586). Lalk's conclusions regarding employability did not parrot what he cited by Shuter. Information about the Employee's physical limitations from Dr. German, physical therapist Meier, and later Dr. Volarich all document the extreme weakness in her hands that eliminated her past unskilled work. Lalk's report written prior to Dr. Shuter's death that may have consider physical difficulties in employability cannot be removed from that report. But he again reviewed the additional information from Dr. Volarich which supported the weaknesses documented by the physical therapist Greg Meier in May as 22 lbs. on right and 11 lbs. on left (T.214). Dr. German on June 24, 2009 found 30 lbs. on right and 22 lbs. on left (T.209). Both significantly below normal findings. Dr. German does not measure her grip strength on his last visit, but notes she is still symptomatic and would like for her to return and does not release her to work, only to use her hands as much as possible (T.209).

The Commission's exclusion of Lalk's entire deposition is an abuse of discretion as the minor references to Shuter's findings did not comment on employability. Lalk's analysis was based on review of multiple admissible records, his experience and expertise, testing he performed and the age, education and work experience of the Employee. He has unique expertise from his work at the Independent Center, St. Louis, in assessing the employability of individuals who suffer from mental conditions.

II.

The Commission misapplied the law in excluding Dr. Volarich's testimony that concurred with Lalk's assessment that the Employee was PTD as there was no objection timely made on this issue, Volarich did not rely only stated they concurred on this issue, and Volarich did review psychiatric records so the exclusion of Volarich's conclusions on PTD is an abuse of discretion and should be reversed.

Treasurer of the State of Missouri,* 249 S.W.3d 902, 906 (Mo.App.E.D. 2008).

Argument

The Commission adopted the evidentiary decisions of the ALJ who on his own and without an objection raised by the Fund, excluded portions of Dr. Volarich's opinion that specifically referenced Lalk's assessment that the Employee was permanently and totally disabled in large part due to her psychiatric disorders (T.52). At the Hearing, the Fund only objected to any portion of Volarich's report that referenced reliance on Shuter's opinion (T.52). Volarich's deposition was submitted without an objection regarding Lalk's testimony and as such is admissible in this instance as he only concurred and did not rely on Lalk's testimony (T.517). Nichols v. Belleview R-IIII School District, 528 S.W.3d 918, 930 (Mo.App.S.D. 2017); Proffer v. Federal Mogul Corp., 341 S.W.3d 184, 187 (Mo.App.S.D. 2011). Adequacy of the factual or scientific foundation for expert opinion is an admissibility issue which is waived absent a timely objection or motion to strike. Proffer, 341 S.W.3d at 187. Expert testimony, admitted without objection, can be considered as any other evidence in determining the submissibility of the case. Id.

As stated in Point I, there is no evidence that Shuter had opined that the Employee was PTD. Volarich testified he reviewed a great deal of medical records and reports, but came to his own conclusions regarding his assessments of the Employee's conditions (T.520-521). Finally he never said he relied on Lalk's testimony on employability:

> Based on my evaluation, review of the medical records and review of the vocational assessment that was completed on 8/4/17 by Mr. Lalk, vocational assessment could not identify a job for which she could return to, I thought that she was permanently and totally disabled primarily as a result of her psychiatric disorders, I concurred with that assessment (T.517).

The Commission's second proffered basis for excluding Volarich's testimony on employability was a finding that Volarich had failed to review any medical evidence regarding her treatment for psychiatric conditions in forming his conclusion (L.F.56). The ALJ found only one reference in Volarich's report that referenced the Employee's chronic psychiatric illness (L.F.56). This overlooks Volarich's testimony that he did review Lalk's and Sky's reports (T.499); records of Psychiatrist Chilikamarri and treatment records of Dr. Pope. Volarich also noted her medications for psychiatric conditions (T.510-511). He also reviewed the Chrysler Clinic records which provided references of treatment for mental conditions. He noticed and commented on her psychiatric problems that affected her ability to communicate to him at the evaluation (T.503-504). He testified that he felt she had a psychiatric disability but deferred to psychiatry for that assessment. Clearly the Commission has the authority and function to determine factual findings and credibility of witnesses and the weight to be given to their testimony. Cook v. Missouri Highway & Transp. Comm'n, 500 S.W.3d 917, 923 (Mo.App.S.D. 2016). However, here the Commission's determination that Volarich testified he relied on Lalk's opinion for employability is not present as that is not a correct statement of his testimony. The conclusion he reviewed no psychiatric records is also contrary to his testimony. The Commission's decision to exclude is not based on substantial evidence that supports the exclusion of a portion of Volarich's testimony that concerned his conclusion that she is PTD because of combined conditions from her pre-existing physical and psychiatric conditions and the primary injury to her hands.

III.

The Commission misapplied the law in requiring symptoms of a pre-existing psychiatric condition for a PTD finding as it is not required and in failing to find "actual and measurable" conditions for PPD as psychiatric conditions are complex and the Commission improperly disregarded competent substantial expert evidence and erroneously relied on lay conjecture and opinion.

Standard of Review

The Commission's factual findings are binding and conclusive to the extent they are supported by sufficient competent evidence and were reached in the absence of fraud. Archer v. City of Cameron, 460 S.W.3d 775, 778 (Mo. banc 2014). Argument

The Commission found there was no pre-existing psychiatric condition only post claim worsening. They outline their reasons to disregard expert testimony and rely on their lay opinion as follows:

1. Sky relied on inadmissible evidence, two letters from Cometa (L.F.61).
2. ALJ found a "timely" objection in Sky's deposition testimony that characterized the Cometa letters as "records" was "misleading to the reader" and weighed against Sky's opinion (LF.57, 407).
3. No medical records from Chilikamarri pre- accident to review (LF.57).
4. Sky admitted he did not review the records from the Employee's hospitalization in March 23-27, 2009, at St Anthony's Hospital (LF.57).
5. Lack of treating records for mental conditions prior to 2009, except for Pope, who was not a psychiatrist and who noted "undeveloped references to "mild distress" and "mood disorder" (LF.58).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Electronically Filed - EASTERN DISTRICT CT OF APPEALS - June 04, 2021 - 03:47 PM

6. Sky's opinion relied only on anecdotal evidence from the Employee (LF.58).

7. The ALJ observed the Employee's demeanor at trial as normal, not suggestive of anger or sadness. He mentioned her domestic issues throughout adulthood as impacting her psychological condition. He further found the Employee's single reference that she felt "suicidal" was not credible when there were no pre-claim hospitalization or treatment records corroborate this assertion (LF 46, 60)

8. Therapist Toon treated Employee from 2008-2009 for difficulties dealing with personal, family and martial illness (LF.46).

9. Employee attended a part-time day clinic for stress in late February 2009 (LF.46).

10. The Employee's mental conditions got worse post primary injury (T.46).

Dr. Sky is a board-certified psychiatrist (T.459). He conducted a medical examination of the Employee which included a history of mental health difficulties and treatment. He diagnosed major depression, recurrent, anxiety and PTSD. He testified that all three overlapped on each other adding to a difficult and worse impact on the Employee (T.424). It was his unrefuted expert opinion that these psychiatric conditions were present prior to the claim filed and synergistically combined and were made worse by the difficulties she had using her hands as a result of the development of bilateral carpal tunnel syndrome (T.425). He also concluded that her pre-existing psychiatric condition, which was well documented, represented a pre-existing PPD of 35% body as a whole pre-claim, and due to the claim and limited improvement following medical care she became 100% disabled in combination (T.426).

The reasons the Commission provided in disregarding expert opinion on the Employee's mental conditions is not sufficient, substantial and also mistaken. Sky did not have the Cometa letters at the time of his May 15, 2017, report in which he made his conclusions, so no reliance on the letters (T.464). The reference of treatment in his report came from the Employee's medical history (T.465). Next, the Commission and ALJ found Sky's testimony less credible as he referred to the Cometa letters as records. The ALJ alleges that an objection was made at the time of this statement, but none appears at the cite the ALJ provides which was page 14 of Dr. Sky's deposition (T.407). Objections to improper form during a deposition should be stated concisely on the record during the deposition, to provide a reasonable opportunity to correct the form of the question. Dr. Sky did not use the word records, he only stated that he reviewed the letters (T.405). In addition, other evidence of treatment of Employee by Cometa is documented in admissible evidence from Chrysler Clinic (T.93). The Commission's finding that Sky could not consider facts not in evidence to form an opinion or inference misapplies the law as it is permissible if the facts otherwise comply with §490.065.2 RSMo. 2017. Information of prior psychiatric treatment from medical history is such permissible evidence.

The Employee testified that she first came under the care of Dr. Chilikamarri when she was sent by her employer to the Stress Program in 2007 (T.34, 36, 98). Because Chilikamarri treated her at the program, he was the psychiatrist who admitted her to the hospital in March, 2009 (T.242). She began privately treating with him after the hospitalization (T.232). The Commission found that Sky did not review the St. Anthony's records of March, 2009 (T.437). Sky did not have the records at the time of the Employee's interview, but did review them later as he testified to the admission record's past reference to a suicide attempt of Employee at age 13 (T.438). Regardless of the review of the hospital records there was sufficient and substantial admissible evidence available to him that he did review that is consistent and supported of his analysis diagnosis of the Employee's mental conditions and their impact on her life.

Sky did review the records of Dr. Pope, who recorded on October 16, 2007, the Employee's mental problems arising from physical/emotional abuse as a child, and current spousal abuse (T.133). Pope's records noted Employee's past counseling and prescriptions of Paxil, Wellbutrin and Klonopin for depression. On October 16, 2007, he noted her transient thoughts of self-harm. He prescribed her Effexor for depression and Valium for anxiety (T.133). He continued to prescribe her medication for chronic depression which was moderate in severity (T.129-130). Sky also had the medical records from Dr. Hugge who prescribed medication for the Employee's depression on September 15, 2005, and May 26, 2006 (T.169, 172-173). To find Sky not credible on the inaccurate basis that he failed to read the post claim hospital records is not a reasonable basis as it cites no information that was not already available in the other admissible medical evidence listed above that he did review.

The Commission is correct that there are no prior records of a hospitalization for mental conditions prior to March, 2009. There is no requirement in the statute that any of the pre-existing injuries or conditions be "symptomatic" The requirement is simply that the Commission must find that the combination of the last injury and the pre-existing disabilities resulted in PTD.[4] Atchinson v. Mo State Treas. Custodian of the 2nd Injury Fund, 603 S.W.3d 719 (Mo.App.S.D. 2020).

The Commission also adopted the ALJ's opinion that the Employee's testimony that she felt "suicidal" prior to the claim was not credible. The Commission acknowledges that there are treating records from therapist Toon who counseled her at the stress program for 3 weeks in 2007, and then privately beginning December 15, 2007, to July 31, 2009 (T.35, 194-204). The Commission characterizes Toon's treatment as "difficulties with personal, family and martial problems". An analysis of an individual's mental conditions is a complex medical issue and not within the understanding of lay opinion. Toon's records prior to the date the claim was filed reflect the Employee's lifelong depression and anxiety with daily SI. The Employee reported childhood neglect and abuse, currently exacerbated by the amount of physical work she was doing at the [4] The determination of PTD requires the court to determine whether the Employee's last injury in and of itself rendered the Employee PTD, then the Second Injury Fund has no liability and employer is responsible for the entire amount. *Hughey v. Chrysler Fenton Plant, affecting her health. Ms. Toon's diagnosis on December 15, 2007, was Major Depression, recurrent, Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder and Generalized Anxiety Disorder with gambling addiction (T.195). Ms. Toon's records reflects SI, 11 times in 19 visits prior to the primary claim (T.196-202). On December 6, 2008, and January 8 and 9 of 2009, Toon notes severe symptoms of depression, anxiety with suicidal reports related to multiple issues, physical health and her husband's mental and verbal abuse. Toon discussed possibility of re-entering Chrysler's Partial Day Hospital program for a short period of time due to the severity of her depression, but the Employee declined (T.201-202). She eventually enters the Partial Day program on February 25, 2009 (T.203). Toon's records were reviewed by Sky in conjunction with the Employee's evaluation. The Commission's characterization of the Employee's mental conditions lacks the medical training required in this complex diagnosis of past and current trauma from abusive relationships affecting her mental functioning. The hospitalization that occurred approximately 5 weeks postdate the claim an exacerbation of her lifelong mental conditions as explained by Dr. Sky (T. 450).

Sky diagnosed the Employee with Major Depression, recurrent, Generalized Anxiety Disorder and Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder based on his evaluation and her medical records. He found that she had pre-existing permanent psychiatric disability which synergistically worsened by the primary injury to her hands that slowed her down in her job (T.426). Dr. Volarich also testified regarding the psychiatric condition contributing to the Employee's inability to compete in the open labor market. Dr. Pope, Dr. Hugge, Dr. German, therapist Toon, and Lalk all comment on her mental conditions.

Chrysler clinic records show she lost time from work due to depression/anxiety on March 26, 2002, October 7 to November 20 in 2007, and again on December 3, 2007.

The Fund presented no evidence that contradict Sky's conclusions that the Employee had a pre-existing psychiatric condition of 35%. The Fund presented no expert opinion that the psychiatric condition did not combine with her primary injury or that it worsened post claim. The diagnosis of mental illness, and its origins, is a complex medical condition which is not within common knowledge or experience of a lay person and requires medical expert testimony which here was supported by the medical expertise of psychiatrist Adam Sky, M.D. Pruett v. Fed Mogul Corp. 365 S.W.3d 296, 306 (Mo.App.S.D. 2012); Wright v. Sports Associated, Inc., 887 S.W.2d 596 (Mo.App.W.D. 1994). The Commission lay's analysis of the Employee's psychiatric conditions is grossly inadequate. The Commission took extreme measures to remove as much expert testimony as possible, but even so what remains is evidence of a 50-year-old worker whose abusive childhood regrettably affected her ability to establish and maintain work and personal relationships that led to 5 marriages, difficulties with her children and people with whom she worked.

The Commission is given deference on issues involving the credibility of witnesses and the weight to be given testimony. They also may decide a case 'upon its disbelief of uncontradicted and unimpeached testimony'. Angus v Second Injury Fund, 328 S.W.3d

However, " the commission may not substitute an ALJ's personal opinion on the question of medical causation of [an injury] for the uncontradicted testimony of a qualified medical expert." Wright v. Sports Associated, Inc. 887 S.W.2d 596, 600 (Mo. Banc 1994). When "expert medical testimony is presented, an ALJ's personal views of [the evidence] cannot provide a sufficient basis to decide the causation question, at least where the ALJ fails to account for the relevant medical testimony." Van Winkle v. Lewellens Prof'l Cleaning, Inc., 258 S.W.3d 889, 898 (Mo.App. 2008). The Commission's adoption of the ALJ's determination of the Employee's mental condition based on her demeanor at a hearing or Dr. The credibility of Dr. Sky's diagnosis of mental conditions and the effect on the Employee's functioning is based on no other expert medical testimony necessary for a complex medical condition. They are substituting their unqualified lay opinion for that of an expert witness and ignores too much of the admitted record and rests on an uneducated understanding of the effects PTSD, depression and anxiety.

On this complex issue the Commission may not arbitrarily disregard or ignore competent, substantial, and undisputed evidence of witnesses not impeached or base its finding on conjecture or its own opinion unsupported by sufficient evidence. Bond v. Site

Line Surveying, 322 S.W.3d 165, 171 (Mo.App.W.D. 2010). The Commission's finding that Dr. Sky's conclusions were less than credible are not reasonable. The determination as to the presence of a psychiatric condition pre-existing and how it combined with the un-employability of the Employee once she had additional work difficulties because of her weak hands should be properly acknowledged as the Commission cannot substitute their opinion on this complex matter. The finding of no pre-existence of a mental condition should have been considered in determining PTD and PPD.

IV.

The Commission's misapplied the law in finding that the primary injury settlement for 16% of each wrist was so "modest" that it could not combine to make her totally disabled as §287.220.1 does not require a threshold on primary injury to combine with a pre-existing condition.

The plain language of §287.220.1 does not require a threshold on the primary injury or occupational conditions to combine with a pre-existing disability. Further, this section only requires that the pre-existing partial disability be of some minimal hindrance or obstacle to employment or to obtaining re-employment. V.

The commission misapplied the law in not Awarding PTD or PPD for combined mental conditions, right shoulder, incontinence and her hand injuries against the Fund as the reasonable consideration of the evidence supports including the psychiatric condition as a pre-existing condition and the Award is against the overwhelming weight of the evidence.

(3) Demonstrate why the evidence from the second step lacks sufficient probative force on the issues, such that the Commission could not have reasonably believed the factual position set forth in step one.

The Employee has the burden of proof, so the question is not whether there was sufficient evidence to support an award in his favor, but to determine whether the award of the Commission is supported by competent evidence, not whether an opposing award could have been made. *Dehatre v. There is no requirement that the pre-existing disability for PTD be "actual and measurable" to trigger Fund liability for PTD benefits. Lewis v. Treasurer of Mo., 435 S.W.3d 144, 160 (Mo.App.E.D. 2014). The requirement of "actual and measurable" affects applies to cases involving Fund liability for PPD benefits as such calculation requires the knowledge and consideration of the degree or percentage of disability of the pre-existing disability. Id. at 160.

Argument

In this case the Employee sought recovery for PTD pursuant to §287.220.1 The Fund is liable where the Employee establishes that she is PTD due to the combination of her present compensation injury and her pre-existing PPD or that the combination of the present compensable injury and the pre-existing PPD creates a greater overall disability than the sum of the disabilities independently. Highley v. Von Weise Gear, 247 S.W.3d 52, 55 (Mo.App.E.D. 2008). Here the Commission determined that the present injury to her hands did not render her PTD but did support a PPD of 16% of each hand and a load for bilateral injuries. The Commission further found pre-existing PPD of the right shoulder and the presence of incontinence. They found no pre-existing disability that represented an "obstacle or hinderance" to employment or was" actual and measurable" arising from a mental condition. As previously laid out in the brief, this finding is based on their lay opinion interpreting a complex medical condition. that They found the documentation in the admissible medical records prior to the primary injury represented "difficulties with personal relationships" or "mood disorder" and as such did not represent medical condition that met either requirements for PTD or PPD.

On credibility, they found the Employee less than credible based on her demeanor at trial (no display of sadness or anger) and her severity of complaints not compatible with the 16% settlement of each wrist. They also opined that there was a post claim worsening of mental problems with a hospitalization that is the cause of her PTD. Dr. Malik's note that that she could work full duty if she were not on sick leave for mental conditions as reasons (L.F. 45-46). They further concluded dislike of working as a "floater," her divorce and plant shutdown contributed to her not working. The Commission believed a reasonable inference that the Employee chose to retire due to several life factors that occurred, aside from the level of disability she was experiencing (L.F. 46).

The implicitly found Volarich credible except for his statements concerning his conclusion that she had a mental condition that pre-existed the primary claim that represented an obstacle of hindrance to employment and was the greater factor in finding her PTD.

The Commission by excluding vocational expert Lalk's deposition did not consider his conclusions.

The Commission admitted Dr. Sky's deposition as there were no Fund objections but found the psychiatrist conclusions "less credible" as set out in Point III of this brief.

What evidence is left are medical records of the Employee's therapist Toon, her family physician, Dr Pope, records from the plant Clinic and her gynecologist Dr. Hugge. The statements of treatment for mental conditions that rise above the absurd one time lay observation of the Employee's demeanor at the hearing. Toon is a mental health therapist trained and Dr. Pope as a family practitioner also trained to recognize the status of his patient's mental conditions and provided treatment as did Dr. Hugge. They all had numerous encounters with the Employee prior to the claim being filed. The plant clinic records also document disruptions from her mental health conditions for which the company directed her to the stress day program.

As previously stated the presence of a mental condition is a complex diagnosis and requires expert medical opinion (Dr. Sky), which was admitted without objections by the Fund. Deciding whether someone has PTSD, or is just crabby is based on expert analysis and not personal opinion. In finding a diagnosis of Depression the Commission required a "record of a prior hospitalization" as evidence of a pre-existing mental condition when no such evidence is required for a PTD award. But even if it were, the post hospitalization records so note a prior suicide attempt at the age of 13. There is no such requirement that a pre-existing disability must be present and measurable to trigger Fund liability for PTD benefits. Lewis v Treasurer of State 435 S.W.3d 144, 160 (Mo.App.E.D. 2014). For PPD, Dr. Sky found the Employee had 35% PPD related to her mental conditions. The Plant Clinic records document her loss time and attendance for mental health issues dating back to 2002. Her supervisor sent her to the plant clinic do to her inability to work due to crying on the line. Toon's records beginning in 2007 document her mental conditions arising from childhood and spousal abuse.

The presence of Employee's psychiatric conditions and symptoms before and after the primary claim differ not in kind, but rather in degree. When the damage to her hands removed her out of a Chrysler unskilled job that limited co- Employee/supervisor contact, she became unemployable as discussed by Dr. Sky, Dr. Volarich and Lalk. Even Dr. Malik points to her mental health issues as preventing her from returning to her job.

Dr. Sky diagnosed the Employee with Major Depression, recurrent, Generalized Anxiety Disorder and Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder based on his evaluation and her medical records. He found that she had pre-existing permanent psychiatric disability which synergistically worsened by the primary injury to her hands (T. 426). Sky explains that the Employee's lifelong mental conditions are not new, but recurrent and exacerbated at various times. Her physical problems were just enough to combine and interfere in her ability to continual in a job that did allow her to work with minimal interactions with other Employees. The hospitalization in March of 2009 was evidence of her mental conditions that have affected her ability to function in a normal way. He notes that Toon felt the Employee's inability to cope with a divorce and physical problems were on the rise shortly before she had an EMG/NCS on February 10, 2009. Her inability to cope was compromised by her mental conditions:

A. You know, I don't know that we have a specific reason why she was angry at her boss, but people who are depressed, people who have anxiety disorders, who have been traumatized, will oftentimes make comments like that, I'm so mad at you, I could just kill you …or I wish you were dead. So those kinds of impulsive comments or statements would certainly not be unusual in someone with a history of severe mood symptoms.

Q. She's the kind of person that wouldn't do well working with other people, correct?

A. In my experience, no.

Q. Okay. So doing this kind of assembly work, where she was somewhat isolated from other people would be the only kind of work, maybe , that she might be –I mean , can you think of __

A. Well as long as it did not require her to work to any degree of pace. You know – you got to work faster and you know – and someone sooner or later is going to say, hey, you know, you're not working fast enough, or that's not an accurate enough job, or you did sloppy work. Sooner or later, you're going to have to interact with a supervisor. You're going to have to follow safety guidelines. So even if you're working off by yourself in some imaginary isolated booth somewhere, there's going to be issues that come up. (T.456-457).

Dr. Volarich clearly reviewed all he medical evidence that had numerous references to the claimant's psychiatric conditions including Dr. Sky's opinion on her lack of employability due to her psychiatric conditions. Based on review of all this information he concurred that the psychological condition was a major factor interfering in her employability.

The Commission's finding that there was no evidence of psychiatric symptoms prior to the primary claim ignores the documentation of medical evidence and a lack of understanding of a complex medical condition which is found her medical providers records. The Commission does not find a reasonable basis to discredit Sky's and Volarich's testimony, that the psychiatric conditions only arose post claim. A requirement of a hospitalization prior to the primary claim is not required. The presence of a short hospitalization post primary claim represents of a temporary occurrence. The issues she had from her mental problems before her primary claim that affected her relationships and communications with people were still present after the primary claim. The Primary claim added yet another limitation that made continuing to work not an option. The degree of treatment is not in issue. The degree that her psychiatric condition compromised her ability to function in a job in conjunction with weaker hands, a bad shoulder in her dominant arm, incontinence and limitations on pushing and pulling are the factors that eliminated her from employability. Because of her psychiatric conditions and unskilled work, she was limited to a job that did not require focus, concentration or pace and would have safety and production quotas (T.431-432). Sky concluded the combine pre-existing and primary claim combine and produce a hindrance and obstacle to employment making her unable to compete in the open labor market (T.468). That expert testimony on such a complex issue of mental health is supported by the admissible documentation of mental health and physical conditions and should not be discredited.

CONCLUSION

For the reasons stated above, the Commission's evidentiary decisions excluding Lalk's testimony should be reversed, as the Lalk conclusions involved the employability of the Employee and there is no evidence in the record that Dr. Shuter commented on the Employee's employability. Unidentified portions of Dr. Volarich's testimony that agreed that the Employee had a psychiatric condition, and it combined with her physical disability to PTD, should not have been excluded. The Commission's finding that the disabilities had to be certified by a physician is not required by the statute. The credibility findings of all the witnesses are against the overwhelming weight of the evidence. The Employee has met her burden under (1) that her pre-existing permanent disabilities were serious enough to constitute a hindrance or obstacle to her employment or re-employment; (2) the nature and extent of her pre-existing permanent disabilities by a reasonable degree of certainty; and (3) that she is permanently and totally disabled due to combination of her pre-existing permanent disabilities and her primary injury. The court should reverse and find the Fund liable for her permanent total disability. The Commission's decision is not reasonable based on the documentation and presence of interruptions affecting the Employee's work as a result of mental illness. Their decision is not supported by sufficient competent evidence and is against the overwhelming weight of the evidence. In the alternative, if the Court finds insufficient evidence that the Employee is PTD, there is clearly presence of a pre-existing mental conditions that were "actual and measurable" as concluded by Dr. Sky in his rating of 35%. The Court should reverse and find Dr. Sky's unimpeached rating of 35% be combined with the PPD award that includes the Employee's mental conditions.

FINAL AWARD ALLOWING COMPENSATION

(Affirming Award and Decision of Administrative Law Judge with Supplemental Opinion)

Injury No.: 09-015610

Employee: Patricia (Parrish) Otwell

Employer: Chrysler, LLC (settled)

Insurer: Old Carco, LLC (settled)

Additional Party: Treasurer of Missouri as Custodian of Second Injury Fund

This workers' compensation case is submitted to the Labor and Industrial Relations Commission (Commission) for review as provided by § 287.480 RSMo. Having reviewed the evidence, read the parties' briefs, heard the parties' arguments, and considered the whole record, we find that the award of the administrative law judge allowing compensation is supported by competent and substantial evidence and was made in accordance with the Missouri Workers' Compensation Law. Pursuant to § 286.090 RSMo, we affirm the award and decision of the administrative law judge with this supplemental opinion.

Preliminaries

Hearing was conducted on March 6, 2019, with employee and the Treasurer of Missouri as Custodian of the Second Injury Fund (Fund) participating. Employee's date of injury for the work-related wrist injury was February 10, 2009. In February 2010, employee had settled with Employer/Insurer prior to the hearing. The sole issue before the administrative law judge was whether and to what extent Second Injury Fund liability existed.

The administrative law judge ruled as follows: Employee's primary disability for bilateral carpal tunnel syndrome is 16% referable to each wrist (56 weeks). The preexisting disability referable to urinary incontinence is 2.5% PPD[1] of the body as a whole (10 weeks). The right shoulder preexisting disability is found to be 15% (34.8 weeks). There is no significant pre-existing psychiatric disability. The primary injury and preexisting right shoulder and incontinence combined for greater overall disability, to an increased overall PPD of 33 1/3% body as a whole (133.32 weeks). The synergistic effect results in an additional 32.52 weeks of PPD liability against the Fund.

An application for review[2] was filed by employee on July 15, 2019, setting forth the following issues: the administrative law judge erred in not admitting certain exhibits and portions of testimony; finding that employee did not have a preexisting psychological disability; finding diminished credibility of Dr. Adam Sky; and in not finding permanent total disability or an increased level of permanent partial disability, in combination with all preexisting disabilities, including psychological.

[1] PPD refers to permanent partial disability.

[2] We note that employee's application for review identifies an Injury # of 09-05732 and a date of injury as February 10, 2009. It appears that the Injury # identified by employee is a typographical error, although the date of injury is correct. The correct Injury # is 09-015610.

An application for review was filed by the Fund on July 16, 2019, setting forth the issue: the administrative law judge erred in finding a synergistic combination between employee's alleged pre-existing disabilities and her current primary disability, such that a 33.333% load factor was warranted.

Corrections

At page 1 of the Award, item # 13, the Award states:

> 13. Part(s) of body injured by accident or occupational disease: Low Back

This is in error. The primary injury claimed by employee is bilateral carpal tunnel syndrome.

We correct the Award at page 1, item # 13 as follows:

> 13. Part(s) of body injured by accident or occupational disease: bilateral carpal tunnel syndrome

At page 2 of the Award, item # 23, the Award states:

> 23. Future requirements awarded: prescription drugs (see narrative award)

This is in error, as the only two parties to the hearing were the Second Injury Fund and the employee. No liability would extend to the Fund for prescription drugs under the law.

We correct the Award at page 2, item # 23, as follows:

> 23. Future requirements awarded: Not Applicable.

Evidentiary Rulings

Employee challenges several evidentiary rulings by the administrative law judge, and requests that we review them. The objections by the Fund to employee's request to admit certain exhibits were taken under submission at the hearing, and were ruled on in the Award at page 4 - 6. The administrative law judge upheld some of the objections to the evidence, as explained in the Award and decision. We adopt the administrative law judge's rulings in sustaining the objections as noted in the Award. We see no abuse of discretion in these rulings.

Supplemental Findings of Fact:

The administrative law judge was able to observe the employee's demeanor at the hearing.[3]

On that basis and in consideration of the evidence presented, he was able to make some observations and conclusions in a summary fashion, regarding the level of claimed disability and employee's representations of her injuries and conditions. As he noted in his Findings of Fact on page 3:

[3] In his Rulings of Law at page 8, the administrative law judge also noted his observation of claimant's demeanor at trial as normal, not suggestive of anger or sadness. He mentioned her domestic issues throughout adulthood as impacting her psychological condition. In reference to her credibility, he noted the lack of records of hospitalization or treatment records to corroborate her claim of suicidal thoughts pre-dating the primary injury.

5. Claimant[4] testified she retired in February 2009. She was briefly hospitalized in March 2009 for depression and anxiety. Claimant testified very confidently and easily followed the Q and A format. Her residual complaints and characterizations of the primary injury exceeded reasonable inferences that might be made from the approved settlement value.

The record further corroborates and expands upon the judge's findings.

Employee believes her last day of work at the employer's plant was February 25, 2009, before being off for medical reasons. Transcript, page 40-41. However, employee remained as an employee for some time after February 25, 2009. She was in a partial day clinic provided by the employer because she was unable to work due to a health condition in the early months of 2009. Chrysler clinic records show various physical complaints reported by employee through her employment, including the later months of 2008 (coinciding with her bladder symptoms) and several months in 2009.

From March 23 - 27, 2009, employee was briefly hospitalized due to mental health issues. She indicated that she had suicidal thoughts and nothing was going right with her home and husband. Transcript, page 42. There is no record in evidence of hospitalization for mental health prior to that time.

Elaine Toon, Licensed Professional Counselor, saw employee for therapy on and off in 2008 - 2009. Employee attended a part-time day clinic for stress sponsored by her employer in late February 2009. Notes from some of those sessions suggest employee had difficulties dealing with personal, family and marital issues.

In April 2009, employee underwent bilateral carpal tunnel surgeries, performed by Dr. David German.

The last entry in the Chrysler clinic records which were provided[5] is on May 1, 2009. There are two entries on that date; one indicates "Non-Occupational Visit-stress Leave", and the second indicates "RT Shoulder Sprain & Bil hand/." Transcript, page 108. The entry indicates the nature of an upcoming assignment "if she is not currently on sick leave and that she will be full duty in regards to both hands." The projected date is obscured on the copy of the record. Id. Following the entry is the name MALAK MD. Id.

Employee believes she may have returned to work for a few days after her hand surgeries, but that she "…didn't like just floating. And I would try to get a job but I never would qualify, I was afraid." Transcript, page 43. Thereafter she took retirement.

At the time employee chose to accept a retirement option from the employer in May 2009, the plant where she had been working was in the process of closing. Employee moved back to Alabama.

[4] The parties and the administrative law judge refer to the claimant in several instances. We use the term employee as defined in the statute at §288.020 RSMo. Throughout this Final Award, those terms are interchangeable.

[5] Discussion on the record suggests that there was some difficulty in retrieving all records, due to the clinic closure. Transcript pages 32-35.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Employee applied for Social Security disability around the time of ending her employment.

Employee underwent a mesh removal surgery in July 2009, related to complications from her October 2008 bladder surgery which had been to address incontinence.

Dr. David German released her from care on September 14, 2009 and identified only a 5% permanent partial disability at the wrist. No future medical treatment was identified by the doctor. Transcript, page 68. Employee had no disability rating or restrictions identified for psychiatric conditions at that time. Dr. Volarich noted that he didn't think she had restrictions for the right shoulder strain prior to primary wrist injury in February 2009. Transcript, page 518. She had no permanent restrictions identified for her incontinence issue, however, Dr. Volarich explained that lifting excessive weight in excess of 10 pounds would put pressure on the abdomen and could cause incontinence. Employee's work experience has been in factory work, which required lifting and pulling,

Given all these circumstances, a reasonable inference is that at the time employee chose to take her retirement, there were several life factors impacting that decision, aside from the level of disability she was experiencing.

Discussion

Synergy

For Fund liability in a permanent partial disability case, there must be a substantially greater disability resulting from the combination of the primary injury and the preexisting condition(s) claimed. §287.220.2 RSMo. In order to prove such a synergistic effect between a primary injury and preexisting condition, there must be proof that the two conditions interacted in such a way that the total disability is greater than the mere sum of the two disability ratings.

The point of reference for when this synergistic combination is to be evaluated is at the time of the primary injury, in this case February 10, 2009. So we look to what the evidence shows at the time of injury, and whether employee had other hindrances or obstacles to employment or re-employment. If so, did those conditions combine with the primary disability to create the required synergistic effect?

A right shoulder strain injury was identified as a preexisting condition. We adopt the judge's rating of 15% PPD (34.8 weeks). It is reasonable to make a connection between two injuries to the upper extremities, in this case a bilateral injury to the wrists creating a synergistic effect with the right shoulder. Dr. Volarich explained this synergistic effect in the adjustments employee had to make to adapt to certain functions on the job, given these two conditions.

The preexisting incontinence disability was rated at 2.5% PPD. The administrative law judge found a synergistic effect between upper and lower body. Given that employee's work experience has been limited to factory work, involving pushing and pulling at various weights and pressure exertions, these job components would further be affected by a disabling incontinence condition interacting with the upper body limitations.

We agree with the administrative law judge's ruling that the psychological conditions which employee identifies are not clearly proven as disabling at the time of the February 10, 2009 primary injury. In that regard, employee has not met the first step of the analysis before we would evaluate whether there is a synergistic effect in combination with the primary injury. We also agree with the judge's recognition that post-injury worsening of a condition, (unless it is caused or aggravated by the work injury), is not properly placed on the liability of the Fund. Likewise, the bladder condition required further surgery in July 2009, and any subsequent worsening of that condition would not be attributable to the Fund.

Therefore, we adopt the findings of the administrative law judge regarding Fund liability based on the synergistic effect of the preexisting incontinence issue and right shoulder injury with the primary carpal tunnel injuries. The Fund is liable for an additional 32.52 weeks of PPD, based on the disability ratings found by the administrative law judge, and his finding of a 33 1/3% load factor.

Conclusion

We affirm and adopt the award of the administrative law judge as supplemented herein.

The award and decision of Administrative Law Judge Joseph E. Denigan is attached and incorporated herein to the extent not inconsistent with this supplemental decision.

We approve and affirm the administrative law judge's allowance of attorney's fee herein as being fair and reasonable.

DISSENTING OPINION

The majority has voted to affirm the administrative law judge's award, granting a permanent partial disability rating for the primary injury of 16% permanent partial disability (PPD) of each wrist, as combined for Second Injury Fund liability with preexisting incontinence (2.5% PPD) and a right shoulder injury (15% PPD). A 33 1/3% loading factor was awarded as against the Second Injury Fund, which resulted in 32.52 weeks of PPD from the Fund. I would not disturb the PPD ratings as awarded on the primary, and identified preexisting disabilities. However, I disagree with the exclusion of the psychological injury as a preexisting disabling condition, and would include that preexisting condition as well, and in turn would modify the loading factor to be applied.

The administrative law judge excluded certain evidence, and the majority agrees with his rulings. I disagree, and I believe it is the improper exclusion of this evidence that led to the limited ruling on permanent partial disability. The evidence all relates to the psychological preexisting condition suffered by employee. I believe the exclusion of the entire deposition and report of Mr. Tim Lalk was an abuse of discretion in that it was an extreme ruling on an objection which -- while it had some merit, did not require an all or nothing approach. The stated objection to the reliability, and foundation of Mr. Lalk's opinion, did not warrant a complete expulsion of the evidence from the vocational rehabilitation expert. I would rule as follows.

1 Exclusion of the entire deposition testimony of Timothy Lalk, (Exhibit 16)

Mr. Lalk, a vocational rehabilitation specialist, provided opinion through a report and deposition, regarding employee's employability in the open market. Mr. Lalk reviewed the forensic report of Dr. Eli Shuter and considered it along with other materials in coming to his conclusions. Dr. Shuter is deceased. This exhibit was not admitted on the basis of hearsay, citing the case of Bruflat v. Mister Guy, Inc., 933 S.W. 2d 829, 833 (Mo. App.1996).[6]

Mr. Lalk's August 4, 2017 report did place some emphasis on his review of Dr. Shuter's report. The findings from the independent medical evaluation conducted by Dr. Shuter in May 2011, were reflected in the doctor's report, dated March 3, 2012 and that report is not in evidence. Mr. Lalk also placed significant emphasis on the report and opinion of Dr. Adam Sky, which is in evidence, along with other medical records.

An expert can consider facts not in evidence to form an opinion or inference, but admissibility of that opinion depends on 1) were facts reasonably relied on, and 2) do foundational facts meet a level of reliability? "The testimony of an expert who merely acts as a conduit for another expert's opinion is hearsay and inadmissible." Id. Mr. Lalk was not merely acting as a conduit for Dr. Shuter's opinion. He examined many different sources and examined and interviewed the employee himself. The administrative law judge upheld the objection and found that Mr. Lalk "relied" on Dr. Shuter's opinion. But when Mr. Lalk's testimony is read in context, it is clear that he did not merely rely on or adopt that report as his own. He had several sources, including his own observations during a lengthy interview with employee, upon which to come to his own conclusions. We are able to evaluate which portions of Mr. Lalk's report and testimony are reliable and persuasive, while separating those portions that suggest mere "parroting" of the doctor's opinion from the non-admitted report. I would admit both the deposition and the report of Mr. Lalk and give them the weight they deserve, given indicia of reliability, and whether the specific opinion comes from a sound foundational basis.

2 Exclusion of Dr. Michael Cometa letters (Exhibit 4)

There are two letters: one dated March 19, 2002 Transcript, page 110[7], and one is undated, although the body of that letter refers to an upcoming date of 10-10-01. It is addressed to Judy Isenberg, M.D. Transcript page 111. Employee refers to these letters as Exhibit 2 in her "Response to Second Injury Fund Objections to Admit Exhibits 4, 14 and 16, page 1"[8] but also refers to them as Exhibit 4. The hearing exhibit index identified these letters as Exhibit 4.

Employee briefly testified about the letters, and appears to offer them as proof of psychological treatment as early as 2001. Employee also offers them to show an earlier period of treatment for psychological disorders. I would accept her testimony of recalling an encounter with Dr. Cometa. Aside from this purpose, (as refreshing recollection), the letters are not properly authenticated as a medical record, so their probative value is diminished. I would accept them into evidence for the purpose of showing how employee's recollection was refreshed, and would give them the weight they deserve.

3 Exclusion of portions of Dr. David Volarich's deposition testimony

The ruling to exclude consideration of portions of Dr. Volarich's testimony is tied to the reference to Mr. Lalk's report, which was excluded by the judge. Dr. Volarich did not rely solely on Mr. Lalk's report and opinion, but had other reliable bases for the foundation of his opinion and conclusions. I do note his indication that he would defer to the psychiatric expert on any such disability. I would accept Dr. Volarich's deposition testimony, taking into consideration the flaws pointed out by the judge, and would give it the weight it deserves.

4 Dr. Adam Sky –Foundation and Seven Day Rule Objections

The administrative law judge's rulings on objections to Dr. Sky's deposition testimony were not sustained to the extent of excluding his opinions, but merely cast doubt as to the persuasiveness of the doctor's opinion. While the judge found Dr. Sky not persuasive in regard to the existence or extent of any preexisting psychiatric illness, I do not wholly share this view. As with the other medical professionals, my view was that Dr. Sky relied on various sources of information in coming to his opinions. The flaws pointed out regarding the technical evidentiary objections are noted, and I take them into consideration.

[7] Inexplicably, the March 19, 2002 letter has an identifier at the bottom as Claimant's Exhibit 4, Injury # 11-015610 (sic), with court reporter initials and date of 3-6-19.

Discussion

Nature and Extent of Disability

I would not disturb the administrative law judge's rulings on disability ratings relative to the primary injury (16% PPD to each wrist) and regarding the preexisting right shoulder (15% PPD) and incontinence disability (2.5% PPD body as a whole). I would not disturb the judge's ruling that there is no psychiatric component to be attributed to the primary injury as I do not believe employee has proven work exposure as a prevailing factor to any psychological condition. However, I differ with the majority and the administrative law judge insofar as their finding of no preexisting psychological disability.

Even the employer's own records, coming from the Chrysler Clinic which provided care to its employees, support the finding that employee had psychological issues prior to her February 2009 primary injury. Her longstanding issues related to "abusive childhood and multiple failed marriages," are evidence of that. Award, page 3. This is included as a finding of fact in the award, but is not elaborated on by the administrative law judge. Employee had reported childhood abuse to several of the evaluators who interviewed her. She had prior mental health care and treatment over several years prior to 2009. One doctor recorded employee's report of a prior suicide attempt as a teenager, although no medical record confirms this.

Preceding the February 2009 work injury, employee had been seeing Elaine Toon, LPC, in therapy through the employer's clinic program as shown in the records in 2008. She had been admitted on more than one occasion to the employer's stress day program, due to difficulties observed by her supervisor at work, again prior to the February 2009 injury. Employee testified about frequent instances of being tearful at work, and difficulties keeping up because of her anxiety and mental health.

In late March 2009, shortly after her injury while employee was still off work, she was hospitalized for suicidal ideation. While the cause of the episode at that time appeared to be connected more directly to a situation regarding her marriage and family, the closeness in proximity to her last several months of work and not long after her counseling with Ms. Toon suggest this was a problem ongoing for some time.

Employee's abuse in childhood, as related by employee to Dr. Sky was found to result in a diagnosis of post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) at the time of his examination on May 15, 2017, along with major depressive disorder, recurrent, and generalized anxiety disorder. Elaine Toon had similar diagnoses in Dec 2007, in addition to a gambling addiction, which Dr. Sky found to have been resolved.

Employee also recalled treatment for psychological issues in 2001, and reported depressed and anxious feelings to medical providers over several years, prior to the work injury. Medical records support that she was prescribed anti-depressant medications in years prior to her work injury.

As opined by Dr. Sky, employee had a preexisting psychological disability. I would adopt a rating in the range of 20-35% body as a whole for this disability. As opined by Dr. Sky, this preexisting disability was a hindrance or obstacle to obtaining and maintaining employment and it combined with her primary injury for a greater disability. I would find employee's overall disability, as a synergistic combination with her primary injury, the right shoulder, incontinence and psychological disability to be greater than a 33 1/3% load factor, but short of permanent total disability.

The reason I am not convinced of permanent total disability as a combination of the preexisting and primary injuries I have identified, is that the medical evidence does not clearly establish the level of post-primary injury worsening of her psychiatric condition, as opposed to what can be attributed to the preexisting disability at the time of injury. Employee's primary injury was in February of 2009. She was off work for a significant period of time thereafter for treatment. She then chose to retire. She made various changes in her life. It wasn't until 2017, eight years later, that Dr. Sky had the opportunity to evaluate employee's mental condition. Likewise, Mr. Lalk's evaluation which found permanent total disability, was based on his examination of the employee five years post-injury (July 15, 2014), and while closer in time, still does not clearly establish the level of employee's disability at the time of the primary injury in this regard.[9] Many of the records Mr. Lalk reviewed relative to psychiatric issues were long after the date of the primary injury. Employee also had some significant life events that occurred after she left employment, including a divorce and the death of a spouse.

Because I disagree with the majority and the administrative law judge regarding the existence of a permanent partial disability to employee's psyche that preexisted her work injury, I must dissent. I would find her combined disability for Second Injury Fund liability purposes to include PTSD, major depressive disorder-recurrent and generalized anxiety disorder. Therefore, I would increase the level of Fund liability to reflect that additional preexisting disability.

I respectfully dissent.

FINDINGS OF FACT and RULINGS OF LAW:

Employee: Patricia Parrish

Dependents: N/A

Employer: Chrysler, LLC

Additional Party: Second Injury Fund

Insurer: Old Carco, LLC

Hearing Date: March 6, 2019

Injury No.: 09-015610

This case involves a compensable repetitive trauma injury to Claimant resulting to Claimant in 2009. Employer previously settled its risk of liability. The Second Injury Fund ("SIF") remains a party to this case. Both parties are represented by counsel. The single issue for trial is the liability of the SIF. Claimant alleges permanent total disability on complex medical issues.

FINDINGS OF FACT

1. Claimant began work at Chrysler in 1984 and worked 25 years before the plant closing in St. Louis in 2009 and her retirement. Claimant testified at length about her experience with employer in parts and assembly work. She detailed her transfer to St. Louis from Alabama and the transition into the new positions.

2. Claimant sustained injury by repetitive trauma to her hands and wrists on the reported injury date. Claimant was diagnosed with CTS and underwent bilateral surgical releases.

3. Claimant settled this primary injury for 16 percent PPD of each hand (without reference to psychiatric disability).

4. Claimant testified at length about abusive childhood and multiple failed marriages, the details of which are not set forth here.

5. Claimant testified she retired in Febraury 2009. She was briefly hospitalized in March 2009 for depression and anxiety. Claimant testified very confidently and easily followed the Q and A format. Her residual complaints and characterization of the primary injury exceeded reasonable inferences that might be made from the approved settlement value.

Pre-existing Condition

6. In 2003, Claimant strained her right shoulder. No records are in evidence regarding this injury. She apparently continued work without accommodation and controlled symptoms with Tylenol.

7. In 2008, Claimant was diagnosed with stress incontinence and underwent bladder surgery. Recovery was complicated with infections and persistent urinary incontinence. She continues to experience problems.

Threshold Evidentiary Objections

Claimant's Exhibit 4 - Letters

The SIF raised an objection to the admissibility of Exhibit 4 as (1) unauthenticated and (2) inadmissible hearsay. The objection is well-taken. The two-page Exhibit consists of two letters by Dr. Michael Cometa, a licensed psychologist from Alabama. The first is dated 2002, and is addressed "To Whom It May Concern." It contains broad statements of diagnosis and disability without details or a records foundation. The second page is a status letter to Dr. Judy Isenberg. Both objections are sustained and the Exhibit is excluded.

Claimant's Exhibit 16 - Mr. Lalk's Report & Deposition

Claimant offered the deposition of Mr. Timothy Lalk as Exhibit 16. He examined Claimant and reviewed the record in 2017 (8 years post-injury). Mr. Lalk testified that Claimant was unemployable in the open labor market. The SIF raised a threshold objection to the admissibility of Mr. Lalk's deposition on the basis that Mr. Lalk reviewed and relied on the forensic report of Dr. Eli Shuter (deceased). The objection is well-taken. As argued, Mr. Lalk details Dr. Shuter's comprehensive rating report at two places in his review portion and, later in the report, just preceding his Summary and Conclusions. At deposition, Mr. Lalk expressly admits he reviewed and relied on Dr. Shuter's findings in forming his own conclusions (p. 55). Accordingly, Exhibit 16 is excluded from evidence on the basis of hearsay. Bruflat v. Mister Guy, Inc., 933 S.W.2d 829, 833 (Mo.App. 1996).

Opinion Evidence

Dr. Volarich

Claimant offered the deposition and narrative reports of Dr. David Volarich as Exhibit 15. Dr. Volarich examined Claimant in 2018 (9 years post-injury). He examined Claimant and reviewed the available medical records.[1] Noteworthy here is that Dr. Volarich's narrative report (dated 2018) is silent on Claimant's psychiatric condition except for the phrase she has chronic psychiatric illness:

> She tells me she had a stroke last week and she has chronic psychiatric illness.

Dr. Volarich apparently did not review any psychiatric medical records. (Exhibit 15; Depo Ex. 2, p. 5)

[1] Dr. Volarich's review of various legal assessments is unexplained. (See Exhibit 15; Depo Ex. 2, p. 11.)

Dr. Volarich diagnosed pre-existing stress incontinence, the primary injury as treated for bilateral CTS and a right shoulder strain from 2008. He assigned a 2.5 percent PPD as per his reference to the settlement of the incontinence claim, 20 percent PPD of each wrist and 20 percent PPD to the right shoulder. In the rating portion of his report, Dr. Volarich specifically references Mr. Lalk's assessment that Claimant was permanently and totally disabled primarily as a result of her psychiatric disorders with which assessment Dr. Volarich concurred. As discussed above, Mr. Lalk's opinion is inadmissible. Accordingly, this portion of Dr. Volarich's opinion evidence is excluded from evidence.

Dr. Sky - Psychiatrist

Claimant offered the deposition and narrative reports of Dr. Adam Sky, psychiatrist, as Exhibit 14. Dr. Sky examined Claimant and reviewed medical records. Family history includes early teenage marriage with two daughters with whom she has poor relationships, multiple marriages. On examination, Claimant was oriented and exhibited fluid speech without any indication of confusion, phobia or dissociative disorder. She exhibited average intelligence. Testing revealed moderate to severe depression and anxiety along with post-traumatic stress disorder. She had driven eight hours from Alabama for her IME with Dr. Sky.

Foundation - Objection

In the opening portion of his deposition, Dr. Sky, acknowledges reviewing Dr. Cometa's letters (Ex. 4) and, in response to a leading question, that characterized the letters as "records," acquiesces in the character of the exhibit as [medical] records. Objection was timely (p. 14). The representation to Dr. Sky, as a witness, that the materials from Dr. Cometa are "records" is misleading to the reader. As discussed above, Exhibit 4 is inadmissible as unauthenticated and as inadmissible hearsay. Even if admissible, the letters are not treatment records that might otherwise be certified as business records. While no portion of Dr. Sky's deposition may be stricken, the extent to which Dr. Sky relied on the letters goes to the weight of his opinion.

Also noteworthy, is the witness' acknowledgement that Dr. Chilikammari's pre-accident records are not in evidence. Only his 2009-2010 records are in evidence. Still further, a brief hospitalization March 23-27, 2009 at St. Anthony's (St. Louis), following her February retirement is referenced but Dr. Sky admits he did not actually review those records.

Accordingly, Dr. Sky's suggestion that pre-existing psychiatric illness is well documented is not persuasive. This is especially important with regard to critical events such as alleged states of Claimant being suicidal before the reported injury.

Seven Day Rule Objection

The SIF objected to Claimant's attorney's effort to recast or enlarge the breath of Dr. Sky's permanent disability opinion by incorporating (1) the stress incontinence and (2) the CTS "to render her unable to compete in the open labor market and, therefore, totally and permanently disabled[.]" (pp. 40-41.) Dr. Sky had, a few pages earlier, opined per his narrative report to a 35 percent pre-existing psychiatric PPD and a 100 percent psychiatric disability as a result of the combination of her "pre-existing permanent partial psychiatric disability synergistically combined with her primary occupational disease." (p. 33) The earlier statement, as quoted makes no mention of stress incontinence.

Upon review, the Compromise Lump Sum Settlement only references, as pertinent, repetitive trauma and hand and wrist PPD. It mentions no psychiatric PPD. Further, such a settlement under the statute carries an adjudicative signature and it may be fairly inferred that the underlying medical record for the settlement vetted any claim of psychiatric PPD having arisen out of the CTS claim. Indeed, the February 8, 2010 settlement is supported by a final examination and rating report dated September 22, 2009 from Dr. David German, hand surgeon. Dr. German assigned a PPD rating with no mention of a psychiatric feature secondary to the CTS: "[Claimant] was doing very well with at least 75-80 improvement in symptoms." (See Exhibit 1.)

* *

Dr. Sky describes a period of treatment for depression per Claimant's history beginning in Alabama as early as 2001, but he has no records before 2009. Dr. Pope's record before 2009 are PCP records which contain undeveloped references to "mild distress" and "mood disorder as circled words on the examination forms. Dr. Pope is not a psychiatrist. Thus, the alleged pre-existing psychiatric disability lacks documention by treatment records, but relies largely on anecdotal evidence from Claimant. Nevertheless, Dr. Sky assigned a 35 percent pre-existing psychiatric PPD and a 100 percent psychiatric disability as a result of the combination of her "pre-existing permanent partial psychiatric disability synergistically combined with her primary occupational disease." Dr. Sky did not apportion the degree of permanent disability related to the primary CTS injury contemplated in Exhibit 1.

Moreover, Dr. Sky did not assign any specific PPD to the "primary occupational disease." The settlement of the primary injury for CTS does not reference any psychiatric disability. (Exhibit 1.) He also believed Claimant would require ongoing treatment for psychiatric symptoms. Thus, Dr. Sky's deposition testimony contains foundation flaws, a valid Seven Day Rule objection, and an omission inasmuch as he failed to assign a specific amount of PPD to the primary injury. It must be observed that critical patient history on complex medical treatment remains unverified.

RULINGS OF LAW

Medical causation, which is not within the common knowledge or experience of lay understanding, must be established by scientific or medical evidence showing the cause and effect relationship between the complained of condition and the asserted cause. In order for the Second Injury Fund to be liable for total disability benefits, claimant must establish that her total disability is due to the combination of primary injury with her then pre-existing disabilities. See Boring v. Treasurer of Mo., Custodian of the Second Injury Fund, 947 S.W.2d 483, 489-90 (Mo.App. E.D. 1997). In cases where permanent total disability results only from the combination of the primary injury, the pre-existing conditions and unrelated post primary injury progression of pre-existing conditions, the Second Injury Fund is not liable for permanent total disability. The Second Injury Fund is not liable for any post-accident worsening of an employee's pre-existing conditions which are not caused or aggravated by the last work-related injury or for any conditions which arise after the last work-related injury. Lammert v. Vess Beverages, Inc., 968 S.W.2d 152 (Mo.App. 1994); Lawrence v. Joplin R-VIII School Dist., 834 S.W.2d 789 (Mo.App. 1992).

It is Claimant's burden to prove "not only causation between the accident and the injury but also that a disability resulted and the extent of such disability." Griggs v. A.B. Chance Co., 503 S.W.2d 697, 703 (Mo.App. W.D.1973). A claimant must provide expert testimony where he is asking the court "to discern the percentage of disability attributable to a particular workplace injury where there has been another injury that contributed to the disability." Bock v. City of Columbia, 274 S.W.3d 555, 560 (Mo.App. W.D. 2008). Expert testimony is also necessary when the injury is beyond the lay understanding. Id. At 561.

Nature and Extent of Permanent Disability

Permanent disability must be demonstrated and certified by a physician. See Section 287.190.6(2) RSMo (2016). Here, any award of permanent disability must be certified by either Dr. Volarich or Dr. Sky. With complex medical issues, treatment records alone are not sufficient unless certified by a physician. Psychiatric issues are not within the understanding on lay witnesses.

Claimant's primary settlement is unremarkable for its percentage, or severity, of PPD and the wrist ratings from her medical expert are also quite modest even from the vantage point of the 2018 examination date by Dr. Volarich. Here, Claimant did not meet her burden in proving she was permanently and totally disabled from a combination of her primary occupational disease with her then pre-existing conditions. Claimant is likely permanently and totally disabled only after considering unrelated post-primary injury progression of pre-existing conditions.

Dr. Volarich noted in his narrative report that Claimant described how her right shoulder limitations combined with her hand symptoms, but did not describe any combination between her urinary incontinence and her bilateral CTS. He never found permanent total disability except upon consideration of Mr. Lalk's vocational assessment.

Dr. Sky took a history from Claimant that the CTS surgical releases were not entirely successful inasmuch as she has numbness and tingling in all five right fingers and to a lesser extent on the left. Claimant's settlement, with counsel, belies this characterization. First, the severity of the settled amount of PPD is unremarkable at 16 percent bilaterally, the settlement accords no additional PPD for right hand symptoms, and she returned to work. It is difficult to understand how this modest level of PPD might form the basis of a disability combination that results in permanent total disability.

The medical record does not suggest Claimant needs to avoid all employment but only that which requires heavy lifting or repetitive arm work. Sedentary or retail work seems viable and Claimant's extended experience in one industry (i.e automotive) bolsters this option. Consistent with this analysis is the holding in Ransburg v. Great Plains Drilling, 22 S.W.3d 726 (Mo.App. 2000). In that case, a 60-year-old construction worker fell and required both neck and shoulder surgeries. The record included evidence that the employee was capable of performing sedentary work and received social security benefits and a pension. The employee admitted not having sought alternative employment. The court held employee's testimony itself was sufficient to find he had no motivation to return to work. Social security benefits and a pension are irrelevant for purposes of determining overall disability but are relevant to determine the ability or motivation to return to work. Id.

Similarly, here, Claimant is ambulatory and seems capable of sedentary work and, apparently, had not sought employment after the plant closure. While not exactly on point, the court in Ransburg held that the admission was competent evidence and, thus, it has some probative value here. The admission gains meaning when coupled with the lack of evidence on curtailed activity; Claimant drove eight hours to an IME from Alabama. Claimant no longer actively treats, manages her personal needs, has no domestic help and apparently drives an automobile. This is substantial competent evidence that Claimant's permanent injury is partial, not total.

Allegation of Psychiatric Disability

The record does not contain evidence that suggests Claimant has any psychiatric disability that is medically causally related to the work incident. To the contrary, Claimant's appearance at trial was normal and lacking in any demeanor suggestive of anger or sadness. Nevertheless, domestic problems appear to have followed Claimant into adulthood as evidenced by her multiple marriages and strained relationships with her adult children. Relevant to credibility, however, was Claimant's single reference at trial that she felt "suicidal" yet no pre-Claim hospitalization or treatment records corroborate this assertion.

In addition, substantial psychiatric pre-Claim medical evidence is not in evidence and, based upon Dr. Sky's substantial rating for pre-existing PPD, is based upon Claimant's anecdotal recollection or her patient history to Dr. Chilikammari who treated her post-injury. Incidentally, Dr. Chilikammari's notes also indicate Claimant's alertness and clear speech with no suicidal tendancy.

This leaves unclear how Dr. Sky posits the existence of a work related psychiatric diagnosis as expressly stated in his report. His findings also fail to identify any severe disabling upper extremity pain that might predicate a psychiatric disability. He did not rate the primary injury of CTS. Thus, Dr. Sky did not identify a work related psychiatric injury and, second, if, arguendo he could so identify, he did not explain to what degree Claimant's alleged psychiatric condition, or other disability, was due to the work injury as opposed to any pre-existing conditions, or subsequent deterioration. Claimant's psychiatric condition, if any, is not medically documented as pre-existing the reported injury and, thereafter, is not identified by any means as part of the primary CTS injury settled. Again, the record contains no objective pre-Claim evidence of psychiatric disability. The fact of Claimant not working since the plant closing was essentially unexplained at trial. Dr. Sky's analysis and testimony in this case is simply unpersuasive and not a sufficient basis to impose PTD liability against the SIF.

The current disability is determined to be 16 percent PPD of each wrist (56 weeks). The pre-existing PPD referable to urinary incontinence is found to be 2.5 percent PPD of the body (10 weeks). The right shoulder PPD is found to be 15 percent (34.8 weeks). There is neither pre-existing treatment records nor other evidence to support a finding of significant pre-existing psychiatric disability; the absence of any severely disabling pre-existing psychiatric PPD is consistent with Claimant's 25 year service record with Employer up until her voluntary retirement upon closure of the St. Louis plant in 2009.

SIF Liability

SIF liability is premised on the combination of the primary and pre-existing disabilities. Section 287.220.1 RSMo (2000). Again, in order for the SIF to be liable for permanent total disability, an employee must establish that the PTD is due to the combination of the primary injury with the pre-existing disability. Boring, supra. Emphasis is on the pre-Claim conditions that hindered employment not simply an employee's condition at the time of trial.

Here, the medical evidence and other evidence of disability, before 2009 and from the CTS wrist settlement, suggest Claimant's disabilities are a hindrance and obstacle to employment or reemployment. Here, Claimant's primary injury and right shoulder and incontinence conditions constitute common opposing limb and upper body-lower body synergy.

The opinion evidence and other evidence suggest Claimant's combined PPD equates to increased overall PPD of 33 and 1/3 percent of a body, or 133.32 weeks. Thus, after the pre-existing PPD plus the current PPD (100.8) are deducted from the combined disability, the synergistic effect results in an additional 32.52 weeks of PPD liability against the SIF.

Conclusion

Accordingly, on the basis of the substantial competent evidence contained within the whole record, Claimant is found to have sustained an additional 32.52 weeks PPD from the SIF as a result of the combination between the primary injury and the synergistic pre-existing PPD.

I certify that on 6-27-19, I delivered a copy of the foregoing award to the parties to the case. A complete record of the method of delivery and date of service upon each party is retained with the executed award in the Division's case file.

287.220. Compensation and payment of compensation for disability--second injury fund created, services covered, actuarial studies required--failure of employer to insure, penalties--public records

<Text of section eff. until Jan. 1, 2014. See, also, section eff. Jan. 1, 2014.>

1. All cases of permanent disability where there has been previous disability shall be compensated as herein provided. Compensation shall be computed on the basis of the average earnings at the time of the last injury. If any employee who has a preexisting permanent partial disability whether from compensable injury or otherwise, of such seriousness as to constitute a hindrance or obstacle to employment or to obtaining reemployment if the employee becomes unemployed, and the preexisting permanent partial disability, if a body as a whole injury, equals a minimum of fifty weeks of compensation or, if a major extremity injury only, equals a minimum of fifteen percent permanent partial disability, according to the medical standards that are used in determining such compensation, receives a subsequent compensable injury resulting in additional permanent partial disability so that the degree or percentage of disability, in an amount equal to a minimum of fifty weeks compensation, if a body as a whole injury or, if a major extremity injury only, equals a minimum of fifteen percent permanent partial disability, caused by the combined disabilities is substantially greater than that which would have resulted from the last injury, considered alone and of itself, and if the employee is entitled to receive compensation on the basis of the combined disabilities, the employer at the time of the last injury shall be liable only for the degree or percentage of disability which would have resulted from the last injury had there been no preexisting disability. After the compensation liability of the employer for the last injury, considered alone, has been determined by an administrative law judge or the commission, the degree or percentage of employee's disability that is attributable to all injuries or conditions existing at the time the last injury was sustained shall then be determined by that administrative law judge or by the commission and the degree or percentage of disability which existed prior to the last injury plus the disability resulting from the last injury, if any, considered alone, shall be deducted from the combined disability, and compensation for the balance, if any, shall be paid out of a special fund known as the second injury fund, hereinafter provided for. If the previous disability or disabilities, whether from compensable injury or otherwise, and the last injury together result in total and permanent disability, the minimum standards under this subsection for a body whole injury or a major extremity injury shall not apply and the employer at the time of the last injury shall be liable only for the disability resulting from the last injury considered alone and of itself; except that if the compensation for which the employer at the time of the last injury is liable is less than the compensation provided in this chapter for permanent total disability, then in addition to the compensation for which the employer is liable and after the completion of payment of the compensation by the employer, the employee shall be paid the remainder of the compensation that would be due for permanent total disability under section 287.200 out of a special fund known as the "Second Injury Fund" hereby created exclusively for the purposes as in this section provided and for special weekly benefits in rehabilitation cases as provided in section 287.141. Maintenance of the second injury fund shall be as provided by section 287.710. The state treasurer shall be the custodian of the second injury fund which shall be deposited the same as are state funds and any interest accruing thereon shall be added thereto. The fund shall be subject to audit the same as state funds and accounts and shall be protected by the general bond given by the state treasurer. Upon the requisition of the director of the division of workers' compensation, warrants on the state treasurer for the payment of all amounts payable for compensation and benefits out of the second injury fund shall be issued.

2. In all cases in which a recovery against the second injury fund is sought for permanent partial disability, permanent total disability, or death, the state treasurer as custodian thereof shall be named as a party, and shall be entitled to defend against the claim. The state treasurer, with the advice and consent of the attorney general of Missouri, may enter into compromise settlements as contemplated by section 287.390, or agreed statements of fact that would affect the second injury fund. All awards for permanent partial disability, permanent total disability, or death affecting the second injury fund shall be subject to the provisions of this chapter governing review and appeal. For all claims filed against the second injury fund on or after July 1, 1994, the attorney general shall use assistant attorneys general except in circumstances where an actual or potential conflict of interest exists, to provide legal services as may be required in all claims made for recovery against the fund. Any legal expenses incurred by the attorney general's office in the handling of such claims, including, but not limited to, medical examination fees, expert witness fees, court reporter expenses, travel costs, and related legal expenses shall be paid by the fund. Effective July 1, 1993, the payment of such legal expenses shall be contingent upon annual appropriations made by the general assembly, from the fund, to the attorney general's office for this specific purpose.

3. If more than one injury in the same employment causes concurrent temporary disabilities, compensation shall be payable only for the longest and largest paying disability.

4. If more than one injury in the same employment causes concurrent and consecutive permanent partial disability, compensation payments for each subsequent disability shall not begin until the end of the compensation period of the prior disability.

5. If an employer fails to insure or self-insure as required in section 287.280, funds from the second injury fund may be withdrawn to cover the fair, reasonable, and necessary expenses to cure and relieve the effects of the injury or disability of an injured employee in the employ of an uninsured employer, or in the case of death of an employee in the employ of an uninsured employer, funds from the second injury fund may be withdrawn to cover fair, reasonable, and necessary expenses in the manner required in sections 287.240 and 287.241. In defense of claims arising under this subsection, the treasurer of the state of Missouri, as custodian of the second injury fund, shall have the same defenses to such claims as would the uninsured employer. Any funds received by the employee or the employee's dependents, through civil or other action, must go towards reimbursement of the second injury fund, for all payments made to the employee, the employee's dependents, or paid on the employee's behalf, from the second injury fund pursuant to this subsection. The office of the attorney general of the state of Missouri shall bring suit in the circuit court of the county in which the accident occurred against any employer not covered by this chapter as required in section 287.280.

6. Every three years the second injury fund shall have an actuarial study made to determine the solvency of the fund, appropriate funding level of the fund, and forecasted expenditures from the fund. The first actuarial study shall b completed prior to July 1, 1988. The expenses of such actuarial studies shall be paid out of the fund for the support of the division of workers' compensation.

7. The director of the division of workers' compensation shall maintain the financial data and records concerning the fund for the support of the division of workers' compensation and the second injury fund. The division shall also compile and report data on claims made pursuant to subsection 9 of this section. The attorney general shall provide all necessary information to the division for this purpose.

8. All claims for fees and expenses filed against the second injury fund and all records pertaining thereto shall be open to the public.

9. Any employee who at the time a compensable work-related injury is sustained is employed by more than one employer, the employer for whom the employee was working when the injury was sustained shall be responsible for wage loss benefits applicable only to the earnings in that employer's employment and the injured employee shall be entitled to file a claim against the second injury fund for any additional wage loss benefits attributed to loss of earnings from the employment or employments where the injury did not occur, up to the maximum weekly benefit less those benefits paid by the employer in whose employment the employee sustained the injury. The employee shall be entitled to a total benefit based on the total average weekly wage of such employee computed according to subsection 8 of section 287.250. The employee shall not be entitled to a greater rate of compensation than allowed by law on the date of the injury. The employer for whom the employee was working where the injury was sustained shall be responsible for all medical costs incurred in regard to that injury.

287.495. Final award conclusive unless an appeal is taken — grounds for setting aside — disputes governed by this section, claims arising on or after August 13, 1980. — 1. The final award of the commission shall be conclusive and binding unless either party to the dispute shall, within thirty days from the date of the final award, appeal the award to the appellate court. The appellate court shall have jurisdiction to review all decisions of the commission pursuant to this chapter where the division has original jurisdiction over the case. Venue as established by subsection 2 of section 287.640 shall determine the appellate court which hears the appeal. Such appeal may be taken by filing notice of appeal with the commission, whereupon the commission shall, under its certificate, return to the court all documents and papers on file in the matter, together with a transcript of the evidence, the findings and award, which shall thereupon become the record of the cause. Upon appeal no additional evidence shall be heard and, in the absence of fraud, the findings of fact made by the commission within its powers shall be conclusive and binding. The court, on appeal, shall review only questions of law and may modify, reverse, remand for rehearing, or set aside the award upon any of the following grounds and no other:

(1) That the commission acted without or in excess of its powers;

(2) That the award was procured by fraud;

(3) That the facts found by the commission do not support the award;

(4) That there was not sufficient competent evidence in the record to warrant the making of the award.

2. The provisions of this section shall apply to all disputes based on claims arising on or after August 13, 1980.

Title XXXIII EVIDENCE AND LEGAL ADVERTISEMENTS

Chapter 490

Effective - 28 Aug 2017, 2 histories

490.065. Expert witness, opinion testimony admissible, requirements for certain actions. — 1. In actions brought under chapter 451, 452, 453, 454, or 455 or in actions adjudicated in juvenile courts under chapter 211 or in family courts under chapter 487, or in all proceedings before the probate division of the circuit court, or in all actions or proceedings in which there is no right to a jury trial:

(1) If scientific, technical or other specialized knowledge will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue, a witness qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education may testify thereto in the form of an opinion or otherwise;

(2) Testimony by such an expert witness in the form of an opinion or inference otherwise admissible is not objectionable because it embraces an ultimate issue to be decided by the trier of fact;

(3) The facts or data in a particular case upon which an expert bases an opinion or inference may be those perceived by or made known to him at or before the hearing and must be of a type reasonably relied upon by experts in the field in forming opinions or inferences upon the subject and must be otherwise reasonably reliable;

(4) If a reasonable foundation is laid, an expert may testify in terms of opinion or inference and give the reasons therefor without the use of hypothetical questions, unless the court believes the use of a hypothetical question will make the expert's opinion more understandable or of greater assistance to the jury due to the particular facts of the case.

2. In all actions except those to which subsection 1 of this section applies:

(1) A witness who is qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education may testify in the form of an opinion or otherwise if:

(a) The expert's scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge will help the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue;

(b) The testimony is based on sufficient facts or data;

(c) The testimony is the product of reliable principles and methods; and

(d) The expert has reliably applied the principles and methods to the facts of the case;

(2) An expert may base an opinion on facts or data in the case that the expert has been made aware of or personally observed. If experts in the particular field would reasonably rely on those kinds of facts or data in forming an opinion on the subject, they need not be admissible for the opinion to be admitted. But if the facts or data would otherwise be inadmissible, the proponent of the opinion may disclose them to the jury only if their probative value in helping the jury evaluate the opinion substantially outweighs their prejudicial effect;

(3) (a) An opinion is not objectionable just because it embraces an ultimate issue.

(b) In a criminal case, an expert witness shall not state an opinion about whether the defendant did or did not have a mental state or condition that constitutes an element of the crime charged or of a defense. Those matters are for the trier of fact alone;

(4) Unless the court orders otherwise, an expert may state an opinion and give the reasons for it without first testifying to the underlying facts or data. But the expert may be required to disclose those facts or data on cross-examination.

3. The provisions of this section shall not prevent a person, partnership, association, or corporation, as owner, from testifying as to the reasonable market value of the owner's land.

(1) If scientific, technical or other specialized knowledge will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue, a witness qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education may testify thereto in the form of an opinion or otherwise;

(2) Testimony by such an expert witness in the form of an opinion or inference otherwise admissible is not objectionable because it embraces an ultimate issue to be decided by the trier of fact;

(3) The facts or data in a particular case upon which an expert bases an opinion or inference may be those perceived by or made known to him at or before the hearing and must be of a type reasonably relied upon by experts in the field in forming opinions or inferences upon the subject and must be otherwise reasonably reliable;

(4) If a reasonable foundation is laid, an expert may testify in terms of opinion or inference and give the reasons therefor without the use of hypothetical questions, unless the court believes the use of a hypothetical question will make the expert's opinion more understandable or of greater assistance to the jury due to the particular facts of the case.

2. In all actions except those to which subsection 1 of this section applies:

(1) A witness who is qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education may testify in the form of an opinion or otherwise if:

(a) The expert's scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge will help the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue;

(b) The testimony is based on sufficient facts or data;

(c) The testimony is the product of reliable principles and methods; and

(d) The expert has reliably applied the principles and methods to the facts of the case;

(2) An expert may base an opinion on facts or data in the case that the expert has been made aware of or personally observed. If experts in the particular field would reasonably rely on those kinds of facts or data in forming an opinion on the subject, they need not be admissible for the opinion to be admitted. But if the facts or data would otherwise be inadmissible, the proponent of the opinion may disclose them to the jury only if their probative value in helping the jury evaluate the opinion substantially outweighs their prejudicial effect;

(3) (a) An opinion is not objectionable just because it embraces an ultimate issue.

(b) In a criminal case, an expert witness shall not state an opinion about whether the defendant did or did not have a mental state or condition that constitutes an element of the crime charged or of a defense. Those matters are for the trier of fact alone;

(4) Unless the court orders otherwise, an expert may state an opinion and give the reasons for it without first testifying to the underlying facts or data. But the expert may be required to disclose those facts or data on cross-examination.

3. The provisions of this section shall not prevent a person, partnership, association, or corporation, as owner, from testifying as to the reasonable market value of the owner's land.

Appeal from the United States District Court
for the Northern District of Texas
USDC No. 2:21-cv-67

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Before ELROD, OLDHAM, and WILSON, Circuit Judges.

PER CURIAM:

This case concerns the Migrant Protection Protocols ("MPP") created by the Secretary of the Department of Homeland Security on December 20, 2018, and purportedly rescinded by DHS in a memorandum on June 1, 2021 ("June 1 Memorandum").[1] After a full bench trial and 53 pages of findings of fact and conclusions of law, the district court concluded that DHS's purported rescission of MPP violated, inter alia, the Administrative Procedure Act ("APA"). DHS seeks a stay pending appeal. After carefully considering full briefing from the parties, we hold DHS failed to satisfy the four stay factors. See Nken v. Holder, 556 U.S. 418 (2009). The motion is denied.

A.

On December 20, 2018, the Trump Administration implemented MPP in response to an immigration surge at the southern border. D. Ct. Op. at 7. The statutory authority for MPP is found in 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C), which authorizes the Government to return certain third-country nationals arriving in the United States to Mexico or Canada for the duration of their removal proceedings under 8 U.S.C. § 1229a. Id. at 8. Also on December 20, 2018, the United States obtained Mexico's agreement to permit entry of MPP enrollees. Id. The goal of MPP was to ensure that "[c]ertain aliens attempting to enter the U.S. illegally or without documentation . . . will no longer be released into the country, where they often fail to file an asylum

[1] We refer to the Secretary's actions as those of "DHS" unless otherwise stated.

application and/or disappear before an immigration judge can determine the merits of any claim." Id. (quotation omitted).

In January 2019, "DHS began implementing MPP, initially in San Diego, California, then El Paso, Texas, and Calexico, California, and then nationwide." Id. (citing AR.155–56, AR.684). In February 2019, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement issued guidance on MPP to its field offices, anticipating the expansion of MPP across the border. Id. at 9 (citing AR.165–70). By December 31, 2020, DHS had enrolled 68,039 aliens in MPP. Id. at 12 (citing AR.555).

DHS and Texas entered into a Memorandum of Understanding (the "Agreement"), which the parties finalized on January 8, 2021. Id. at 13 (citing Compl., Ex. B at 8). The Agreement required Texas to provide information and assist DHS to "perform its border security, legal immigration, immigration enforcement, and national security missions." Id. (quoting Compl., Ex. B at 2). In return, DHS agreed to consult Texas and consider its views before taking actions that could modify immigration enforcement. See id. at 13–14 (citing Compl., Ex. B at 2). DHS also agreed to "'[p]rovide Texas with 180 days' written notice . . . of any proposed action' subject to the consultation requirement," id. at 14 (quoting Compl., Ex. B at 3), so that Texas would have an opportunity to comment on the proposal. The Agreement further required DHS to consider Texas's input "in good faith" and, if it decided to reject Texas's input, "provide a detailed written explanation" of its reasons for doing so. Id. (emphasis omitted) (quoting Compl., Ex. B at 3).

On Inauguration Day, the Biden Administration announced that it would suspend further enrollments in MPP. The Acting Secretary of DHS wrote that "[e]ffective January 21, 2021, the Department will suspend new enrollments in the Migrant Protection Protocols (MPP), pending further review of the program. Aliens who are not already enrolled in MPP should be processed under other existing legal authorities." Id. at 15 (quoting AR.581).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

On February 2, 2021, DHS sent a letter to Texas purporting to terminate the Agreement "effective immediately." Id. at 14. Because it believed that the letter did not comply with the Agreement's required procedures, Texas interpreted the letter "as a notice of intent to terminate" the Agreement. Id. (citing ECF No. 53 at 21).

On April 13, 2021, Texas and Missouri (the "States") sued, challenging the temporary suspension of MPP. Id. at 1 (citing ECF No. 1). The States alleged that DHS's January 20 Memorandum violated the APA, the Immigration and Nationality Act ("INA"), the Constitution, and the Agreement. See id. at 2 (citing ECF No. 1 at 4; ECF No. 45). On May 14, the States moved for a preliminary injunction that would enjoin the Government from enforcing and implementing the January 20 Memorandum. Prelim. Inj. Mot., ECF No. 30.

On June 1, before briefing on the preliminary injunction had concluded, DHS issued a new memorandum permanently terminating MPP. D. Ct. Op. at 2. The district court concluded that the June 1 Memorandum mooted the States' complaint, and the court allowed the States to amend their complaint and file a new preliminary injunction motion. Id. The parties agreed to consolidate the preliminary injunction hearing with the trial on the merits pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 65(a)(2). Id. at 3.

B.

Following the bench trial, the district court issued a 53-page memorandum opinion and order, concluding that the States were entitled to relief on their APA and statutory claims. See D. Ct. Op. at 1. The district court made many findings of fact that are relevant here. Among other things,

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

the district court found that MPP had significant benefits before DHS purported to rescind it. For example, DHS's October 2019 Assessment of MPP concluded that "aliens without meritorious claims—which no longer constitute[d] a free ticket into the United States—[were] beginning to voluntarily return home." D. Ct. Op. at 10. And the court noted that DHS also found MPP effective in addressing the prior "perverse incentives" created by allowing "those with non-meritorious claims . . . [to] remain in the country for lengthy periods of time." Id. The court found that this caused a significant decrease in immigration-enforcement encounters along the southern border. Id. And more directly, the court found that caused a decrease in "the number of aliens released into the interior of the United States for the duration of their U.S. removal proceedings." Id. at 11 (citing AR.554). These benefits, DHS emphasized, were a "cornerstone" of the agency's prior immigration policy. D. Ct. Op. at 12.

The court made specific (and largely uncontested) factual findings that "[t]he termination of MPP has [increased] and will continue to increase the number of aliens being released into the United States," and that this increase "has [imposed] and will continue to impose harms on Plaintiff States Texas and Missouri." Id. at 17. On the basis of its factual findings, the district court determined that the States had Article III standing, that the court had jurisdiction to review the agency action, and that the States were within the zone of interests of the INA. Id. at 21–34. The court then concluded that DHS's termination of MPP was unlawful under the APA because the action was arbitrary and capricious and contrary to the INA. Id. at 34–44. Based on those conclusions, the district court "permanently enjoined and restrained [DHS] from implementing or enforcing the June 1 Memorandum" and ordered DHS "to enforce and implement MPP in good faith until such a time as it has been lawfully rescinded in compliance with the APA and until such a time as the federal government has sufficient detention capacity to detain all aliens subject to mandatory detention under Section 1255 without releasing any aliens because of a lack of detention resources." Id. at 52–53 (emphases omitted).

DHS noticed an appeal. On August 17, 2021, the Government requested an emergency stay under Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 8. The States opposed that request on August 18. On August 19, the Government filed a reply. The Government requested that we rule the same day, August 19. In considering the Government's request, we must consider four factors: (1) whether the Government makes a strong showing that it is likely to succeed on the merits; (2) whether the Government will be irreparably injured in the absence of a stay; (3) whether other interested parties will be irreparably injured by a stay; and (4) where the public interest lies. See Nken, 556 U.S. at 426.

II.

We begin with whether the Government has made a strong showing that it is likely to succeed on the merits. The Government makes two merits arguments: (A) the case is not justiciable, and (B) DHS's rescission of MPP did not violate federal law. The Government is likely wrong on both.

A.

The Government first argues that it is likely to succeed on the merits because two justiciability doctrines—standing and non-reviewability—operate as insuperable obstacles to the States' suit. We consider and reject each argument in turn.

1.

First, the States' standing. To establish standing, the States "must show an injury that is 'concrete, particularized, and actual or imminent; fairly traceable to the challenged action; and redressable by a favorable ruling.'"

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Texas v. United States, 809 F.3d 134, 150 (5th Cir. 2015) (quoting Clapper v. Amnesty Int'l USA, 568 U.S. 398, 409 (2013)). "Only one of the [appellants] needs to have standing to permit us to consider the [complaint]."[2] Massachusetts v. EPA, 549 U.S. 497, 518 (2007); accord Nat'l Rife Ass'n Am., Inc. v. McCraw, 719 F.3d 338, 344 n.3 (5th Cir. 2013). Because the Government is seeking a stay, we must ask whether it has made a strong showing that the States lack standing. See Valentine v. Collier, 956 F.3d 797, 801 (5th Cir. 2020).

After a bench trial, we review the district court's factual determinations for clear error. See, e.g., Texas, 809 F.3d at 171–72 (reviewing a factual finding for clear error); Env't Tex. Citizen Lobby, Inc. v. ExxonMobil Corp., 968 F.3d 357, 367 (5th Cir. 2020) ("Because this case was tried, Plaintiffs needed to prove standing by a preponderance of the evidence. A factual finding that a plaintiff met that burden is reviewed for clear error." (citation omitted)). And any argument not raised on appeal (including a challenge to a district court's factual finding) is forfeited. See, e.g., United States v. Edwards, 303 F.3d 606, 647 (5th Cir. 2002) ("Many of the 'errors' cited by the defendants are unbriefed. These issues have been [forfeited]."); cf. Fed. R. App. P. 28(a)(9)(A) ("The appellant's brief must contain . . . appellant's contentions and the reasons for them, with citations to the authorities and parts of the record on which the appellant relies.").

We begin with (a) the district court's uncontested factual findings. Then we hold that the Government fails to make a strong showing that it is likely to succeed on appeal because it has not shown that the States lack (b) an injury-in-fact that is (c) traceable and (d) redressable. Finally, any doubt

[2] For this reason, we focus on Texas's standing. We note, however, that Missouri brings largely similar arguments with respect to driver's-license, educational, healthcare, and other costs.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

about the States' standing is resolved by (e) the special solicitude guaranteed to sovereign States in our federal system.

a.

The district court found eight facts central to the standing issue. These include:

1. The court found that because of MPP's termination, the Government has been "forced to release and parole aliens into the United States because [the Government] simply [does] not have the resources to detain aliens as mandated by statute." D. Ct. Op. at 17; see also id. at 18 (finding that Texas's "border state" status means some of those aliens have ended up in Texas).
2. The court found that DHS previously acknowledged that "MPP implementation contributed to decreasing the volume of inadmissible aliens arriving in the United States on land from Mexico." Id. at 17 (quotation and alteration omitted).
3. The court found that "the termination of MPP has contributed to the current border surge." Id.
4. The court found that "[s]ince MPP's termination, the number of enforcement encounters on the southwest border has skyrocketed." Id.; see also id. at 18 n.7 (noting "the sworn statement of David Shahoulian, Assistant Secretary for Border and Immigration Policy at DHS," including Shahoulian's statement that "[b]ased on current trends, the Department expects that total encounters this fiscal year are likely to be the highest ever recorded" (emphasis omitted)).
5. The court found that many "aliens present in Texas because of MPP's termination would apply for driver's licenses," the granting of which would impose a cost on Texas. Id. at 19.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

6. The court found that "[s]ome school-age child aliens who would have otherwise been enrolled in MPP are being released or paroled into the United States," and that (according to state estimates) Texas will expend an average of $9,216 per additional student in the 2021 school year. Id. at 19.
7. The court found that "[s]ome aliens who would have otherwise been enrolled in MPP are being released or paroled into the United States and will use state-funded healthcare services or benefits in Texas," imposing a cost on the state. D. Ct. Op. at 19–20 (citing AR.555, AR.587–88).
8. Finally, the court found that "[s]ome aliens who would have otherwise been enrolled in MPP are being released or paroled into the United States and [some] will commit crimes in Texas," imposing costs on the state's correctional apparatus. Id. at 20.

The Government does not challenge any of these findings.[3] But even if it did, we would not find any of them clearly erroneous in the light of the record as a whole. See, e.g., United States v. Ismoila, 100 F.3d 380, 396 (5th Cir. 1996) ("[A]s long as the determination is plausible in light of the record as a whole, clear error does not exist.").

Texas's injuries are actual and imminent. As just described, MPP's termination has caused an increase in immigration into Texas. And as

[3] On one reading of the Government's brief, it does contest the fifth finding. See Stay Mot. at 7 (discussing "speculation about an increase in the number of aliens released and paroled who will seek driver's licenses" (quotation omitted)). But in any case, neither our precedent nor the district court's record allows us to conclude the Government is likely to show the finding is clearly erroneous. See Texas, 809 F.3d at 156 (making a similar inference about driver's license applications).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

discussed at length in Texas v. United States, Texas law requires the issuance of a license to any qualified person—including noncitizens who "present . . . documentation issued by the appropriate United States agency that authorizes the applicant to be in the United States." 809 F.3d at 155–56 (alteration in original) (quoting TEX. TRANSP. CODE § 521.142(a)); see also id. (discussing other Texas requirements for a driver's license). Of course, unlike in the Deferred Action for Parents of Americans and Lawful Permanent Residents ("DAPA") program, the challenged action here does not ipso facto guarantee that a given alien will satisfy that requirement. Yet the district court's uncontested findings of fact likely compel the conclusion that MPP's termination has led to an increase in the number of aliens in Texas, many of whom will apply for driver's licenses. And the district court found that Texas incurs a cost every time it inquires into whether an alien satisfies the requirements for a license—even if the person does not in fact qualify for a license. D. Ct. Op. at 19 ("Each additional customer seeking a Texas driver's license imposes a cost on Texas."); see also Decl. of Sheri Gipson, Chief of the Texas Department of Public Safety Driver License Division, ¶ 8 ("DPS estimates that for an additional 10,000 driver['s] license customers seeking a limited term license, DPS would incur a biennial cost of approximately $2,014,870.80." (emphasis added)). So Texas has shown imminent injury in this case. See Texas, 809 F.3d at 156 (reaching the same conclusion on similar facts). Driver's licenses aside, the district court's unchallenged factual findings regarding educational, healthcare, and correctional costs provide equally strong bases for finding cognizable, imminent injury.

The Government's counterargument (limited to the driver's-license theory) is that the district court's analysis was "primarily based on speculation about an increase in the number of aliens released and paroled who will seek driver's licenses." Stay Mot. at 7 (quotation omitted). But the

MO-AG-22-0644-A-003391

Government has done nothing to show that district court's findings of fact about the increased number of aliens were clearly erroneous. And it is grounded in our precedent. Texas, 809 F.3d at 156 ("[T]here is little doubt that many [DAPA beneficiaries] would [apply for driver's licenses] because driving is a practical necessity in most of the state.").

c.

Texas's injury is also traceable to the Government's termination of MPP. The district court's uncontested factual findings establish as much: MPP's termination has caused an increase in unlawful immigration into Texas. Many new immigrants are certain to apply for driver's licenses—and evaluating each application will impose costs on Texas. Cf. Texas, 809 F.3d at 160 (noting that new immigrants—in that case, DAPA recipients—"have strong incentives to obtain driver's licenses, and it is hardly speculative that many would do so if they became eligible."). Likewise, at least some MPP-caused immigrants will certainly seek educational and healthcare services from the state. And the States have incurred and will continue to incur costs associated with the border crisis, at least part of which the district court found is traceable to rescinding MPP. The causal chain is easy to see, and the Government does not meaningfully contest this point. See also Massachusetts v. EPA, 549 U.S. at 523 (finding traceability where the EPA's challenged action may have caused people to drive less fuel-efficient cars, which may in turn contribute to a prospective rise in sea levels, which may in turn cause the erosion of Massachusetts's shoreline).

An injunction would remedy Texas's injury by requiring reinstatement of MPP. And with MPP back in place, immigration officers would once again have discretion to return (some) aliens to Mexico. The Government gives two arguments that it says undercut redressability. First,

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

the Government contends, an injunction would provide no redress because immigration officers under MPP would have discretion about whether to return any given immigrant to Mexico. Stay Mot. at 8. This argument ignores the fact that, during MPP's operative period, immigration agents did in fact order over 50,000 aliens back to Mexico from the Texas border. ECF 11 at 2. The Government offers no basis to conclude that a renewed MPP would have any different impact.

Second, the Government argues there is no redressability because aliens cannot be returned to Mexico without Mexico's consent. Stay Mot. at 8. This argument fails because for at least some aliens, MPP would permit DHS to simply refuse admission at ports of entry in the first place. See 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C) (allowing the Attorney General to "return [an] alien" "who is arriving on land (whether or not at a designated port of arrival) from a foreign territory contiguous to the United States . . . to that territory pending a" removal proceeding). Further, Mexico issued a statement in 2018 consenting to admit aliens excluded from the United States under MPP—and nothing in the record suggests Mexico has since retracted that consent. See AR.153 (Secretaría do Relaciones Exteriores, Position of Mexico on the Decision of the U.S. Government to Invoke Section 235(b)(2)(C) of its Immigration and Nationality Act (Dec. 20, 2018)).

To eliminate any doubt as to standing, we emphasize that the States are entitled to "special solicitude" in the standing analysis. Massachusetts v. EPA, 549 U.S. at 520; see also Texas, 809 F.3d at 151 (beginning with the special-solicitude question). Such special solicitude has two requirements: (1) the State must have a procedural right to challenge the action in question, and (2) the challenged action must affect one of the State's quasi-sovereign interests. Texas, 809 F.3d at 151–52 (citing Massachusetts, 549 U.S. at 516–

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

20). In both Massachusetts and Texas, the first prong was satisfied where a State challenged an agency action as invalid under a statute. 549 U.S. at 516–17 (Clean Air Act); 809 F.3d at 152–53 (APA). And in both cases, the second prong was satisfied where a State's challenge involved an agency's alleged failure to protect certain formerly "sovereign prerogatives [that] are now lodged in the Federal Government." Massachusetts, 549 U.S. at 520; see Texas, 809 F.3d at 152–54. Particularly relevant here is Texas, where this Court held that DAPA, by authorizing the presence of many previously unlawful aliens in the United States, affected "quasi-sovereign interests by imposing substantial pressure on them to change their laws, which provide for issuing driver's licenses to some aliens and subsidizing those licenses." 809 F.3d at 153 (quotation omitted).

Texas is indeed entitled to special solicitude. First, just as in the DAPA suit, Texas is asserting a procedural right under the APA to challenge an agency action. See id. at 152 ("In enacting the APA, Congress intended for those 'suffering legal wrong because of agency action' to have judicial recourse, and the states fall well within that definition." (quoting 5 U.S.C. § 702)). And second, Texas asserts precisely the same driver's-license-based injury here that it did there. See id. at 153–54 (explaining that DAPA, by greatly increasing the class of people to whom existing Texas law would entitle a subsidized driver's license, pressured Texas to change its own law—thus affecting a quasi-sovereign interest). Thus, Texas is entitled to special solicitude in the standing inquiry.

That solicitude means redressability is easier to establish for certain state litigants than for other litigants—and this should remove any lingering doubt as to that prong. See Massachusetts, 549 U.S. at 517–18 (holding a State "can assert [its] right[s] without meeting all the normal standards for redressability and immediacy" (quotations and citations omitted)). Texas would be able to establish redressability without this special solicitude—but it reinforces our conclusion that the States have standing and that the Government has failed to make a strong showing to the contrary.

2.

The Government next argues this suit is non-justiciable under the APA. The Government makes three arguments on this score. None is persuasive.

First, the Government argues that its termination of MPP is not a "final agency action" under the APA. The APA allows judicial review for "final agency action for which there is no other adequate remedy in a court." 5 U.S.C. § 704. And for an agency action to qualify as final, the action must (1) mark[] the consummation of the agency's decisionmaking process," and (2) either determine "rights or obligations" or produce "legal consequences." Texas v. EEOC, 933 F.3d 433, 441 (quoting Bennett v. Spear, 520 U.S. 154, 177–78 (1997)).

The Government does not contest that the June 1 Memorandum was the consummation of the decisionmaking process. As for the second prong, the Government simply asserts the Memorandum is a general policy statement—and therefore can neither determine rights nor produce obligations or legal consequences. Stay Mot. at 10–11. This argument ignores Circuit precedent establishing that a "policy statement" can nonetheless be "final agency action" under the APA. See Merchs. Fast Motor Lines, Inc. v. ICC, 5 F.3d 911, 919–20 (5th Cir. 1993). It also ignores the principle that "where agency action withdraws an entity's previously-held discretion, that action alters the legal regime, binds the entity, and thus qualifies as final agency action" under the APA. EEOC, 933 F.3d at 442 (quotation omitted). As the district court ably explained, the Memorandum withdrew DHS officers' previously existing discretion when it directed "DHS personnel, effective immediately, to take all appropriate actions to terminate MPP, including taking all steps necessary to rescind implementing guidance and other directives issued to carry out MPP." D. Ct. Op. at 27 (emphasis omitted) (quoting AR.7).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

b.

Second, the Government argues that the decision to terminate MPP is unreviewable under 5 U.S.C. § 701(a). Stay Mot. at 8. The APA creates a "basic presumption of judicial review." DHS v. Regents of the Univ. of Cal., 140 S. Ct. 1891, 1905 (2020) (quotation omitted). And to vindicate that presumption, the Supreme Court has read § 701(a)(2) "quite narrowly." Id. (quotation omitted). The presumption can be overcome "by a showing that the relevant statute precludes review, § 701(a)(1), or that the agency action is committed to agency discretion by law, § 701(a)(2)." Id. (quotations and alterations omitted). Here, the Government has tried but failed to make both showings.

The Government argues that 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C) is a "statute[] [that] preclude[s] judicial review." 5 U.S.C. § 701(a)(1). Section 1225(b)(2)(C) provides:

> In the case of an alien described in subparagraph (A) who is arriving on land (whether or not at a designated port of arrival) from a foreign territory contiguous to the United States, the Attorney General may return the alien to that territory pending a proceeding under section 1229a of this title.

That provision does confer the discretion to choose among various detention and non-detention options for aliens placed in § 1229a removal proceedings. But the question presented in the States' complaint is not whether a particular alien is subject to detention in any particular set of circumstances. The States are instead challenging DHS's June 1 decision to rescind MPP—

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

which is a government program that creates rules and procedures for entire classes of aliens. It remains true—with or without MPP—that DHS has discretion to make individualized detention and non-detention decisions in accordance with the strictures of § 1225. What DHS cannot do, the States allege, is rescind the MPP program in a way that is arbitrary, capricious, and contrary to law. DHS cites nothing to suggest that latter decision is committed to agency discretion. In fact, cases like Regents prove it is not. See 140 S. Ct. at 1905–06 (decision to rescind DACA not committed to agency discretion); Texas, 809 F.3d at 168–69 (decision to implement DAPA not committed to agency discretion).

The Government's argument that the decision to rescind MPP is "committed to agency discretion by law" fails for similar reasons. 5 U.S.C. § 701(a)(2); see Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1905. This form of non-reviewability occurs where a statute is "drawn so that it furnishes no meaningful standard by which to judge the [agency's] action." Dep't of Commerce v. New York, 139 S. Ct. 2251, 2568 (2019); see also Citizens to Preserve Overton Park, Inc. v. Volpe, 401 U.S. 402, 410 (1971) (holding a decision is committed to agency discretion when there is "no law to apply" (quotation omitted)). The Government argues that § 1225 provides no standard by which to evaluate DHS's action in this case. Stay Mot. at 8–9.

Once again, Supreme Court precedent undercuts the Government's argument. Even a statute that "leave[s] much to [an agency's] discretion" does not necessarily "leave [that] discretion unbounded." Dep't of Commerce, 139 S. Ct. at 2567–68 (holding a statute granting the Secretary of Commerce broad discretion to take the census "in such form and content as he may determine" did not commit the decision to reinstate a citizenship question to the Secretary's discretion (quotation omitted)). So too here. Section 1225(b)(2)(C) certainly confers discretion, but there is no reason to think that discretion is infinite—just as there is no reason to think the discretion extends beyond the bounds of individualized, case-by-case determinations to begin with. And like the statute in Department of Commerce, which included provisions that meaningfully restrained the Secretary of Commerce, see 139 S. Ct. at 2568–69, § 1225 includes provisions restraining the DHS in this case. See § 1225(b)(1)(B)(iii)(IV) (an alien subject to expedited removal, but without a credible fear of persecution, "shall be detained pending a final determination of credible fear of persecution"); § 1225(b)(1)(B)(ii) (an alien with a credible fear of persecution "shall be detained for further consideration of the application for asylum"); § 1225(b)(1)(B)(iii)(IV) ("Any alien subject to the procedures under this clause shall be detained pending a final determination of credible fear of persecution and, if found not to have such a fear, until removed."); § 1225(b)(2)(C) (Attorney General "may return" an alien not subject to expedited removal as an alternative to detention). We conclude that this is not a "case in which there is no law to apply." Dep't of Commerce, 139 S. Ct. at 2569 (quotation omitted).

c.

The Government's final justiciability argument is that the MPP-termination decision is nothing more than a non-enforcement decision, unreviewable under Heckler v. Chaney, 470 U.S. 821 (1985). This argument fails for two reasons. The first is that the termination of MPP is more than a non-enforcement policy, just like the DACA program at issue in Regents and the DAPA program at issue in Texas. As the district court explained, the termination of MPP will necessarily lead to the release and parole of aliens into the United States. And that will "create affirmative benefits for aliens such as work authorization." D. Ct. Op. at 31; see also Texas, 809 F.3d at 167 ("Likewise, to be reviewable agency action, DAPA need not directly confer public benefits—removing a categorical bar on receipt of those benefits and thereby making a class of persons newly eligible for them 'provides a focus for judicial review.'" (quoting Chaney, 470 U.S. at 832)).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Second and independently, the termination of MPP was simply not a non-enforcement decision. MPP was a government program—replete with rules procedures and dedicated infrastructure. It is precisely because MPP was a government program—and much more than a non-enforcement decision—that the Government now claims that it will be difficult to resume it. See infra Part III. And the Government cites nothing to suggest that the elimination of a such a program can be dismissed as mere "non-enforcement." The Government therefore has failed to make a strong showing that the States' claims are non-justiciable.

B.

The Government next argues that it is likely to succeed on appeal because the June 1 Memorandum accords with federal law. The district court held otherwise on two independent grounds. First, the district court determined that the termination of MPP violated the APA because the June 1 Memorandum was arbitrary and capricious. D. Ct. Op. at 34–42. Second, the district court concluded that in "these particular circumstances," the termination violated 8 U.S.C. § 1225. Id. at 42–44 (emphasis removed). We hold the Government has not come close to showing that it is likely to succeed in challenging either conclusion, let alone both.

1.

First, the APA. The APA directs courts to "hold unlawful and set aside agency action[s]" that are "arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law." 5 U.S.C. § 706(2). "The APA's arbitrary-and-capricious standard requires that agency action be reasonable and reasonably explained." FCC v. Prometheus Radio Project, 141 S. Ct. 1150, 1158 (2021). While applying this "deferential" standard, we must not

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

"substitute" our "own policy judgment for that of the agency." Id. But we must ensure that "the agency has acted within a zone of reasonableness and, in particular, has reasonably considered the relevant issues and reasonably explained the decision." Id.; see also Motor Vehicle Mfrs. Ass'n of U.S., Inc. v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 463 U.S. 29, 43 (1983) ("[T]he agency must examine the relevant data and articulate a satisfactory explanation for its action including a 'rational connection between the facts found and the choice made'" (quoting Burlington Truck Lines v. United States, 371 U.S. 156, 168 (1962))). "Put simply, we must set aside any action premised on reasoning that fails to account for 'relevant factors' or evinces 'a clear error of judgment.'" Univ. of Tex. M.D. Anderson Cancer Ctr. v. HHS, 985 F.3d 472, 475 (5th Cir. 2021) (quoting Marsh v. Or. Nat. Res. Council, 490 U.S. 360, 378 (1989)). This review "is not toothless." Sw. Elec. Power Co. v. United States Env't Prot. Agency, 920 F.3d 999, 1013 (5th Cir. 2019). And in all events, we can consider only the reasoning "articulated by the agency itself"; we cannot consider post hoc rationalizations. State Farm, 463 U.S. at 50; see also Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1909 ("An agency must defend its actions based on the reasons it gave when it acted.").

The Government has not shown a strong chance of success on appeal. That is because when terminating MPP in the June 1 Memorandum, the Secretary failed to consider several "relevant factors" and "'important aspect[s] of the problem.'" Michigan v. E.P.A., 576 U.S. 743, 750, 752 (2015) (quotations omitted); see also Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1910. These include (a) the States' legitimate reliance interests, (b) MPP's benefits, (c) potential alternatives to MPP, and (d) § 1225's implications. These four omissions likely doom the Government's appeal. The Governments counterarguments (e) are unpersuasive.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

DHS "failed to address whether there was 'legitimate reliance' on" MPP. Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1913 (quoting Smiley v. Citibank (S.D.), N.A., 517 U.S. 735, 742 (1996)). In its seven-page June 1 Memorandum, DHS does not directly mention any reliance interests, especially those of the States. The closest the June 1 Memorandum gets is a reference to "the impact [terminating MPP] could have on border management and border communities." AR5. But the Memorandum makes clear that "border communities" do not include border states. See id. ("referring only to "nongovernmental organizations and local officials"). And the vague reference to "border management" is insufficient to show specific, meaningful consideration of the States' reliance interests.

In response, the Government concedes that it failed to consider the States' reliance interests. But it argues that is irrelevant because "the States have no cognizable reliance interest in a discretionary program." Stay Mot. at 18. We reject that argument for several reasons.

Most importantly, the Government's contention is squarely foreclosed by Regents. There, the Supreme Court acknowledged that the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals ("DACA") program was a discretionary program. 140 S. Ct. at 1910. Still, the Court faulted DHS for not considering reliance interests, including in particular those of the states. As the Supreme Court explained, "[w]hen an agency changes course, . . . it must be cognizant that longstanding policies may have engendered serious reliance interests that must be taken into account." Id. at 1913 (quotation omitted). Those reliance interests included states' interests. See id. at 1914 (highlighting assertions that "[s]tates and local governments could lose $1.25 billion in tax revenue each year"). So if the termination of DACA—a discretionary, immigration program—must consider states' "potential reliance interests," then so does termination of MPP. Id. at 1913. That is particularly true here because the district court found as a matter of fact—and the Government does not contest—that states like Texas face fiscal harm from the termination of MPP. See D. Ct. Op. at 18–20.

The district court also found that the "termination of MPP has and will continue to increase the number of aliens being released into the United States." Id. at 17. The Supreme Court has recognized that border states "bear[] many of the consequences of unlawful immigration." Arizona v. United States, 567 U.S. 387, 397 (2012). It therefore follows that a "potential reliance interest" that DHS must consider includes Texas.

The DHS-Texas Agreement reinforces the Government's awareness of the State's reliance interests. In that Agreement, DHS stipulated:

- "Texas, like other States, is directly and concretely affected by changes to DHS rules and policies that have the effect of easing, relaxing, or limiting immigration enforcement." Compl., Ex. B at 1.
- "The harm to Texas is particularly acute where its budget has been set months or years in advance and it has no time to adjust its budget to respond to DHS policy changes." Id.
- "[A]n aggrieved party will be irreparably damaged." Id. at 5.

The Agreement further states that it "establishes a binding and enforceable commitment between DHS and Texas." Id. at 2. Texas therefore could reasonably rely on the Agreement. And Texas did in fact rely on the Agreement by including DHS's breach as a cause of action in its complaint—filed months before the June 1 Memorandum. And then—despite these reliance interests and despite being on notice of the Agreement from the States' complaint—the June 1 Memorandum said not one word about the Agreement. A "reasonable and reasonably explained" decision would have said something. Prometheus, 141 S. Ct. at 1158. That is why this "omission alone [likely] renders [the Secretary's] decision arbitrary and capricious." Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1913.[4]

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

b.

The June 1 Memorandum also failed to consider DHS's prior factual findings on MPP's benefits. In its October 2019 Assessment of MPP, DHS found that "aliens without meritorious claims—which no longer constitute[d] a free ticket into the United States—[were] beginning to voluntarily return home." D. Ct. Op. at 10. DHS also found that MPP addressed the "perverse incentives" created by allowing "those with non-meritorious claims . . . [to] remain in the country for lengthy periods of time." Id. These benefits, DHS emphasized, were a "core component" or "cornerstone" of the agency's prior immigration policy. Id. at 12.

Nonetheless, the June 1 Memorandum did not expressly mention, let alone meaningfully discuss, DHS's prior factual findings. Instead, the Secretary changed policies based on his own findings that contradict DHS's October 2019 findings. But an agency must provide "a more detailed justification" when a "new policy rests upon factual findings that contradict those which underlay its prior policy." FCC v. Fox Television Stations, Inc.,

[4] As the D.C. Circuit has emphasized in a different APA context, "the opportunity to comment is meaningless unless the agency responds to significant points raised by the public." Sherley v. Sebelius, 689 F.3d 776, 784 (D.C. Cir. 2012) (Sentelle, C.J.) (quotation omitted). We do not suggest that DHS needed notice-and-comment rulemaking to rescind MPP. But it did need to consider "relevant factors" to that rescission decision. Id. And you might reasonably think that one "relevant factor[]" to that decision was DHS's pledge "to consult Texas and consider its views before taking any action, adopting or modify[ing] a policy or procedure, or making any decision that" affects MPP. Compl., Ex. B at 2. Perhaps DHS has a good reason for its action. But it is likely arbitrary and capricious for DHS not even to acknowledge its agreement—let alone do anything to consult Texas or consider its views.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

556 U.S. 502, 515 (2009). The Secretary did not provide the required "more detailed justification." Id. This further indicates that the termination of MPP was arbitrary and capricious.

c.

The June 1 Memorandum also insufficiently addressed alternatives to terminating MPP. "[W]hen an agency rescinds a prior policy[,] its reasoned analysis must consider the alternatives that are within the ambit of the existing policy." Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1913 (quotation omitted). While considering alternatives, DHS "was required to assess whether there were reliance interests, determine whether they were significant, and weigh any such interests against competing policy concerns." Id. at 1915. As explained above, DHS did not adequately assess reliance interests. So it would be impossible for the June 1 Memorandum to properly weigh the relevant interests against competing policy concerns while considering alternatives.

The June 1 Memorandum offers a single conclusory sentence addressing potential modifications to MPP: "I also considered whether the program could be modified in some fashion, but I believe that addressing the deficiencies identified in my review would require a total redesign that would involve significant additional investments in personnel and resources." AR.5. But "belief" that a "total redesign" was required, id., is no substitute for a "reasonable and reasonably explained" decision. Prometheus, 141 S. Ct. at 1158.

Of course, "DHS was not required . . . to consider all policy alternatives in reaching [its] decision," and the agency has "considerable flexibility" to "wind-down" a program. Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1914 (emphasis added) (quotation omitted). But the problem is that the Secretary failed to mention any modification to MPP as a possible alternative, even though "the alternatives . . . are within the ambit of the existing policy." Id. at 1913

(quotations omitted). And merely stating that an alternative was considered is not enough to show reasoned analysis. Cf. United Techs. Corp. v. U.S. Dep't of Def., 601 F.3d 557, 562 (D.C. Cir. 2010) ("We do not defer to the agency's conclusory or unsupported suppositions." (quotation omitted)).

The Government's principal counterargument is that DHS considered an alternative outside "the ambit of the existing policy." Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1913. Specifically, the June 1 Memorandum pointed to a "Dedicated Docket" program designed to provide counsel to aliens in removal proceedings. AR.4–5 & n.6; see Stay Mot. at 16; Reply at 7. This argument is unpersuasive for at least two reasons. First, by the Government's own admission, the "Dedicated Docket" is outside the ambit of MPP—and hence it does not count as a reasoned consideration of alternatives "within the ambit of the existing policy." Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1913 (emphasis added). And second, neither the June 1 Memorandum nor the Government in its stay motion explains why MPP and the "Dedicated Docket" are mutually exclusive.

The June 1 Memorandum also failed to consider the legal implications of terminating the policy. After the Government suspended MPP—but before it rescinded the program—Texas filed this lawsuit. In its original complaint, and in its initial motion for preliminary injunction, Texas argued that the suspension of MPP violated § 1225. See Compl. at 36–38; Prelim. Inj. Mot., ECF No. 30. About a month and a half later, the Secretary issued the memorandum terminating MPP. So the government was on notice of the legal implications. Yet in the memorandum, the Secretary does not mention the lawfulness concerns involving § 1225—even though, the "natural response" to this "newly identified problem" would be to consider the problem. Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1916. This further indicates that "the process by which" the Secretary reached that result was neither "logical" nor "rational." Michigan, 576 U.S. at 750.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

e.

The Government offers a hodgepodge of counterarguments to justify the June 1 Memorandum's omissions. None is persuasive.

The Government repeatedly argues that DHS's statement that it considered this or that factor is enough to avoid any arbitrary-and-capricious problems. See Stay Mot. at 16. The law says otherwise. "Stating that a factor was considered . . . is not a substitute for considering it." Getty v. Fed. Sav. & Loan Ins. Corp., 805 F.2d 1050, 1055 (D.C. Cir. 1986); see also Corrosion Proof Fittings v. E.P.A., 947 F.2d 1201, 1226 (5th Cir. 1991) ("The EPA's failure to consider the regulatory alternatives, however, cannot be substantiated by conclusory statements . . . ."); United Techs., 601 F.3d at 562 ("We do not defer to the agency's conclusory or unsupported suppositions." (quotation omitted)); cf. Gerber v. Norton, 294 F.3d 173, 185 (D.C. Cir. 2002) ("And stating that a factor was considered—or found—is not a substitute for considering or finding it." (quotation omitted)); Gresham v. Azar, 950 F.3d 93, 103 (D.C. Cir. 2020) ("Nodding to concerns raised by commenters only to dismiss them in a conclusory manner is not a hallmark of reasoned decisionmaking."). This well-established principle makes sense. After all:

> [A]n agency's "experience and expertise" presumably enable the agency to provide the required explanation, but they do not substitute for the explanation, any more than an expert witness's credentials substitute for the substantive requirements applicable to the expert's testimony under Fed. R. Evid. 702. The requirement of explanation presumes the expertise and experience of the agency and still demands an adequate explanation in the particular matter.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

CS Wind Viet. Co. v. United States, 832 F.3d 1367, 1377 (Fed. Cir. 2016) (citations omitted).

The Government also points to the June 1 Memorandum's observations on MPP's shortcomings. See Stay Mot. at 16–17. Even if creditable, these observations cannot justify the other omissions discussed above. But in any event, many of those observations are neither "logical" nor "rational." Michigan, 576 U.S. at 750. Take DHS's termination justification based on in absentia removal orders. DHS observed that "the high percentage of cases completed through the entry of in absentia removal orders (approximately 44 percent, based on DHS data) raises questions for me about the design and operation of the program." AR.4 (emphasis added). The district court found that "[t]he federal government's data shows similarly high rates of in absentia removals prior to implementation of MPP." D. Ct. Op. at 40. The Government has not said one word to suggest the district court's factual finding was clearly erroneous.[5] We therefore cannot conclude that the Secretary "examine[d] the relevant data and articulate[d] a satisfactory explanation" with "a rational connection between the facts found and the choice" to terminate MPP. State Farm, 463 U.S. at 43 (quotation omitted). And even on the Government's own terms—considering only half the statistics and ignoring the district court's factual finding—the June 1 Memorandum only said that in absentia statistics "raise[d] questions for [DHS] about the design and operation of the

[5] In its reply brief, the Government argues that it need not have commissioned an "in-depth empirical analysis" of the in absentia statistics before rescinding MPP. Reply at 9. Of course that is true. But it is equally true that the Government cannot cherry-pick only the statistics it likes in the administrative record. Nor can the Government fail to address statistics that already exist in that record. See Encino Motorcars, LLC v. Navarro, 136 S. Ct. 2117, 2126 (2016) (holding "an unexplained inconsistency in agency policy is a reason for holding an interpretation to be an arbitrary and capricious change from agency practice" (quotation omitted)).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

program." AR.4. But the process required by the APA requires agencies to seek answers and reasonably explain the outcome of that effort, including its conclusions.

The June 1 Memorandum places much weight on COVID-19. According to the Memorandum, the pandemic "compounded" "challenges faced by MPP" when "immigration courts designated to hear MPP cases were closed for public health reasons between March 2020 and April 2021." AR.4. But DHS issued its memorandum terminating MPP at least one month after courts reopened. As the district court explained: "Past problems with past closures are irrelevant to the decision to prospectively terminate MPP in June 2021. This is especially true when the Secretary admits DHS had maintained the facilities during the pandemic." D. Ct. Op. at 41. The Government challenges this conclusion on the ground that "infrastructure used for MPP remains shuttered." Stay Mot. at 19 n.4. But the Government provides no indication that the facilities are not maintained or are shuttered because of the pandemic—as opposed to the choice the Government itself made when it suspended MPP in January 2021.

In addition to the APA, the district court also relied on 8 U.S.C. § 1225. The Government claims that the district court determined that "the Secretary is required to return any noncitizen he fails to detain" and that the district court's "core legal analysis" is that DHS has "a binary choice between detention or return to Mexico for noncitizens arriving from Mexico." Stay Mot. at 11–13. In essence, the Government characterizes the district court's decision and injunction as removing the Government's ability to use its discretion under 8 U.S.C. §§ 1182(d)(5)(A) and 1226. But as we explain in Part III, infra, the Government has mischaracterized the district court's order. This matters because all of the Government's § 1225 arguments hinge on an incorrect premise.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Therefore, we cannot conclude that the Government is likely to succeed on either its APA arguments or its § 1225 arguments—let alone that the Government is likely to succeed on both. The Government therefore has not come close to a "strong showing" that it is likely to succeed on the merits. Nken, 556 U.S. at 426.

III.

The Government also has not shown that it will be irreparably injured absent a stay pending appeal. The Government's arguments are largely built on two strawmen. We consider and reject those before turning to the Government's other arguments.

First, the Government complains that it will be irreparably harmed absent a stay because DHS is incapable of reinstating MPP "in a matter of days." Stay Mot. at 21; see also Decl. of David Shahoulian ¶ 16 (Aug. 16, 2021) (arguing DHS cannot immediately "reestablish the entire infrastructure upon which [MPP] was built"). This is a strawman. The district court did not order the Government to restore MPP's infrastructure overnight. It ordered that, once the injunction takes effect on August 21, DHS must "enforce and implement MPP in good faith." D. Ct. Op. at 52. DHS does not argue that good faith is an unreasonably high standard to meet.

Second, the Government asserts it will be irreparably injured because the injunction obligates DHS to detain "every single person described in 8 U.S.C. § 1225," which DHS cannot do because it lacks "sufficient detention capacity." Decl. of David Shahoulian ¶ 5 (Aug. 16, 2021). This is a second strawman. The injunction does not require the Government to detain every alien subject to § 1225. Nor does it order the Government to "build or obtain" additional detention facilities. Stay Mot. at 21. Instead, it requires the Government to "enforce and implement MPP in good faith . . . until such a time as the federal government has sufficient detention capacity to detain all aliens subject to mandatory detention." D. Ct. Op. at 52 (second emphasis added).

And far from ordering the Government to detain "every single person described in 8 U.S.C. § 1225," Decl. of David Shahoulian ¶ 5 (Aug. 16, 2021), the district court specifically acknowledged that the Government has other options. Under § 1225(b)(2)(A), which provides the statutory authority for MPP, an alien arriving on land from a contiguous foreign territory can be returned to that territory. See D. Ct. Op. at 43 & n.11 (noting this discretion). Under 8 U.S.C. § 1182(d)(5)(A), DHS can parole an alien into the United States "on a case-by-case basis for urgent humanitarian reasons or significant public benefit." (Emphasis added); see D. Ct. Op. at 43 & n.11 (noting this discretion). Under 8 U.S.C. § 1226, DHS can release on "bond" or "conditional parole" an alien arrested on a warrant and detained "pending a decision on whether the alien is to be removed." See also Stay Mot. at 12; D. Ct. Op. at 51 (noting this discretion). Last but not least, of course, the Government can choose to detain an alien in accordance with § 1225. See D. Ct. Op. at 43 (noting this discretion).

What the Government cannot do, the district court held, is simply release every alien described in § 1225 en masse into the United States. The Government has not pointed to a single word anywhere in the INA that suggests it can do that. And the Government cannot claim an irreparable injury from being enjoined against an action that it has no statutory authorization to take.

Third and finally, we turn to the Government's non-strawmen arguments for its irreparable injuries. Most of these are self-inflicted and therefore do not count. See 11A CHARLES ALAN WRIGHT, ET AL.,

FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 2948.1 (2021) ("[A] party may not satisfy the irreparable harm requirement if the harm complained of is self-inflicted"). For example, the Government notes that "DHS has been in the process of unwinding MPP and its infrastructure for months," such that restarting the program now would be difficult. Stay Mot. at 21. But as the district court noted, "Texas filed suit challenging the suspension of enrollments in MPP . . . nearly two months before DHS purported to terminate the program entirely in the June 1 Memorandum." D. Ct. Op. at 47. Therefore, DHS could have avoided this problem by waiting to unwind MPP until this litigation was resolved. The self-inflicted nature of the government's asserted harm "'severely undermines' its claim for equitable relief." Al Otro Lado v. Wolf, 952 F.3d 999, 1008 (9th Cir. 2020) (quoting Hirschfeld v. Bd. of Elections in City of N.Y., 984 F.2d 35, 39 (2d Cir. 1993)); accord Second City Music, Inc. v. City of Chicago, 333 F.3d 846, 850 (7th Cir. 2003) ("[S]elf-inflicted wounds are not irreparable injury."); Caplan v. Fellheimer Eichen Braverman & Kaskey, 68 F.3d 828, 839 (3d Cir. 1995) ("If the harm complained of is self-inflicted, it does not qualify as irreparable.").

Before the district court, the Government also suggested that it began unwinding MPP four or more months before the June 1 Memorandum. See D. Ct. Op. at 48. That understandably would make it harder for DHS to restart MPP on Saturday. But it also makes DHS's legal position dramatically weaker. It is a fundamental precept of administrative law that an administrative agency cannot make its decision first and explain it later. See, e.g., Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1908–10. Insofar as DHS concedes that its June 1 Memorandum is a post hoc rationalization for a decision that it made many months earlier, it has conceded that the June 1 Memorandum is arbitrary, capricious, and not a good faith explanation for its decision. Such inequitable conduct is "sufficient to deny" DHS's request for an equitable stay pending appeal. See In re GGW Brands, LLC, No. 2:13-bk-15130, 2013 WL 6906375, at *26–*27 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. Nov. 15, 2013).

The Government also asserts that reinstating MPP will cause harm because "DHS cannot restart MPP without significant cooperation with Mexico," and the injunction implicates "delicate and ongoing discussions with Mexico." Stay Mot. at 21. There are at least four problems with that. First, as the district court noted, DHS created MPP unilaterally and without any previous agreement with Mexico. See D. Ct. Op. at 49 & n.15. DHS does not explain why it cannot likewise restart MPP unilaterally. Second, the Government does not point to any evidence that Mexico has withdrawn its support for MPP. See AR.152–53 (Mexico's December 20, 2018 statement of support). Third, the Government "'could have avoided' any disruptions by simply informing Mexico that termination of MPP would be subject to judicial review." D. Ct. Op. at 47 (quoting Texas, 809 F.3d at 187). Insofar as the Government failed to do that, again, its injury is self-inflicted. Fourth, even assuming Mexico's support is required, assuming Mexico has withdrawn its support, and assuming Mexico will not support a new MPP, the injunction still does not irreparably harm the Government. The injunction only requires good faith on the part of the United States—if the Government's good-faith efforts to implement MPP are thwarted by Mexico, it nonetheless will be in compliance with the district court's order, so long as it also adheres to the rest of the statutory requirements.

Finally, because the Government has requested a stay pending completion of appellate proceedings, the relevant question is whether the Government will be irreparably harmed during the pendency of the appeal. Even if the Government were correct that long-term compliance with the district court's injunction would cause irreparable harm, it presents no reason to think that it cannot comply with the district court's requirement of good faith while the appeal proceeds. Therefore, the Government has failed to demonstrate that it will be irreparably injured absent a stay pending appeal.

IV.

The final two Nken factors also do not warrant a stay. See Nken, 556 U.S. at 434.

The district court concluded that the States have suffered, and will continue to suffer, harms as a result of the termination of MPP. See D. Ct. Op. at 17 ("The termination of MPP has [increased] and will continue to increase the number of aliens being released into the United States and has [imposed] and will continue to impose harms on Plaintiff States Texas and Missouri."). We agree. See supra Part II.A.1 (standing). A stay "would enable" aliens released into the interior "to apply for driver's licenses and other benefits, and it would be difficult for the states to retract those benefits or recoup their costs even if they won on the merits." Texas, 787 F.3d at 768.

Likewise, the "public interest [is] in having governmental agencies abide by the federal laws that govern their existence and operations." Washington v. Reno, 35 F.3d 1093, 1102 (6th Cir. 1994). Here, the Government has failed to carry its burden to show that its conduct comports with federal law. And "[t]here is generally no public interest in the perpetuation of unlawful agency action." League of Women Voters of U.S. v. Newby, 838 F.3d 1, 12 (D.C. Cir. 2016).

The Government is also wrong to say that a stay would promote the public interest by preserving the separation of powers. All the district court's injunction requires of the Government is that it act in accordance with the INA. And in all events, "it is the resolution of the case on the merits, not whether the injunction is stayed pending appeal, that will affect" principles of "separation of powers and federalism." Texas, 787 F.3d at 768.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

MO-AG-22-0644-A-003413

The DHS-Texas Agreement also suggests the public interest counsels against issuing a stay. That Agreement expressly acknowledged that if DHS failed to comply with the Agreement's terms, Texas would "be irreparably damaged" and would "not have an adequate remedy at law." Compl., Ex. B at 4. The Agreement remained binding until August 1, 2021, and the parties agree DHS violated its terms. See D. Ct. Op. at 14 ("The parties agree DHS did not follow the[] procedures" required by the Agreement.). The district court concluded that the expiration of the Agreement mooted Texas's claim under it. See id. at 44. As noted in Part II above, however, the States' likelihood of success on the merits of their APA claims means that DHS will have to consider all relevant factors before attempting to rescind MPP—including its effects on the States. The public interest plainly lies in not allowing DHS to circumvent those federalism concerns.

V.

Finally, the Government argues a stay is warranted because the district court should have remanded without vacating the June 1 Memorandum or issuing an injunction. Stay Mot. at 22; see also Reply at 12. "Remand, not vacatur, is generally appropriate when there is at least a serious possibility that the agency will be able to substantiate its decision given an opportunity to do so." Texas Ass'n of Manufacturers v. United States Consumer Prod. Safety Comm'n, 989 F.3d 368, 389 (5th Cir. 2021). But it is unclear how DHS can substantiate its decision on remand. Neither in its opening stay motion nor in its reply does the Government suggest how it can. See generally Stay Mot. at 22–23; Reply at 12. And Supreme Court precedent suggests that any later memorandum on remand elaborating on the June 1 Memorandum would be irrelevant to an arbitrary-and-capricious analysis because it is a post hoc rationalization. See Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1907–09. So at this stage, without any argument whatsoever to the contrary, it appears that DHS would have to issue "a new rule implementing a new policy" that

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

"compl[ies] with the procedural requirements for new agency action." Id. at 1908 (emphases added).

Vacatur, by contrast, would not cause "disruptive consequences". See United Steel v. Mine Safety & Health Admin., 925 F.3d 1279, 1287 (D.C. Cir. 2019) (also considering "the disruptive consequences of vacatur" (internal quotation marks omitted)). The Government makes no argument materially different from its irreparable-injury argument. So we reject the Government's arguments here for the same reasons we rejected them in Part III, supra.

* * *

The Government has failed to make the requisite showing for all four Nken factors. The Government's motion for a stay pending appeal is therefore DENIED. The Government's appeal is hereby EXPEDITED for consideration before the next available oral argument panel.

Appeal from the United States District Court
for the Northern District of Texas
USDC No. 2:21-cv-67

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Before ELROD, OLDHAM, and WILSON, Circuit Judges.

PER CURIAM:

This case concerns the Migrant Protection Protocols ("MPP") created by the Secretary of the Department of Homeland Security on December 20, 2018, and purportedly rescinded by DHS in a memorandum on June 1, 2021 ("June 1 Memorandum").[1] After a full bench trial and 53 pages of findings of fact and conclusions of law, the district court concluded that DHS's purported rescission of MPP violated, inter alia, the Administrative Procedure Act ("APA"). DHS seeks a stay pending appeal. After carefully considering full briefing from the parties, we hold DHS failed to satisfy the four stay factors. See Nken v. Holder, 556 U.S. 418 (2009). The motion is denied.

A.

On December 20, 2018, the Trump Administration implemented MPP in response to an immigration surge at the southern border. D. Ct. Op. at 7. The statutory authority for MPP is found in 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C), which authorizes the Government to return certain third-country nationals arriving in the United States to Mexico or Canada for the duration of their removal proceedings under 8 U.S.C. § 1229a. Id. at 8. Also on December 20, 2018, the United States obtained Mexico's agreement to permit entry of MPP enrollees. Id. The goal of MPP was to ensure that "[c]ertain aliens attempting to enter the U.S. illegally or without documentation . . . will no longer be released into the country, where they often fail to file an asylum

[1] We refer to the Secretary's actions as those of "DHS" unless otherwise stated.

application and/or disappear before an immigration judge can determine the merits of any claim." Id. (quotation omitted).

In January 2019, "DHS began implementing MPP, initially in San Diego, California, then El Paso, Texas, and Calexico, California, and then nationwide." Id. (citing AR.155–56, AR.684). In February 2019, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement issued guidance on MPP to its field offices, anticipating the expansion of MPP across the border. Id. at 9 (citing AR.165–70). By December 31, 2020, DHS had enrolled 68,039 aliens in MPP. Id. at 12 (citing AR.555).

DHS and Texas entered into a Memorandum of Understanding (the "Agreement"), which the parties finalized on January 8, 2021. Id. at 13 (citing Compl., Ex. B at 8). The Agreement required Texas to provide information and assist DHS to "perform its border security, legal immigration, immigration enforcement, and national security missions." Id. (quoting Compl., Ex. B at 2). In return, DHS agreed to consult Texas and consider its views before taking actions that could modify immigration enforcement. See id. at 13–14 (citing Compl., Ex. B at 2). DHS also agreed to "'[p]rovide Texas with 180 days' written notice . . . of any proposed action' subject to the consultation requirement," id. at 14 (quoting Compl., Ex. B at 3), so that Texas would have an opportunity to comment on the proposal. The Agreement further required DHS to consider Texas's input "in good faith" and, if it decided to reject Texas's input, "provide a detailed written explanation" of its reasons for doing so. Id. (emphasis omitted) (quoting Compl., Ex. B at 3).

On Inauguration Day, the Biden Administration announced that it would suspend further enrollments in MPP. The Acting Secretary of DHS wrote that "[e]ffective January 21, 2021, the Department will suspend new enrollments in the Migrant Protection Protocols (MPP), pending further review of the program. Aliens who are not already enrolled in MPP should be processed under other existing legal authorities." Id. at 15 (quoting AR.581).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

On February 2, 2021, DHS sent a letter to Texas purporting to terminate the Agreement "effective immediately." Id. at 14. Because it believed that the letter did not comply with the Agreement's required procedures, Texas interpreted the letter "as a notice of intent to terminate" the Agreement. Id. (citing ECF No. 53 at 21).

On April 13, 2021, Texas and Missouri (the "States") sued, challenging the temporary suspension of MPP. Id. at 1 (citing ECF No. 1). The States alleged that DHS's January 20 Memorandum violated the APA, the Immigration and Nationality Act ("INA"), the Constitution, and the Agreement. See id. at 2 (citing ECF No. 1 at 4; ECF No. 45). On May 14, the States moved for a preliminary injunction that would enjoin the Government from enforcing and implementing the January 20 Memorandum. Prelim. Inj. Mot., ECF No. 30.

On June 1, before briefing on the preliminary injunction had concluded, DHS issued a new memorandum permanently terminating MPP. D. Ct. Op. at 2. The district court concluded that the June 1 Memorandum mooted the States' complaint, and the court allowed the States to amend their complaint and file a new preliminary injunction motion. Id. The parties agreed to consolidate the preliminary injunction hearing with the trial on the merits pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 65(a)(2). Id. at 3.

B.

Following the bench trial, the district court issued a 53-page memorandum opinion and order, concluding that the States were entitled to relief on their APA and statutory claims. See D. Ct. Op. at 1. The district court made many findings of fact that are relevant here. Among other things,

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

the district court found that MPP had significant benefits before DHS purported to rescind it. For example, DHS's October 2019 Assessment of MPP concluded that "aliens without meritorious claims—which no longer constitute[d] a free ticket into the United States—[were] beginning to voluntarily return home." D. Ct. Op. at 10. And the court noted that DHS also found MPP effective in addressing the prior "perverse incentives" created by allowing "those with non-meritorious claims . . . [to] remain in the country for lengthy periods of time." Id. The court found that this caused a significant decrease in immigration-enforcement encounters along the southern border. Id. And more directly, the court found that caused a decrease in "the number of aliens released into the interior of the United States for the duration of their U.S. removal proceedings." Id. at 11 (citing AR.554). These benefits, DHS emphasized, were a "cornerstone" of the agency's prior immigration policy. D. Ct. Op. at 12.

The court made specific (and largely uncontested) factual findings that "[t]he termination of MPP has [increased] and will continue to increase the number of aliens being released into the United States," and that this increase "has [imposed] and will continue to impose harms on Plaintiff States Texas and Missouri." Id. at 17. On the basis of its factual findings, the district court determined that the States had Article III standing, that the court had jurisdiction to review the agency action, and that the States were within the zone of interests of the INA. Id. at 21–34. The court then concluded that DHS's termination of MPP was unlawful under the APA because the action was arbitrary and capricious and contrary to the INA. Id. at 34–44. Based on those conclusions, the district court "permanently enjoined and restrained [DHS] from implementing or enforcing the June 1 Memorandum" and ordered DHS "to enforce and implement MPP in good faith until such a time as it has been lawfully rescinded in compliance with the APA and until such a time as the federal government has sufficient detention capacity to detain all aliens subject to mandatory detention under Section 1255 without releasing any aliens because of a lack of detention resources." Id. at 52–53 (emphases omitted).

DHS noticed an appeal. On August 17, 2021, the Government requested an emergency stay under Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 8. The States opposed that request on August 18. On August 19, the Government filed a reply. The Government requested that we rule the same day, August 19. In considering the Government's request, we must consider four factors: (1) whether the Government makes a strong showing that it is likely to succeed on the merits; (2) whether the Government will be irreparably injured in the absence of a stay; (3) whether other interested parties will be irreparably injured by a stay; and (4) where the public interest lies. See Nken, 556 U.S. at 426.

II.

We begin with whether the Government has made a strong showing that it is likely to succeed on the merits. The Government makes two merits arguments: (A) the case is not justiciable, and (B) DHS's rescission of MPP did not violate federal law. The Government is likely wrong on both.

A.

The Government first argues that it is likely to succeed on the merits because two justiciability doctrines—standing and non-reviewability—operate as insuperable obstacles to the States' suit. We consider and reject each argument in turn.

1.

First, the States' standing. To establish standing, the States "must show an injury that is 'concrete, particularized, and actual or imminent; fairly traceable to the challenged action; and redressable by a favorable ruling.'"

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Texas v. United States, 809 F.3d 134, 150 (5th Cir. 2015) (quoting Clapper v. Amnesty Int'l USA, 568 U.S. 398, 409 (2013)). "Only one of the [appellants] needs to have standing to permit us to consider the [complaint]."[2] Massachusetts v. EPA, 549 U.S. 497, 518 (2007); accord Nat'l Rife Ass'n Am., Inc. v. McCraw, 719 F.3d 338, 344 n.3 (5th Cir. 2013). Because the Government is seeking a stay, we must ask whether it has made a strong showing that the States lack standing. See Valentine v. Collier, 956 F.3d 797, 801 (5th Cir. 2020).

After a bench trial, we review the district court's factual determinations for clear error. See, e.g., Texas, 809 F.3d at 171–72 (reviewing a factual finding for clear error); Env't Tex. Citizen Lobby, Inc. v. ExxonMobil Corp., 968 F.3d 357, 367 (5th Cir. 2020) ("Because this case was tried, Plaintiffs needed to prove standing by a preponderance of the evidence. A factual finding that a plaintiff met that burden is reviewed for clear error." (citation omitted)). And any argument not raised on appeal (including a challenge to a district court's factual finding) is forfeited. See, e.g., United States v. Edwards, 303 F.3d 606, 647 (5th Cir. 2002) ("Many of the 'errors' cited by the defendants are unbriefed. These issues have been [forfeited]."); cf. Fed. R. App. P. 28(a)(9)(A) ("The appellant's brief must contain . . . appellant's contentions and the reasons for them, with citations to the authorities and parts of the record on which the appellant relies.").

We begin with (a) the district court's uncontested factual findings. Then we hold that the Government fails to make a strong showing that it is likely to succeed on appeal because it has not shown that the States lack (b) an injury-in-fact that is (c) traceable and (d) redressable. Finally, any doubt

[2] For this reason, we focus on Texas's standing. We note, however, that Missouri brings largely similar arguments with respect to driver's-license, educational, healthcare, and other costs.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

about the States' standing is resolved by (e) the special solicitude guaranteed to sovereign States in our federal system.

a.

The district court found eight facts central to the standing issue. These include:

1. The court found that because of MPP's termination, the Government has been "forced to release and parole aliens into the United States because [the Government] simply [does] not have the resources to detain aliens as mandated by statute." D. Ct. Op. at 17; see also id. at 18 (finding that Texas's "border state" status means some of those aliens have ended up in Texas).
2. The court found that DHS previously acknowledged that "MPP implementation contributed to decreasing the volume of inadmissible aliens arriving in the United States on land from Mexico." Id. at 17 (quotation and alteration omitted).
3. The court found that "the termination of MPP has contributed to the current border surge." Id.
4. The court found that "[s]ince MPP's termination, the number of enforcement encounters on the southwest border has skyrocketed." Id.; see also id. at 18 n.7 (noting "the sworn statement of David Shahoulian, Assistant Secretary for Border and Immigration Policy at DHS," including Shahoulian's statement that "[b]ased on current trends, the Department expects that total encounters this fiscal year are likely to be the highest ever recorded" (emphasis omitted)).
5. The court found that many "aliens present in Texas because of MPP's termination would apply for driver's licenses," the granting of which would impose a cost on Texas. Id. at 19.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

6. The court found that "[s]ome school-age child aliens who would have otherwise been enrolled in MPP are being released or paroled into the United States," and that (according to state estimates) Texas will expend an average of $9,216 per additional student in the 2021 school year. Id. at 19.
7. The court found that "[s]ome aliens who would have otherwise been enrolled in MPP are being released or paroled into the United States and will use state-funded healthcare services or benefits in Texas," imposing a cost on the state. D. Ct. Op. at 19–20 (citing AR.555, AR.587–88).
8. Finally, the court found that "[s]ome aliens who would have otherwise been enrolled in MPP are being released or paroled into the United States and [some] will commit crimes in Texas," imposing costs on the state's correctional apparatus. Id. at 20.

The Government does not challenge any of these findings.[3] But even if it did, we would not find any of them clearly erroneous in the light of the record as a whole. See, e.g., United States v. Ismoila, 100 F.3d 380, 396 (5th Cir. 1996) ("[A]s long as the determination is plausible in light of the record as a whole, clear error does not exist.").

Texas's injuries are actual and imminent. As just described, MPP's termination has caused an increase in immigration into Texas. And as

[3] On one reading of the Government's brief, it does contest the fifth finding. See Stay Mot. at 7 (discussing "speculation about an increase in the number of aliens released and paroled who will seek driver's licenses" (quotation omitted)). But in any case, neither our precedent nor the district court's record allows us to conclude the Government is likely to show the finding is clearly erroneous. See Texas, 809 F.3d at 156 (making a similar inference about driver's license applications).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

discussed at length in Texas v. United States, Texas law requires the issuance of a license to any qualified person—including noncitizens who "present . . . documentation issued by the appropriate United States agency that authorizes the applicant to be in the United States." 809 F.3d at 155–56 (alteration in original) (quoting TEX. TRANSP. CODE § 521.142(a)); see also id. (discussing other Texas requirements for a driver's license). Of course, unlike in the Deferred Action for Parents of Americans and Lawful Permanent Residents ("DAPA") program, the challenged action here does not ipso facto guarantee that a given alien will satisfy that requirement. Yet the district court's uncontested findings of fact likely compel the conclusion that MPP's termination has led to an increase in the number of aliens in Texas, many of whom will apply for driver's licenses. And the district court found that Texas incurs a cost every time it inquires into whether an alien satisfies the requirements for a license—even if the person does not in fact qualify for a license. D. Ct. Op. at 19 ("Each additional customer seeking a Texas driver's license imposes a cost on Texas."); see also Decl. of Sheri Gipson, Chief of the Texas Department of Public Safety Driver License Division, ¶ 8 ("DPS estimates that for an additional 10,000 driver['s] license customers seeking a limited term license, DPS would incur a biennial cost of approximately $2,014,870.80." (emphasis added)). So Texas has shown imminent injury in this case. See Texas, 809 F.3d at 156 (reaching the same conclusion on similar facts). Driver's licenses aside, the district court's unchallenged factual findings regarding educational, healthcare, and correctional costs provide equally strong bases for finding cognizable, imminent injury.

The Government's counterargument (limited to the driver's-license theory) is that the district court's analysis was "primarily based on speculation about an increase in the number of aliens released and paroled who will seek driver's licenses." Stay Mot. at 7 (quotation omitted). But the c.

MO-AG-22-0644-A-003425

Government has done nothing to show that district court's findings of fact about the increased number of aliens were clearly erroneous. And it is grounded in our precedent. Texas, 809 F.3d at 156 ("[T]here is little doubt that many [DAPA beneficiaries] would [apply for driver's licenses] because driving is a practical necessity in most of the state.").

Texas's injury is also traceable to the Government's termination of MPP. The district court's uncontested factual findings establish as much: MPP's termination has caused an increase in unlawful immigration into Texas. Many new immigrants are certain to apply for driver's licenses—and evaluating each application will impose costs on Texas. Cf. Texas, 809 F.3d at 160 (noting that new immigrants—in that case, DAPA recipients—"have strong incentives to obtain driver's licenses, and it is hardly speculative that many would do so if they became eligible."). Likewise, at least some MPP-caused immigrants will certainly seek educational and healthcare services from the state. And the States have incurred and will continue to incur costs associated with the border crisis, at least part of which the district court found is traceable to rescinding MPP. The causal chain is easy to see, and the Government does not meaningfully contest this point. See also Massachusetts v. EPA, 549 U.S. at 523 (finding traceability where the EPA's challenged action may have caused people to drive less fuel-efficient cars, which may in turn contribute to a prospective rise in sea levels, which may in turn cause the erosion of Massachusetts's shoreline).

d.

An injunction would remedy Texas's injury by requiring reinstatement of MPP. And with MPP back in place, immigration officers would once again have discretion to return (some) aliens to Mexico. The Government gives two arguments that it says undercut redressability. First,

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

the Government contends, an injunction would provide no redress because immigration officers under MPP would have discretion about whether to return any given immigrant to Mexico. Stay Mot. at 8. This argument ignores the fact that, during MPP's operative period, immigration agents did in fact order over 50,000 aliens back to Mexico from the Texas border. ECF 11 at 2. The Government offers no basis to conclude that a renewed MPP would have any different impact.

Second, the Government argues there is no redressability because aliens cannot be returned to Mexico without Mexico's consent. Stay Mot. at 8. This argument fails because for at least some aliens, MPP would permit DHS to simply refuse admission at ports of entry in the first place. See 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C) (allowing the Attorney General to "return [an] alien" "who is arriving on land (whether or not at a designated port of arrival) from a foreign territory contiguous to the United States . . . to that territory pending a" removal proceeding). Further, Mexico issued a statement in 2018 consenting to admit aliens excluded from the United States under MPP—and nothing in the record suggests Mexico has since retracted that consent. See AR.153 (Secretaría do Relaciones Exteriores, Position of Mexico on the Decision of the U.S. Government to Invoke Section 235(b)(2)(C) of its Immigration and Nationality Act (Dec. 20, 2018)).

To eliminate any doubt as to standing, we emphasize that the States are entitled to "special solicitude" in the standing analysis. Massachusetts v. EPA, 549 U.S. at 520; see also Texas, 809 F.3d at 151 (beginning with the special-solicitude question). Such special solicitude has two requirements: (1) the State must have a procedural right to challenge the action in question, and (2) the challenged action must affect one of the State's quasi-sovereign interests. Texas, 809 F.3d at 151–52 (citing Massachusetts, 549 U.S. at 516–

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

20). In both Massachusetts and Texas, the first prong was satisfied where a State challenged an agency action as invalid under a statute. 549 U.S. at 516–17 (Clean Air Act); 809 F.3d at 152–53 (APA). And in both cases, the second prong was satisfied where a State's challenge involved an agency's alleged failure to protect certain formerly "sovereign prerogatives [that] are now lodged in the Federal Government." Massachusetts, 549 U.S. at 520; see Texas, 809 F.3d at 152–54. Particularly relevant here is Texas, where this Court held that DAPA, by authorizing the presence of many previously unlawful aliens in the United States, affected "quasi-sovereign interests by imposing substantial pressure on them to change their laws, which provide for issuing driver's licenses to some aliens and subsidizing those licenses." 809 F.3d at 153 (quotation omitted).

Texas is indeed entitled to special solicitude. First, just as in the DAPA suit, Texas is asserting a procedural right under the APA to challenge an agency action. See id. at 152 ("In enacting the APA, Congress intended for those 'suffering legal wrong because of agency action' to have judicial recourse, and the states fall well within that definition." (quoting 5 U.S.C. § 702)). And second, Texas asserts precisely the same driver's-license-based injury here that it did there. See id. at 153–54 (explaining that DAPA, by greatly increasing the class of people to whom existing Texas law would entitle a subsidized driver's license, pressured Texas to change its own law—thus affecting a quasi-sovereign interest). Thus, Texas is entitled to special solicitude in the standing inquiry.

That solicitude means redressability is easier to establish for certain state litigants than for other litigants—and this should remove any lingering doubt as to that prong. See Massachusetts, 549 U.S. at 517–18 (holding a State "can assert [its] right[s] without meeting all the normal standards for redressability and immediacy" (quotations and citations omitted)). Texas would be able to establish redressability without this special solicitude—but it reinforces our conclusion that the States have standing and that the Government has failed to make a strong showing to the contrary.

2.

The Government next argues this suit is non-justiciable under the APA. The Government makes three arguments on this score. None is persuasive.

First, the Government argues that its termination of MPP is not a "final agency action" under the APA. The APA allows judicial review for "final agency action for which there is no other adequate remedy in a court." 5 U.S.C. § 704. And for an agency action to qualify as final, the action must (1) mark[] the consummation of the agency's decisionmaking process," and (2) either determine "rights or obligations" or produce "legal consequences." Texas v. EEOC, 933 F.3d 433, 441 (quoting Bennett v. Spear, 520 U.S. 154, 177–78 (1997)).

The Government does not contest that the June 1 Memorandum was the consummation of the decisionmaking process. As for the second prong, the Government simply asserts the Memorandum is a general policy statement—and therefore can neither determine rights nor produce obligations or legal consequences. Stay Mot. at 10–11. This argument ignores Circuit precedent establishing that a "policy statement" can nonetheless be "final agency action" under the APA. See Merchs. Fast Motor Lines, Inc. v. ICC, 5 F.3d 911, 919–20 (5th Cir. 1993). It also ignores the principle that "where agency action withdraws an entity's previously-held discretion, that action alters the legal regime, binds the entity, and thus qualifies as final agency action" under the APA. EEOC, 933 F.3d at 442 (quotation omitted). As the district court ably explained, the Memorandum withdrew DHS officers' previously existing discretion when it directed "DHS personnel, effective immediately, to take all appropriate actions to terminate MPP, including taking all steps necessary to rescind implementing guidance and other directives issued to carry out MPP." D. Ct. Op. at 27 (emphasis omitted) (quoting AR.7).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

b.

Second, the Government argues that the decision to terminate MPP is unreviewable under 5 U.S.C. § 701(a). Stay Mot. at 8. The APA creates a "basic presumption of judicial review." DHS v. Regents of the Univ. of Cal., 140 S. Ct. 1891, 1905 (2020) (quotation omitted). And to vindicate that presumption, the Supreme Court has read § 701(a)(2) "quite narrowly." Id. (quotation omitted). The presumption can be overcome "by a showing that the relevant statute precludes review, § 701(a)(1), or that the agency action is committed to agency discretion by law, § 701(a)(2)." Id. (quotations and alterations omitted). Here, the Government has tried but failed to make both showings.

The Government argues that 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C) is a "statute[] [that] preclude[s] judicial review." 5 U.S.C. § 701(a)(1). Section 1225(b)(2)(C) provides:

> In the case of an alien described in subparagraph (A) who is arriving on land (whether or not at a designated port of arrival) from a foreign territory contiguous to the United States, the Attorney General may return the alien to that territory pending a proceeding under section 1229a of this title.

That provision does confer the discretion to choose among various detention and non-detention options for aliens placed in § 1229a removal proceedings. But the question presented in the States' complaint is not whether a particular alien is subject to detention in any particular set of circumstances. The States are instead challenging DHS's June 1 decision to rescind MPP—

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

which is a government program that creates rules and procedures for entire classes of aliens. It remains true—with or without MPP—that DHS has discretion to make individualized detention and non-detention decisions in accordance with the strictures of § 1225. What DHS cannot do, the States allege, is rescind the MPP program in a way that is arbitrary, capricious, and contrary to law. DHS cites nothing to suggest that latter decision is committed to agency discretion. In fact, cases like Regents prove it is not. See 140 S. Ct. at 1905–06 (decision to rescind DACA not committed to agency discretion); Texas, 809 F.3d at 168–69 (decision to implement DAPA not committed to agency discretion).

The Government's argument that the decision to rescind MPP is "committed to agency discretion by law" fails for similar reasons. 5 U.S.C. § 701(a)(2); see Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1905. This form of non-reviewability occurs where a statute is "drawn so that it furnishes no meaningful standard by which to judge the [agency's] action." Dep't of Commerce v. New York, 139 S. Ct. 2251, 2568 (2019); see also Citizens to Preserve Overton Park, Inc. v. Volpe, 401 U.S. 402, 410 (1971) (holding a decision is committed to agency discretion when there is "no law to apply" (quotation omitted)). The Government argues that § 1225 provides no standard by which to evaluate DHS's action in this case. Stay Mot. at 8–9.

Once again, Supreme Court precedent undercuts the Government's argument. Even a statute that "leave[s] much to [an agency's] discretion" does not necessarily "leave [that] discretion unbounded." Dep't of Commerce, 139 S. Ct. at 2567–68 (holding a statute granting the Secretary of Commerce broad discretion to take the census "in such form and content as he may determine" did not commit the decision to reinstate a citizenship question to the Secretary's discretion (quotation omitted)). So too here. Section 1225(b)(2)(C) certainly confers discretion, but there is no reason to think that discretion is infinite—just as there is no reason to think the discretion extends beyond the bounds of individualized, case-by-case determinations to begin with. And like the statute in Department of Commerce, which included provisions that meaningfully restrained the Secretary of Commerce, see 139 S. Ct. at 2568–69, § 1225 includes provisions restraining the DHS in this case. See § 1225(b)(1)(B)(iii)(IV) (an alien subject to expedited removal, but without a credible fear of persecution, "shall be detained pending a final determination of credible fear of persecution"); § 1225(b)(1)(B)(ii) (an alien with a credible fear of persecution "shall be detained for further consideration of the application for asylum"); § 1225(b)(1)(B)(iii)(IV) ("Any alien subject to the procedures under this clause shall be detained pending a final determination of credible fear of persecution and, if found not to have such a fear, until removed."); § 1225(b)(2)(C) (Attorney General "may return" an alien not subject to expedited removal as an alternative to detention). We conclude that this is not a "case in which there is no law to apply." Dep't of Commerce, 139 S. Ct. at 2569 (quotation omitted).

c.

The Government's final justiciability argument is that the MPP-termination decision is nothing more than a non-enforcement decision, unreviewable under Heckler v. Chaney, 470 U.S. 821 (1985). This argument fails for two reasons. The first is that the termination of MPP is more than a non-enforcement policy, just like the DACA program at issue in Regents and the DAPA program at issue in Texas. As the district court explained, the termination of MPP will necessarily lead to the release and parole of aliens into the United States. And that will "create affirmative benefits for aliens such as work authorization." D. Ct. Op. at 31; see also Texas, 809 F.3d at 167 ("Likewise, to be reviewable agency action, DAPA need not directly confer public benefits—removing a categorical bar on receipt of those benefits and thereby making a class of persons newly eligible for them 'provides a focus for judicial review.'" (quoting Chaney, 470 U.S. at 832)).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Second and independently, the termination of MPP was simply not a non-enforcement decision. MPP was a government program—replete with rules procedures and dedicated infrastructure. It is precisely because MPP was a government program—and much more than a non-enforcement decision—that the Government now claims that it will be difficult to resume it. See infra Part III. And the Government cites nothing to suggest that the elimination of a such a program can be dismissed as mere "non-enforcement." The Government therefore has failed to make a strong showing that the States' claims are non-justiciable.

B.

The Government next argues that it is likely to succeed on appeal because the June 1 Memorandum accords with federal law. The district court held otherwise on two independent grounds. First, the district court determined that the termination of MPP violated the APA because the June 1 Memorandum was arbitrary and capricious. D. Ct. Op. at 34–42. Second, the district court concluded that in "these particular circumstances," the termination violated 8 U.S.C. § 1225. Id. at 42–44 (emphasis removed). We hold the Government has not come close to showing that it is likely to succeed in challenging either conclusion, let alone both.

1.

First, the APA. The APA directs courts to "hold unlawful and set aside agency action[s]" that are "arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law." 5 U.S.C. § 706(2). "The APA's arbitrary-and-capricious standard requires that agency action be reasonable and reasonably explained." FCC v. Prometheus Radio Project, 141 S. Ct. 1150, 1158 (2021). While applying this "deferential" standard, we must not

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

"substitute" our "own policy judgment for that of the agency." Id. But we must ensure that "the agency has acted within a zone of reasonableness and, in particular, has reasonably considered the relevant issues and reasonably explained the decision." Id.; see also Motor Vehicle Mfrs. Ass'n of U.S., Inc. v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 463 U.S. 29, 43 (1983) ("[T]he agency must examine the relevant data and articulate a satisfactory explanation for its action including a 'rational connection between the facts found and the choice made'" (quoting Burlington Truck Lines v. United States, 371 U.S. 156, 168 (1962))). "Put simply, we must set aside any action premised on reasoning that fails to account for 'relevant factors' or evinces 'a clear error of judgment.'" Univ. of Tex. M.D. Anderson Cancer Ctr. v. HHS, 985 F.3d 472, 475 (5th Cir. 2021) (quoting Marsh v. Or. Nat. Res. Council, 490 U.S. 360, 378 (1989)). This review "is not toothless." Sw. Elec. Power Co. v. United States Env't Prot. Agency, 920 F.3d 999, 1013 (5th Cir. 2019). And in all events, we can consider only the reasoning "articulated by the agency itself"; we cannot consider post hoc rationalizations. State Farm, 463 U.S. at 50; see also Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1909 ("An agency must defend its actions based on the reasons it gave when it acted.").

The Government has not shown a strong chance of success on appeal. That is because when terminating MPP in the June 1 Memorandum, the Secretary failed to consider several "relevant factors" and "'important aspect[s] of the problem.'" Michigan v. E.P.A., 576 U.S. 743, 750, 752 (2015) (quotations omitted); see also Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1910. These include (a) the States' legitimate reliance interests, (b) MPP's benefits, (c) potential alternatives to MPP, and (d) § 1225's implications. These four omissions likely doom the Government's appeal. The Governments counterarguments (e) are unpersuasive.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

DHS "failed to address whether there was 'legitimate reliance' on" MPP. Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1913 (quoting Smiley v. Citibank (S.D.), N.A., 517 U.S. 735, 742 (1996)). In its seven-page June 1 Memorandum, DHS does not directly mention any reliance interests, especially those of the States. The closest the June 1 Memorandum gets is a reference to "the impact [terminating MPP] could have on border management and border communities." AR5. But the Memorandum makes clear that "border communities" do not include border states. See id. ("referring only to "nongovernmental organizations and local officials"). And the vague reference to "border management" is insufficient to show specific, meaningful consideration of the States' reliance interests.

In response, the Government concedes that it failed to consider the States' reliance interests. But it argues that is irrelevant because "the States have no cognizable reliance interest in a discretionary program." Stay Mot. at 18. We reject that argument for several reasons.

Most importantly, the Government's contention is squarely foreclosed by Regents. There, the Supreme Court acknowledged that the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals ("DACA") program was a discretionary program. 140 S. Ct. at 1910. Still, the Court faulted DHS for not considering reliance interests, including in particular those of the states. As the Supreme Court explained, "[w]hen an agency changes course, . . . it must be cognizant that longstanding policies may have engendered serious reliance interests that must be taken into account." Id. at 1913 (quotation omitted). Those reliance interests included states' interests. See id. at 1914 (highlighting assertions that "[s]tates and local governments could lose $1.25 billion in tax revenue each year"). So if the termination of DACA—a discretionary, immigration program—must consider states' "potential reliance interests," then so does termination of MPP. Id. at 1913. That is particularly true here because the district court found as a matter of fact—and the Government does not contest—that states like Texas face fiscal harm from the termination of MPP. See D. Ct. Op. at 18–20.

The district court also found that the "termination of MPP has and will continue to increase the number of aliens being released into the United States." Id. at 17. The Supreme Court has recognized that border states "bear[] many of the consequences of unlawful immigration." Arizona v. United States, 567 U.S. 387, 397 (2012). It therefore follows that a "potential reliance interest" that DHS must consider includes Texas.

The DHS-Texas Agreement reinforces the Government's awareness of the State's reliance interests. In that Agreement, DHS stipulated:

- "Texas, like other States, is directly and concretely affected by changes to DHS rules and policies that have the effect of easing, relaxing, or limiting immigration enforcement." Compl., Ex. B at 1.
- "The harm to Texas is particularly acute where its budget has been set months or years in advance and it has no time to adjust its budget to respond to DHS policy changes." Id.
- "[A]n aggrieved party will be irreparably damaged." Id. at 5.

The Agreement further states that it "establishes a binding and enforceable commitment between DHS and Texas." Id. at 2. Texas therefore could reasonably rely on the Agreement. And Texas did in fact rely on the Agreement by including DHS's breach as a cause of action in its complaint—filed months before the June 1 Memorandum. And then—despite these reliance interests and despite being on notice of the Agreement from the States' complaint—the June 1 Memorandum said not one word about the Agreement. A "reasonable and reasonably explained" decision would have said something. Prometheus, 141 S. Ct. at 1158. That is why this "omission alone [likely] renders [the Secretary's] decision arbitrary and capricious." Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1913.[4]

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

b.

The June 1 Memorandum also failed to consider DHS's prior factual findings on MPP's benefits. In its October 2019 Assessment of MPP, DHS found that "aliens without meritorious claims—which no longer constitute[d] a free ticket into the United States—[were] beginning to voluntarily return home." D. Ct. Op. at 10. DHS also found that MPP addressed the "perverse incentives" created by allowing "those with non-meritorious claims . . . [to] remain in the country for lengthy periods of time." Id. These benefits, DHS emphasized, were a "core component" or "cornerstone" of the agency's prior immigration policy. Id. at 12.

Nonetheless, the June 1 Memorandum did not expressly mention, let alone meaningfully discuss, DHS's prior factual findings. Instead, the Secretary changed policies based on his own findings that contradict DHS's October 2019 findings. But an agency must provide "a more detailed justification" when a "new policy rests upon factual findings that contradict those which underlay its prior policy." FCC v. Fox Television Stations, Inc.,

[4] As the D.C. Circuit has emphasized in a different APA context, "the opportunity to comment is meaningless unless the agency responds to significant points raised by the public." Sherley v. Sebelius, 689 F.3d 776, 784 (D.C. Cir. 2012) (Sentelle, C.J.) (quotation omitted). We do not suggest that DHS needed notice-and-comment rulemaking to rescind MPP. But it did need to consider "relevant factors" to that rescission decision. Id. And you might reasonably think that one "relevant factor[]" to that decision was DHS's pledge "to consult Texas and consider its views before taking any action, adopting or modify[ing] a policy or procedure, or making any decision that" affects MPP. Compl., Ex. B at 2. Perhaps DHS has a good reason for its action. But it is likely arbitrary and capricious for DHS not even to acknowledge its agreement—let alone do anything to consult Texas or consider its views.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

556 U.S. 502, 515 (2009). The Secretary did not provide the required "more detailed justification." Id. This further indicates that the termination of MPP was arbitrary and capricious.

c.

The June 1 Memorandum also insufficiently addressed alternatives to terminating MPP. "[W]hen an agency rescinds a prior policy[,] its reasoned analysis must consider the alternatives that are within the ambit of the existing policy." Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1913 (quotation omitted). While considering alternatives, DHS "was required to assess whether there were reliance interests, determine whether they were significant, and weigh any such interests against competing policy concerns." Id. at 1915. As explained above, DHS did not adequately assess reliance interests. So it would be impossible for the June 1 Memorandum to properly weigh the relevant interests against competing policy concerns while considering alternatives.

The June 1 Memorandum offers a single conclusory sentence addressing potential modifications to MPP: "I also considered whether the program could be modified in some fashion, but I believe that addressing the deficiencies identified in my review would require a total redesign that would involve significant additional investments in personnel and resources." AR.5. But "belief" that a "total redesign" was required, id., is no substitute for a "reasonable and reasonably explained" decision. Prometheus, 141 S. Ct. at 1158.

Of course, "DHS was not required . . . to consider all policy alternatives in reaching [its] decision," and the agency has "considerable flexibility" to "wind-down" a program. Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1914 (emphasis added) (quotation omitted). But the problem is that the Secretary failed to mention any modification to MPP as a possible alternative, even though "the alternatives . . . are within the ambit of the existing policy." Id. at 1913

(quotations omitted). And merely stating that an alternative was considered is not enough to show reasoned analysis. Cf. United Techs. Corp. v. U.S. Dep't of Def., 601 F.3d 557, 562 (D.C. Cir. 2010) ("We do not defer to the agency's conclusory or unsupported suppositions." (quotation omitted)).

The Government's principal counterargument is that DHS considered an alternative outside "the ambit of the existing policy." Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1913. Specifically, the June 1 Memorandum pointed to a "Dedicated Docket" program designed to provide counsel to aliens in removal proceedings. AR.4–5 & n.6; see Stay Mot. at 16; Reply at 7. This argument is unpersuasive for at least two reasons. First, by the Government's own admission, the "Dedicated Docket" is outside the ambit of MPP—and hence it does not count as a reasoned consideration of alternatives "within the ambit of the existing policy." Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1913 (emphasis added). And second, neither the June 1 Memorandum nor the Government in its stay motion explains why MPP and the "Dedicated Docket" are mutually exclusive.

The June 1 Memorandum also failed to consider the legal implications of terminating the policy. After the Government suspended MPP—but before it rescinded the program—Texas filed this lawsuit. In its original complaint, and in its initial motion for preliminary injunction, Texas argued that the suspension of MPP violated § 1225. See Compl. at 36–38; Prelim. Inj. Mot., ECF No. 30. About a month and a half later, the Secretary issued the memorandum terminating MPP. So the government was on notice of the legal implications. Yet in the memorandum, the Secretary does not mention the lawfulness concerns involving § 1225—even though, the "natural response" to this "newly identified problem" would be to consider the problem. Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1916. This further indicates that "the process by which" the Secretary reached that result was neither "logical" nor "rational." Michigan, 576 U.S. at 750.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

e.

The Government offers a hodgepodge of counterarguments to justify the June 1 Memorandum's omissions. None is persuasive.

The Government repeatedly argues that DHS's statement that it considered this or that factor is enough to avoid any arbitrary-and-capricious problems. See Stay Mot. at 16. The law says otherwise. "Stating that a factor was considered . . . is not a substitute for considering it." Getty v. Fed. Sav. & Loan Ins. Corp., 805 F.2d 1050, 1055 (D.C. Cir. 1986); see also Corrosion Proof Fittings v. E.P.A., 947 F.2d 1201, 1226 (5th Cir. 1991) ("The EPA's failure to consider the regulatory alternatives, however, cannot be substantiated by conclusory statements . . . ."); United Techs., 601 F.3d at 562 ("We do not defer to the agency's conclusory or unsupported suppositions." (quotation omitted)); cf. Gerber v. Norton, 294 F.3d 173, 185 (D.C. Cir. 2002) ("And stating that a factor was considered—or found—is not a substitute for considering or finding it." (quotation omitted)); Gresham v. Azar, 950 F.3d 93, 103 (D.C. Cir. 2020) ("Nodding to concerns raised by commenters only to dismiss them in a conclusory manner is not a hallmark of reasoned decisionmaking."). This well-established principle makes sense. After all:

> [A]n agency's "experience and expertise" presumably enable the agency to provide the required explanation, but they do not substitute for the explanation, any more than an expert witness's credentials substitute for the substantive requirements applicable to the expert's testimony under Fed. R. Evid. 702. The requirement of explanation presumes the expertise and experience of the agency and still demands an adequate explanation in the particular matter.

CS Wind Viet. Co. v. United States, 832 F.3d 1367, 1377 (Fed. Cir. 2016) (citations omitted).

The Government also points to the June 1 Memorandum's observations on MPP's shortcomings. See Stay Mot. at 16–17. Even if creditable, these observations cannot justify the other omissions discussed above. But in any event, many of those observations are neither "logical" nor "rational." Michigan, 576 U.S. at 750. Take DHS's termination justification based on in absentia removal orders. DHS observed that "the high percentage of cases completed through the entry of in absentia removal orders (approximately 44 percent, based on DHS data) raises questions for me about the design and operation of the program." AR.4 (emphasis added). The district court found that "[t]he federal government's data shows similarly high rates of in absentia removals prior to implementation of MPP." D. Ct. Op. at 40. The Government has not said one word to suggest the district court's factual finding was clearly erroneous.[5] We therefore cannot conclude that the Secretary "examine[d] the relevant data and articulate[d] a satisfactory explanation" with "a rational connection between the facts found and the choice" to terminate MPP. State Farm, 463 U.S. at 43 (quotation omitted). And even on the Government's own terms—considering only half the statistics and ignoring the district court's factual finding—the June 1 Memorandum only said that in absentia statistics "raise[d] questions for [DHS] about the design and operation of the program." AR.4. But the process required by the APA requires agencies to seek answers and reasonably explain the outcome of that effort, including its conclusions.

[5] In its reply brief, the Government argues that it need not have commissioned an "in-depth empirical analysis" of the in absentia statistics before rescinding MPP. Reply at 9. Of course that is true. But it is equally true that the Government cannot cherry-pick only the statistics it likes in the administrative record. Nor can the Government fail to address statistics that already exist in that record. See Encino Motorcars, LLC v. Navarro, 136 S. Ct. 2117, 2126 (2016) (holding "an unexplained inconsistency in agency policy is a reason for holding an interpretation to be an arbitrary and capricious change from agency practice" (quotation omitted)).

The June 1 Memorandum places much weight on COVID-19. According to the Memorandum, the pandemic "compounded" "challenges faced by MPP" when "immigration courts designated to hear MPP cases were closed for public health reasons between March 2020 and April 2021." AR.4. But DHS issued its memorandum terminating MPP at least one month after courts reopened. As the district court explained: "Past problems with past closures are irrelevant to the decision to prospectively terminate MPP in June 2021. This is especially true when the Secretary admits DHS had maintained the facilities during the pandemic." D. Ct. Op. at 41. The Government challenges this conclusion on the ground that "infrastructure used for MPP remains shuttered." Stay Mot. at 19 n.4. But the Government provides no indication that the facilities are not maintained or are shuttered because of the pandemic—as opposed to the choice the Government itself made when it suspended MPP in January 2021.

In addition to the APA, the district court also relied on 8 U.S.C. § 1225. The Government claims that the district court determined that "the Secretary is required to return any noncitizen he fails to detain" and that the district court's "core legal analysis" is that DHS has "a binary choice between detention or return to Mexico for noncitizens arriving from Mexico." Stay Mot. at 11–13. In essence, the Government characterizes the district court's decision and injunction as removing the Government's ability to use its discretion under 8 U.S.C. §§ 1182(d)(5)(A) and 1226. But as we explain in Part III, infra, the Government has mischaracterized the district court's order. This matters because all of the Government's § 1225 arguments hinge on an incorrect premise.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Therefore, we cannot conclude that the Government is likely to succeed on either its APA arguments or its § 1225 arguments—let alone that the Government is likely to succeed on both. The Government therefore has not come close to a "strong showing" that it is likely to succeed on the merits. Nken, 556 U.S. at 426.

III.

The Government also has not shown that it will be irreparably injured absent a stay pending appeal. The Government's arguments are largely built on two strawmen. We consider and reject those before turning to the Government's other arguments.

First, the Government complains that it will be irreparably harmed absent a stay because DHS is incapable of reinstating MPP "in a matter of days." Stay Mot. at 21; see also Decl. of David Shahoulian ¶ 16 (Aug. 16, 2021) (arguing DHS cannot immediately "reestablish the entire infrastructure upon which [MPP] was built"). This is a strawman. The district court did not order the Government to restore MPP's infrastructure overnight. It ordered that, once the injunction takes effect on August 21, DHS must "enforce and implement MPP in good faith." D. Ct. Op. at 52. DHS does not argue that good faith is an unreasonably high standard to meet.

Second, the Government asserts it will be irreparably injured because the injunction obligates DHS to detain "every single person described in 8 U.S.C. § 1225," which DHS cannot do because it lacks "sufficient detention capacity." Decl. of David Shahoulian ¶ 5 (Aug. 16, 2021). This is a second strawman. The injunction does not require the Government to detain every alien subject to § 1225. Nor does it order the Government to "build or obtain" additional detention facilities. Stay Mot. at 21. Instead, it requires the Government to "enforce and implement MPP in good faith . . . until such a time as the federal government has sufficient detention capacity to detain all aliens subject to mandatory detention." D. Ct. Op. at 52 (second emphasis added).

And far from ordering the Government to detain "every single person described in 8 U.S.C. § 1225," Decl. of David Shahoulian ¶ 5 (Aug. 16, 2021), the district court specifically acknowledged that the Government has other options. Under § 1225(b)(2)(A), which provides the statutory authority for MPP, an alien arriving on land from a contiguous foreign territory can be returned to that territory. See D. Ct. Op. at 43 & n.11 (noting this discretion). Under 8 U.S.C. § 1182(d)(5)(A), DHS can parole an alien into the United States "on a case-by-case basis for urgent humanitarian reasons or significant public benefit." (Emphasis added); see D. Ct. Op. at 43 & n.11 (noting this discretion). Under 8 U.S.C. § 1226, DHS can release on "bond" or "conditional parole" an alien arrested on a warrant and detained "pending a decision on whether the alien is to be removed." See also Stay Mot. at 12; D. Ct. Op. at 51 (noting this discretion). Last but not least, of course, the Government can choose to detain an alien in accordance with § 1225. See D. Ct. Op. at 43 (noting this discretion).

What the Government cannot do, the district court held, is simply release every alien described in § 1225 en masse into the United States. The Government has not pointed to a single word anywhere in the INA that suggests it can do that. And the Government cannot claim an irreparable injury from being enjoined against an action that it has no statutory authorization to take.

Third and finally, we turn to the Government's non-strawmen arguments for its irreparable injuries. Most of these are self-inflicted and therefore do not count. See 11A CHARLES ALAN WRIGHT, ET AL.,

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

MO-AG-22-0644-A-003444

FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 2948.1 (2021) ("[A] party may not satisfy the irreparable harm requirement if the harm complained of is self-inflicted"). For example, the Government notes that "DHS has been in the process of unwinding MPP and its infrastructure for months," such that restarting the program now would be difficult. Stay Mot. at 21. But as the district court noted, "Texas filed suit challenging the suspension of enrollments in MPP . . . nearly two months before DHS purported to terminate the program entirely in the June 1 Memorandum." D. Ct. Op. at 47. Therefore, DHS could have avoided this problem by waiting to unwind MPP until this litigation was resolved. The self-inflicted nature of the government's asserted harm "'severely undermines' its claim for equitable relief." Al Otro Lado v. Wolf, 952 F.3d 999, 1008 (9th Cir. 2020) (quoting Hirschfeld v. Bd. of Elections in City of N.Y., 984 F.2d 35, 39 (2d Cir. 1993)); accord Second City Music, Inc. v. City of Chicago, 333 F.3d 846, 850 (7th Cir. 2003) ("[S]elf-inflicted wounds are not irreparable injury."); Caplan v. Fellheimer Eichen Braverman & Kaskey, 68 F.3d 828, 839 (3d Cir. 1995) ("If the harm complained of is self-inflicted, it does not qualify as irreparable.").

Before the district court, the Government also suggested that it began unwinding MPP four or more months before the June 1 Memorandum. See D. Ct. Op. at 48. That understandably would make it harder for DHS to restart MPP on Saturday. But it also makes DHS's legal position dramatically weaker. It is a fundamental precept of administrative law that an administrative agency cannot make its decision first and explain it later. See, e.g., Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1908–10. Insofar as DHS concedes that its June 1 Memorandum is a post hoc rationalization for a decision that it made many months earlier, it has conceded that the June 1 Memorandum is arbitrary, capricious, and not a good faith explanation for its decision. Such inequitable conduct is "sufficient to deny" DHS's request for an equitable stay pending appeal. See In re GGW Brands, LLC, No. 2:13-bk-15130, 2013 WL 6906375, at *26–*27 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. Nov. 15, 2013).

The Government also asserts that reinstating MPP will cause harm because "DHS cannot restart MPP without significant cooperation with Mexico," and the injunction implicates "delicate and ongoing discussions with Mexico." Stay Mot. at 21. There are at least four problems with that. First, as the district court noted, DHS created MPP unilaterally and without any previous agreement with Mexico. See D. Ct. Op. at 49 & n.15. DHS does not explain why it cannot likewise restart MPP unilaterally. Second, the Government does not point to any evidence that Mexico has withdrawn its support for MPP. See AR.152–53 (Mexico's December 20, 2018 statement of support). Third, the Government "'could have avoided' any disruptions by simply informing Mexico that termination of MPP would be subject to judicial review." D. Ct. Op. at 47 (quoting Texas, 809 F.3d at 187). Insofar as the Government failed to do that, again, its injury is self-inflicted. Fourth, even assuming Mexico's support is required, assuming Mexico has withdrawn its support, and assuming Mexico will not support a new MPP, the injunction still does not irreparably harm the Government. The injunction only requires good faith on the part of the United States—if the Government's good-faith efforts to implement MPP are thwarted by Mexico, it nonetheless will be in compliance with the district court's order, so long as it also adheres to the rest of the statutory requirements.

Finally, because the Government has requested a stay pending completion of appellate proceedings, the relevant question is whether the Government will be irreparably harmed during the pendency of the appeal. Even if the Government were correct that long-term compliance with the district court's injunction would cause irreparable harm, it presents no reason to think that it cannot comply with the district court's requirement of good faith while the appeal proceeds. Therefore, the Government has failed to demonstrate that it will be irreparably injured absent a stay pending appeal.

IV.

The final two Nken factors also do not warrant a stay. See Nken, 556 U.S. at 434.

The district court concluded that the States have suffered, and will continue to suffer, harms as a result of the termination of MPP. See D. Ct. Op. at 17 ("The termination of MPP has [increased] and will continue to increase the number of aliens being released into the United States and has [imposed] and will continue to impose harms on Plaintiff States Texas and Missouri."). We agree. See supra Part II.A.1 (standing). A stay "would enable" aliens released into the interior "to apply for driver's licenses and other benefits, and it would be difficult for the states to retract those benefits or recoup their costs even if they won on the merits." Texas, 787 F.3d at 768.

Likewise, the "public interest [is] in having governmental agencies abide by the federal laws that govern their existence and operations." Washington v. Reno, 35 F.3d 1093, 1102 (6th Cir. 1994). Here, the Government has failed to carry its burden to show that its conduct comports with federal law. And "[t]here is generally no public interest in the perpetuation of unlawful agency action." League of Women Voters of U.S. v. Newby, 838 F.3d 1, 12 (D.C. Cir. 2016).

The Government is also wrong to say that a stay would promote the public interest by preserving the separation of powers. All the district court's injunction requires of the Government is that it act in accordance with the INA. And in all events, "it is the resolution of the case on the merits, not whether the injunction is stayed pending appeal, that will affect" principles of "separation of powers and federalism." Texas, 787 F.3d at 768.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

MO-AG-22-0644-A-003447

The DHS-Texas Agreement also suggests the public interest counsels against issuing a stay. That Agreement expressly acknowledged that if DHS failed to comply with the Agreement's terms, Texas would "be irreparably damaged" and would "not have an adequate remedy at law." Compl., Ex. B at 4. The Agreement remained binding until August 1, 2021, and the parties agree DHS violated its terms. See D. Ct. Op. at 14 ("The parties agree DHS did not follow the[] procedures" required by the Agreement.). The district court concluded that the expiration of the Agreement mooted Texas's claim under it. See id. at 44. As noted in Part II above, however, the States' likelihood of success on the merits of their APA claims means that DHS will have to consider all relevant factors before attempting to rescind MPP—including its effects on the States. The public interest plainly lies in not allowing DHS to circumvent those federalism concerns.

V.

Finally, the Government argues a stay is warranted because the district court should have remanded without vacating the June 1 Memorandum or issuing an injunction. Stay Mot. at 22; see also Reply at 12. "Remand, not vacatur, is generally appropriate when there is at least a serious possibility that the agency will be able to substantiate its decision given an opportunity to do so." Texas Ass'n of Manufacturers v. United States Consumer Prod. Safety Comm'n, 989 F.3d 368, 389 (5th Cir. 2021). But it is unclear how DHS can substantiate its decision on remand. Neither in its opening stay motion nor in its reply does the Government suggest how it can. See generally Stay Mot. at 22–23; Reply at 12. And Supreme Court precedent suggests that any later memorandum on remand elaborating on the June 1 Memorandum would be irrelevant to an arbitrary-and-capricious analysis because it is a post hoc rationalization. See Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1907–09. So at this stage, without any argument whatsoever to the contrary, it appears that DHS would have to issue "a new rule implementing a new policy" that

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

"compl[ies] with the procedural requirements for new agency action." Id. at 1908 (emphases added).

Vacatur, by contrast, would not cause "disruptive consequences". See United Steel v. Mine Safety & Health Admin., 925 F.3d 1279, 1287 (D.C. Cir. 2019) (also considering "the disruptive consequences of vacatur" (internal quotation marks omitted)). The Government makes no argument materially different from its irreparable-injury argument. So we reject the Government's arguments here for the same reasons we rejected them in Part III, supra.

* * *

The Government has failed to make the requisite showing for all four Nken factors. The Government's motion for a stay pending appeal is therefore DENIED. The Government's appeal is hereby EXPEDITED for consideration before the next available oral argument panel.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Before ELROD, OLDHAM, and WILSON, Circuit Judges.

PER CURIAM:

This case concerns the Migrant Protection Protocols ("MPP") created by the Secretary of the Department of Homeland Security on December 20, 2018, and purportedly rescinded by DHS in a memorandum on June 1, 2021 ("June 1 Memorandum").[1] After a full bench trial and 53 pages of findings of fact and conclusions of law, the district court concluded that DHS's purported rescission of MPP violated, inter alia, the Administrative Procedure Act ("APA"). DHS seeks a stay pending appeal. After carefully considering full briefing from the parties, we hold DHS failed to satisfy the four stay factors. See Nken v. Holder, 556 U.S. 418 (2009). The motion is denied.

I.

A.

On December 20, 2018, the Trump Administration implemented MPP in response to an immigration surge at the southern border. D. Ct. Op. at 7. The statutory authority for MPP is found in 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C), which authorizes the Government to return certain third-country nationals arriving in the United States to Mexico or Canada for the duration of their removal proceedings under 8 U.S.C. § 1229a. Id. at 8. Also on December 20, 2018, the United States obtained Mexico's agreement to permit entry of MPP enrollees. Id. The goal of MPP was to ensure that "[c]ertain aliens attempting to enter the U.S. illegally or without documentation . . . will no longer be released into the country, where they often fail to file an asylum

[1] We refer to the Secretary's actions as those of "DHS" unless otherwise stated.

application and/or disappear before an immigration judge can determine the merits of any claim." Id. (quotation omitted).

In January 2019, "DHS began implementing MPP, initially in San Diego, California, then El Paso, Texas, and Calexico, California, and then nationwide." Id. (citing AR.155–56, AR.684). In February 2019, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement issued guidance on MPP to its field offices, anticipating the expansion of MPP across the border. Id. at 9 (citing AR.165–70). By December 31, 2020, DHS had enrolled 68,039 aliens in MPP. Id. at 12 (citing AR.555).

DHS and Texas entered into a Memorandum of Understanding (the "Agreement"), which the parties finalized on January 8, 2021. Id. at 13 (citing Compl., Ex. B at 8). The Agreement required Texas to provide information and assist DHS to "perform its border security, legal immigration, immigration enforcement, and national security missions." Id. (quoting Compl., Ex. B at 2). In return, DHS agreed to consult Texas and consider its views before taking actions that could modify immigration enforcement. See id. at 13–14 (citing Compl., Ex. B at 2). DHS also agreed to "'[p]rovide Texas with 180 days' written notice . . . of any proposed action' subject to the consultation requirement," id. at 14 (quoting Compl., Ex. B at 3), so that Texas would have an opportunity to comment on the proposal. The Agreement further required DHS to consider Texas's input "in good faith" and, if it decided to reject Texas's input, "provide a detailed written explanation" of its reasons for doing so. Id. (emphasis omitted) (quoting Compl., Ex. B at 3).

On Inauguration Day, the Biden Administration announced that it would suspend further enrollments in MPP. The Acting Secretary of DHS wrote that "[e]ffective January 21, 2021, the Department will suspend new enrollments in the Migrant Protection Protocols (MPP), pending further review of the program. Aliens who are not already enrolled in MPP should be processed under other existing legal authorities." Id. at 15 (quoting AR.581).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

On February 2, 2021, DHS sent a letter to Texas purporting to terminate the Agreement "effective immediately." Id. at 14. Because it believed that the letter did not comply with the Agreement's required procedures, Texas interpreted the letter "as a notice of intent to terminate" the Agreement. Id. (citing ECF No. 53 at 21).

On April 13, 2021, Texas and Missouri (the "States") sued, challenging the temporary suspension of MPP. Id. at 1 (citing ECF No. 1). The States alleged that DHS's January 20 Memorandum violated the APA, the Immigration and Nationality Act ("INA"), the Constitution, and the Agreement. See id. at 2 (citing ECF No. 1 at 4; ECF No. 45). On May 14, the States moved for a preliminary injunction that would enjoin the Government from enforcing and implementing the January 20 Memorandum. Prelim. Inj. Mot., ECF No. 30.

On June 1, before briefing on the preliminary injunction had concluded, DHS issued a new memorandum permanently terminating MPP. D. Ct. Op. at 2. The district court concluded that the June 1 Memorandum mooted the States' complaint, and the court allowed the States to amend their complaint and file a new preliminary injunction motion. Id. The parties agreed to consolidate the preliminary injunction hearing with the trial on the merits pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 65(a)(2). Id. at 3.

B.

Following the bench trial, the district court issued a 53-page memorandum opinion and order, concluding that the States were entitled to relief on their APA and statutory claims. See D. Ct. Op. at 1. The district court made many findings of fact that are relevant here. Among other things,

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

the district court found that MPP had significant benefits before DHS purported to rescind it. For example, DHS's October 2019 Assessment of MPP concluded that "aliens without meritorious claims—which no longer constitute[d] a free ticket into the United States—[were] beginning to voluntarily return home." D. Ct. Op. at 10. And the court noted that DHS also found MPP effective in addressing the prior "perverse incentives" created by allowing "those with non-meritorious claims . . . [to] remain in the country for lengthy periods of time." Id. The court found that this caused a significant decrease in immigration-enforcement encounters along the southern border. Id. And more directly, the court found that caused a decrease in "the number of aliens released into the interior of the United States for the duration of their U.S. removal proceedings." Id. at 11 (citing AR.554). These benefits, DHS emphasized, were a "cornerstone" of the agency's prior immigration policy. D. Ct. Op. at 12.

The court made specific (and largely uncontested) factual findings that "[t]he termination of MPP has [increased] and will continue to increase the number of aliens being released into the United States," and that this increase "has [imposed] and will continue to impose harms on Plaintiff States Texas and Missouri." Id. at 17. On the basis of its factual findings, the district court determined that the States had Article III standing, that the court had jurisdiction to review the agency action, and that the States were within the zone of interests of the INA. Id. at 21–34. The court then concluded that DHS's termination of MPP was unlawful under the APA because the action was arbitrary and capricious and contrary to the INA. Id. at 34–44. Based on those conclusions, the district court "permanently enjoined and restrained [DHS] from implementing or enforcing the June 1 Memorandum" and ordered DHS "to enforce and implement MPP in good faith until such a time as it has been lawfully rescinded in compliance with the APA and until such a time as the federal government has sufficient detention capacity to detain all aliens subject to mandatory detention under Section 1255 without releasing any aliens because of a lack of detention resources." Id. at 52–53 (emphases omitted).

DHS noticed an appeal. On August 17, 2021, the Government requested an emergency stay under Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 8. The States opposed that request on August 18. On August 19, the Government filed a reply. The Government requested that we rule the same day, August 19. In considering the Government's request, we must consider four factors: (1) whether the Government makes a strong showing that it is likely to succeed on the merits; (2) whether the Government will be irreparably injured in the absence of a stay; (3) whether other interested parties will be irreparably injured by a stay; and (4) where the public interest lies. See Nken, 556 U.S. at 426.

II.

We begin with whether the Government has made a strong showing that it is likely to succeed on the merits. The Government makes two merits arguments: (A) the case is not justiciable, and (B) DHS's rescission of MPP did not violate federal law. The Government is likely wrong on both.

A.

The Government first argues that it is likely to succeed on the merits because two justiciability doctrines—standing and non-reviewability—operate as insuperable obstacles to the States' suit. We consider and reject each argument in turn.

1.

First, the States' standing. To establish standing, the States "must show an injury that is 'concrete, particularized, and actual or imminent; fairly traceable to the challenged action; and redressable by a favorable ruling.'"

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Texas v. United States, 809 F.3d 134, 150 (5th Cir. 2015) (quoting Clapper v. Amnesty Int'l USA, 568 U.S. 398, 409 (2013)). "Only one of the [appellants] needs to have standing to permit us to consider the [complaint]."[2] Massachusetts v. EPA, 549 U.S. 497, 518 (2007); accord Nat'l Rife Ass'n Am., Inc. v. McCraw, 719 F.3d 338, 344 n.3 (5th Cir. 2013). Because the Government is seeking a stay, we must ask whether it has made a strong showing that the States lack standing. See Valentine v. Collier, 956 F.3d 797, 801 (5th Cir. 2020).

After a bench trial, we review the district court's factual determinations for clear error. See, e.g., Texas, 809 F.3d at 171–72 (reviewing a factual finding for clear error); Env't Tex. Citizen Lobby, Inc. v. ExxonMobil Corp., 968 F.3d 357, 367 (5th Cir. 2020) ("Because this case was tried, Plaintiffs needed to prove standing by a preponderance of the evidence. A factual finding that a plaintiff met that burden is reviewed for clear error." (citation omitted)). And any argument not raised on appeal (including a challenge to a district court's factual finding) is forfeited. See, e.g., United States v. Edwards, 303 F.3d 606, 647 (5th Cir. 2002) ("Many of the 'errors' cited by the defendants are unbriefed. These issues have been [forfeited]."); cf. Fed. R. App. P. 28(a)(9)(A) ("The appellant's brief must contain . . . appellant's contentions and the reasons for them, with citations to the authorities and parts of the record on which the appellant relies.").

We begin with (a) the district court's uncontested factual findings. Then we hold that the Government fails to make a strong showing that it is likely to succeed on appeal because it has not shown that the States lack (b) an injury-in-fact that is (c) traceable and (d) redressable. Finally, any doubt about the States' standing is resolved by (e) the special solicitude guaranteed to sovereign States in our federal system.

a.

The district court found eight facts central to the standing issue. These include:

1. The court found that because of MPP's termination, the Government has been "forced to release and parole aliens into the United States because [the Government] simply [does] not have the resources to detain aliens as mandated by statute." D. Ct. Op. at 17; see also id. at 18 (finding that Texas's "border state" status means some of those aliens have ended up in Texas).
2. The court found that DHS previously acknowledged that "MPP implementation contributed to decreasing the volume of inadmissible aliens arriving in the United States on land from Mexico." Id. at 17 (quotation and alteration omitted).
3. The court found that "the termination of MPP has contributed to the current border surge." Id.
4. The court found that "[s]ince MPP's termination, the number of enforcement encounters on the southwest border has skyrocketed." Id.; see also id. at 18 n.7 (noting "the sworn statement of David Shahoulian, Assistant Secretary for Border and Immigration Policy at DHS," including Shahoulian's statement that "[b]ased on current trends, the Department expects that total encounters this fiscal year are likely to be the highest ever recorded" (emphasis omitted)).
5. The court found that many "aliens present in Texas because of MPP's termination would apply for driver's licenses," the granting of which would impose a cost on Texas. Id. at 19.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

6. The court found that "[s]ome school-age child aliens who would have otherwise been enrolled in MPP are being released or paroled into the United States," and that (according to state estimates) Texas will expend an average of $9,216 per additional student in the 2021 school year. Id. at 19.
7. The court found that "[s]ome aliens who would have otherwise been enrolled in MPP are being released or paroled into the United States and will use state-funded healthcare services or benefits in Texas," imposing a cost on the state. D. Ct. Op. at 19–20 (citing AR.555, AR.587–88).
8. Finally, the court found that "[s]ome aliens who would have otherwise been enrolled in MPP are being released or paroled into the United States and [some] will commit crimes in Texas," imposing costs on the state's correctional apparatus. Id. at 20.

The Government does not challenge any of these findings.[3] But even if it did, we would not find any of them clearly erroneous in the light of the record as a whole. See, e.g., United States v. Ismoila, 100 F.3d 380, 396 (5th Cir. 1996) ("[A]s long as the determination is plausible in light of the record as a whole, clear error does not exist.").

Texas's injuries are actual and imminent. As just described, MPP's termination has caused an increase in immigration into Texas. And as

[3] On one reading of the Government's brief, it does contest the fifth finding. See Stay Mot. at 7 (discussing "speculation about an increase in the number of aliens released and paroled who will seek driver's licenses" (quotation omitted)). But in any case, neither our precedent nor the district court's record allows us to conclude the Government is likely to show the finding is clearly erroneous. See Texas, 809 F.3d at 156 (making a similar inference about driver's license applications).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

discussed at length in Texas v. United States, Texas law requires the issuance of a license to any qualified person—including noncitizens who "present . . . documentation issued by the appropriate United States agency that authorizes the applicant to be in the United States." 809 F.3d at 155–56 (alteration in original) (quoting TEX. TRANSP. CODE § 521.142(a)); see also id. (discussing other Texas requirements for a driver's license). Of course, unlike in the Deferred Action for Parents of Americans and Lawful Permanent Residents ("DAPA") program, the challenged action here does not ipso facto guarantee that a given alien will satisfy that requirement. Yet the district court's uncontested findings of fact likely compel the conclusion that MPP's termination has led to an increase in the number of aliens in Texas, many of whom will apply for driver's licenses. And the district court found that Texas incurs a cost every time it inquires into whether an alien satisfies the requirements for a license—even if the person does not in fact qualify for a license. D. Ct. Op. at 19 ("Each additional customer seeking a Texas driver's license imposes a cost on Texas."); see also Decl. of Sheri Gipson, Chief of the Texas Department of Public Safety Driver License Division, ¶ 8 ("DPS estimates that for an additional 10,000 driver['s] license customers seeking a limited term license, DPS would incur a biennial cost of approximately $2,014,870.80." (emphasis added)). So Texas has shown imminent injury in this case. See Texas, 809 F.3d at 156 (reaching the same conclusion on similar facts). Driver's licenses aside, the district court's unchallenged factual findings regarding educational, healthcare, and correctional costs provide equally strong bases for finding cognizable, imminent injury.

The Government's counterargument (limited to the driver's-license theory) is that the district court's analysis was "primarily based on speculation about an increase in the number of aliens released and paroled who will seek driver's licenses." Stay Mot. at 7 (quotation omitted). But the c.

MO-AG-22-0644-A-003459

Government has done nothing to show that district court's findings of fact about the increased number of aliens were clearly erroneous. And it is grounded in our precedent. Texas, 809 F.3d at 156 ("[T]here is little doubt that many [DAPA beneficiaries] would [apply for driver's licenses] because driving is a practical necessity in most of the state.").

Texas's injury is also traceable to the Government's termination of MPP. The district court's uncontested factual findings establish as much: MPP's termination has caused an increase in unlawful immigration into Texas. Many new immigrants are certain to apply for driver's licenses—and evaluating each application will impose costs on Texas. Cf. Texas, 809 F.3d at 160 (noting that new immigrants—in that case, DAPA recipients—"have strong incentives to obtain driver's licenses, and it is hardly speculative that many would do so if they became eligible."). Likewise, at least some MPP-caused immigrants will certainly seek educational and healthcare services from the state. And the States have incurred and will continue to incur costs associated with the border crisis, at least part of which the district court found is traceable to rescinding MPP. The causal chain is easy to see, and the Government does not meaningfully contest this point. See also Massachusetts v. EPA, 549 U.S. at 523 (finding traceability where the EPA's challenged action may have caused people to drive less fuel-efficient cars, which may in turn contribute to a prospective rise in sea levels, which may in turn cause the erosion of Massachusetts's shoreline).

d.

An injunction would remedy Texas's injury by requiring reinstatement of MPP. And with MPP back in place, immigration officers would once again have discretion to return (some) aliens to Mexico. The Government gives two arguments that it says undercut redressability. First,

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

the Government contends, an injunction would provide no redress because immigration officers under MPP would have discretion about whether to return any given immigrant to Mexico. Stay Mot. at 8. This argument ignores the fact that, during MPP's operative period, immigration agents did in fact order over 50,000 aliens back to Mexico from the Texas border. ECF 11 at 2. The Government offers no basis to conclude that a renewed MPP would have any different impact.

Second, the Government argues there is no redressability because aliens cannot be returned to Mexico without Mexico's consent. Stay Mot. at 8. This argument fails because for at least some aliens, MPP would permit DHS to simply refuse admission at ports of entry in the first place. See 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C) (allowing the Attorney General to "return [an] alien" "who is arriving on land (whether or not at a designated port of arrival) from a foreign territory contiguous to the United States . . . to that territory pending a" removal proceeding). Further, Mexico issued a statement in 2018 consenting to admit aliens excluded from the United States under MPP—and nothing in the record suggests Mexico has since retracted that consent. See AR.153 (Secretaría do Relaciones Exteriores, Position of Mexico on the Decision of the U.S. Government to Invoke Section 235(b)(2)(C) of its Immigration and Nationality Act (Dec. 20, 2018)).

To eliminate any doubt as to standing, we emphasize that the States are entitled to "special solicitude" in the standing analysis. Massachusetts v. EPA, 549 U.S. at 520; see also Texas, 809 F.3d at 151 (beginning with the special-solicitude question). Such special solicitude has two requirements: (1) the State must have a procedural right to challenge the action in question, and (2) the challenged action must affect one of the State's quasi-sovereign interests. Texas, 809 F.3d at 151–52 (citing Massachusetts, 549 U.S. at 516–

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

20). In both Massachusetts and Texas, the first prong was satisfied where a State challenged an agency action as invalid under a statute. 549 U.S. at 516–17 (Clean Air Act); 809 F.3d at 152–53 (APA). And in both cases, the second prong was satisfied where a State's challenge involved an agency's alleged failure to protect certain formerly "sovereign prerogatives [that] are now lodged in the Federal Government." Massachusetts, 549 U.S. at 520; see Texas, 809 F.3d at 152–54. Particularly relevant here is Texas, where this Court held that DAPA, by authorizing the presence of many previously unlawful aliens in the United States, affected "quasi-sovereign interests by imposing substantial pressure on them to change their laws, which provide for issuing driver's licenses to some aliens and subsidizing those licenses." 809 F.3d at 153 (quotation omitted).

Texas is indeed entitled to special solicitude. First, just as in the DAPA suit, Texas is asserting a procedural right under the APA to challenge an agency action. See id. at 152 ("In enacting the APA, Congress intended for those 'suffering legal wrong because of agency action' to have judicial recourse, and the states fall well within that definition." (quoting 5 U.S.C. § 702)). And second, Texas asserts precisely the same driver's-license-based injury here that it did there. See id. at 153–54 (explaining that DAPA, by greatly increasing the class of people to whom existing Texas law would entitle a subsidized driver's license, pressured Texas to change its own law—thus affecting a quasi-sovereign interest). Thus, Texas is entitled to special solicitude in the standing inquiry.

That solicitude means redressability is easier to establish for certain state litigants than for other litigants—and this should remove any lingering doubt as to that prong. See Massachusetts, 549 U.S. at 517–18 (holding a State "can assert [its] right[s] without meeting all the normal standards for redressability and immediacy" (quotations and citations omitted)). Texas would be able to establish redressability without this special solicitude—but it reinforces our conclusion that the States have standing and that the Government has failed to make a strong showing to the contrary.

2.

The Government next argues this suit is non-justiciable under the APA. The Government makes three arguments on this score. None is persuasive.

First, the Government argues that its termination of MPP is not a "final agency action" under the APA. The APA allows judicial review for "final agency action for which there is no other adequate remedy in a court." 5 U.S.C. § 704. And for an agency action to qualify as final, the action must (1) mark[] the consummation of the agency's decisionmaking process," and (2) either determine "rights or obligations" or produce "legal consequences." Texas v. EEOC, 933 F.3d 433, 441 (quoting Bennett v. Spear, 520 U.S. 154, 177–78 (1997)).

The Government does not contest that the June 1 Memorandum was the consummation of the decisionmaking process. As for the second prong, the Government simply asserts the Memorandum is a general policy statement—and therefore can neither determine rights nor produce obligations or legal consequences. Stay Mot. at 10–11. This argument ignores Circuit precedent establishing that a "policy statement" can nonetheless be "final agency action" under the APA. See Merchs. Fast Motor Lines, Inc. v. ICC, 5 F.3d 911, 919–20 (5th Cir. 1993). It also ignores the principle that "where agency action withdraws an entity's previously-held discretion, that action alters the legal regime, binds the entity, and thus qualifies as final agency action" under the APA. EEOC, 933 F.3d at 442 (quotation omitted). As the district court ably explained, the Memorandum withdrew DHS officers' previously existing discretion when it directed "DHS personnel, effective immediately, to take all appropriate actions to terminate MPP, including taking all steps necessary to rescind implementing guidance and other directives issued to carry out MPP." D. Ct. Op. at 27 (emphasis omitted) (quoting AR.7).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

b.

Second, the Government argues that the decision to terminate MPP is unreviewable under 5 U.S.C. § 701(a). Stay Mot. at 8. The APA creates a "basic presumption of judicial review." DHS v. Regents of the Univ. of Cal., 140 S. Ct. 1891, 1905 (2020) (quotation omitted). And to vindicate that presumption, the Supreme Court has read § 701(a)(2) "quite narrowly." Id. (quotation omitted). The presumption can be overcome "by a showing that the relevant statute precludes review, § 701(a)(1), or that the agency action is committed to agency discretion by law, § 701(a)(2)." Id. (quotations and alterations omitted). Here, the Government has tried but failed to make both showings.

The Government argues that 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C) is a "statute[] [that] preclude[s] judicial review." 5 U.S.C. § 701(a)(1). Section 1225(b)(2)(C) provides:

> In the case of an alien described in subparagraph (A) who is arriving on land (whether or not at a designated port of arrival) from a foreign territory contiguous to the United States, the Attorney General may return the alien to that territory pending a proceeding under section 1229a of this title.

That provision does confer the discretion to choose among various detention and non-detention options for aliens placed in § 1229a removal proceedings. But the question presented in the States' complaint is not whether a particular alien is subject to detention in any particular set of circumstances. The States are instead challenging DHS's June 1 decision to rescind MPP—

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

which is a government program that creates rules and procedures for entire classes of aliens. It remains true—with or without MPP—that DHS has discretion to make individualized detention and non-detention decisions in accordance with the strictures of § 1225. What DHS cannot do, the States allege, is rescind the MPP program in a way that is arbitrary, capricious, and contrary to law. DHS cites nothing to suggest that latter decision is committed to agency discretion. In fact, cases like Regents prove it is not. See 140 S. Ct. at 1905–06 (decision to rescind DACA not committed to agency discretion); Texas, 809 F.3d at 168–69 (decision to implement DAPA not committed to agency discretion).

The Government's argument that the decision to rescind MPP is "committed to agency discretion by law" fails for similar reasons. 5 U.S.C. § 701(a)(2); see Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1905. This form of non-reviewability occurs where a statute is "drawn so that it furnishes no meaningful standard by which to judge the [agency's] action." Dep't of Commerce v. New York, 139 S. Ct. 2251, 2568 (2019); see also Citizens to Preserve Overton Park, Inc. v. Volpe, 401 U.S. 402, 410 (1971) (holding a decision is committed to agency discretion when there is "no law to apply" (quotation omitted)). The Government argues that § 1225 provides no standard by which to evaluate DHS's action in this case. Stay Mot. at 8–9.

Once again, Supreme Court precedent undercuts the Government's argument. Even a statute that "leave[s] much to [an agency's] discretion" does not necessarily "leave [that] discretion unbounded." Dep't of Commerce, 139 S. Ct. at 2567–68 (holding a statute granting the Secretary of Commerce broad discretion to take the census "in such form and content as he may determine" did not commit the decision to reinstate a citizenship question to the Secretary's discretion (quotation omitted)). So too here. Section 1225(b)(2)(C) certainly confers discretion, but there is no reason to think that discretion is infinite—just as there is no reason to think the discretion extends beyond the bounds of individualized, case-by-case determinations to begin with. And like the statute in Department of Commerce, which included provisions that meaningfully restrained the Secretary of Commerce, see 139 S. Ct. at 2568–69, § 1225 includes provisions restraining the DHS in this case. See § 1225(b)(1)(B)(iii)(IV) (an alien subject to expedited removal, but without a credible fear of persecution, "shall be detained pending a final determination of credible fear of persecution"); § 1225(b)(1)(B)(ii) (an alien with a credible fear of persecution "shall be detained for further consideration of the application for asylum"); § 1225(b)(1)(B)(iii)(IV) ("Any alien subject to the procedures under this clause shall be detained pending a final determination of credible fear of persecution and, if found not to have such a fear, until removed."); § 1225(b)(2)(C) (Attorney General "may return" an alien not subject to expedited removal as an alternative to detention). We conclude that this is not a "case in which there is no law to apply." Dep't of Commerce, 139 S. Ct. at 2569 (quotation omitted).

c.

The Government's final justiciability argument is that the MPP-termination decision is nothing more than a non-enforcement decision, unreviewable under Heckler v. Chaney, 470 U.S. 821 (1985). This argument fails for two reasons. The first is that the termination of MPP is more than a non-enforcement policy, just like the DACA program at issue in Regents and the DAPA program at issue in Texas. As the district court explained, the termination of MPP will necessarily lead to the release and parole of aliens into the United States. And that will "create affirmative benefits for aliens such as work authorization." D. Ct. Op. at 31; see also Texas, 809 F.3d at 167 ("Likewise, to be reviewable agency action, DAPA need not directly confer public benefits—removing a categorical bar on receipt of those benefits and thereby making a class of persons newly eligible for them 'provides a focus for judicial review.'" (quoting Chaney, 470 U.S. at 832)).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Second and independently, the termination of MPP was simply not a non-enforcement decision. MPP was a government program—replete with rules procedures and dedicated infrastructure. It is precisely because MPP was a government program—and much more than a non-enforcement decision—that the Government now claims that it will be difficult to resume it. See infra Part III. And the Government cites nothing to suggest that the elimination of a such a program can be dismissed as mere "non-enforcement." The Government therefore has failed to make a strong showing that the States' claims are non-justiciable.

B.

The Government next argues that it is likely to succeed on appeal because the June 1 Memorandum accords with federal law. The district court held otherwise on two independent grounds. First, the district court determined that the termination of MPP violated the APA because the June 1 Memorandum was arbitrary and capricious. D. Ct. Op. at 34–42. Second, the district court concluded that in "these particular circumstances," the termination violated 8 U.S.C. § 1225. Id. at 42–44 (emphasis removed). We hold the Government has not come close to showing that it is likely to succeed in challenging either conclusion, let alone both.

1.

First, the APA. The APA directs courts to "hold unlawful and set aside agency action[s]" that are "arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law." 5 U.S.C. § 706(2). "The APA's arbitrary-and-capricious standard requires that agency action be reasonable and reasonably explained." FCC v. Prometheus Radio Project, 141 S. Ct. 1150, 1158 (2021). While applying this "deferential" standard, we must not

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

"substitute" our "own policy judgment for that of the agency." Id. But we must ensure that "the agency has acted within a zone of reasonableness and, in particular, has reasonably considered the relevant issues and reasonably explained the decision." Id.; see also Motor Vehicle Mfrs. Ass'n of U.S., Inc. v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 463 U.S. 29, 43 (1983) ("[T]he agency must examine the relevant data and articulate a satisfactory explanation for its action including a 'rational connection between the facts found and the choice made'" (quoting Burlington Truck Lines v. United States, 371 U.S. 156, 168 (1962))). "Put simply, we must set aside any action premised on reasoning that fails to account for 'relevant factors' or evinces 'a clear error of judgment.'" Univ. of Tex. M.D. Anderson Cancer Ctr. v. HHS, 985 F.3d 472, 475 (5th Cir. 2021) (quoting Marsh v. Or. Nat. Res. Council, 490 U.S. 360, 378 (1989)). This review "is not toothless." Sw. Elec. Power Co. v. United States Env't Prot. Agency, 920 F.3d 999, 1013 (5th Cir. 2019). And in all events, we can consider only the reasoning "articulated by the agency itself"; we cannot consider post hoc rationalizations. State Farm, 463 U.S. at 50; see also Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1909 ("An agency must defend its actions based on the reasons it gave when it acted.").

The Government has not shown a strong chance of success on appeal. That is because when terminating MPP in the June 1 Memorandum, the Secretary failed to consider several "relevant factors" and "'important aspect[s] of the problem.'" Michigan v. E.P.A., 576 U.S. 743, 750, 752 (2015) (quotations omitted); see also Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1910. These include (a) the States' legitimate reliance interests, (b) MPP's benefits, (c) potential alternatives to MPP, and (d) § 1225's implications. These four omissions likely doom the Government's appeal. The Governments counterarguments (e) are unpersuasive.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

DHS "failed to address whether there was 'legitimate reliance' on" MPP. Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1913 (quoting Smiley v. Citibank (S.D.), N.A., 517 U.S. 735, 742 (1996)). In its seven-page June 1 Memorandum, DHS does not directly mention any reliance interests, especially those of the States. The closest the June 1 Memorandum gets is a reference to "the impact [terminating MPP] could have on border management and border communities." AR5. But the Memorandum makes clear that "border communities" do not include border states. See id. ("referring only to "nongovernmental organizations and local officials"). And the vague reference to "border management" is insufficient to show specific, meaningful consideration of the States' reliance interests.

In response, the Government concedes that it failed to consider the States' reliance interests. But it argues that is irrelevant because "the States have no cognizable reliance interest in a discretionary program." Stay Mot. at 18. We reject that argument for several reasons.

Most importantly, the Government's contention is squarely foreclosed by Regents. There, the Supreme Court acknowledged that the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals ("DACA") program was a discretionary program. 140 S. Ct. at 1910. Still, the Court faulted DHS for not considering reliance interests, including in particular those of the states. As the Supreme Court explained, "[w]hen an agency changes course, . . . it must be cognizant that longstanding policies may have engendered serious reliance interests that must be taken into account." Id. at 1913 (quotation omitted). Those reliance interests included states' interests. See id. at 1914 (highlighting assertions that "[s]tates and local governments could lose $1.25 billion in tax revenue each year"). So if the termination of DACA—a discretionary, immigration program—must consider states' "potential reliance interests," then so does termination of MPP. Id. at 1913. That is particularly true here because the district court found as a matter of fact—and the Government does not contest—that states like Texas face fiscal harm from the termination of MPP. See D. Ct. Op. at 18–20.

The district court also found that the "termination of MPP has and will continue to increase the number of aliens being released into the United States." Id. at 17. The Supreme Court has recognized that border states "bear[] many of the consequences of unlawful immigration." Arizona v. United States, 567 U.S. 387, 397 (2012). It therefore follows that a "potential reliance interest" that DHS must consider includes Texas.

The DHS-Texas Agreement reinforces the Government's awareness of the State's reliance interests. In that Agreement, DHS stipulated:

- "Texas, like other States, is directly and concretely affected by changes to DHS rules and policies that have the effect of easing, relaxing, or limiting immigration enforcement." Compl., Ex. B at 1.
- "The harm to Texas is particularly acute where its budget has been set months or years in advance and it has no time to adjust its budget to respond to DHS policy changes." Id.
- "[A]n aggrieved party will be irreparably damaged." Id. at 5.

The Agreement further states that it "establishes a binding and enforceable commitment between DHS and Texas." Id. at 2. Texas therefore could reasonably rely on the Agreement. And Texas did in fact rely on the Agreement by including DHS's breach as a cause of action in its complaint—filed months before the June 1 Memorandum. And then—despite these reliance interests and despite being on notice of the Agreement from the States' complaint—the June 1 Memorandum said not one word about the Agreement. A "reasonable and reasonably explained" decision would have said something. Prometheus, 141 S. Ct. at 1158. That is why this "omission alone [likely] renders [the Secretary's] decision arbitrary and capricious." Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1913.[4]

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

b.

The June 1 Memorandum also failed to consider DHS's prior factual findings on MPP's benefits. In its October 2019 Assessment of MPP, DHS found that "aliens without meritorious claims—which no longer constitute[d] a free ticket into the United States—[were] beginning to voluntarily return home." D. Ct. Op. at 10. DHS also found that MPP addressed the "perverse incentives" created by allowing "those with non-meritorious claims . . . [to] remain in the country for lengthy periods of time." Id. These benefits, DHS emphasized, were a "core component" or "cornerstone" of the agency's prior immigration policy. Id. at 12.

Nonetheless, the June 1 Memorandum did not expressly mention, let alone meaningfully discuss, DHS's prior factual findings. Instead, the Secretary changed policies based on his own findings that contradict DHS's October 2019 findings. But an agency must provide "a more detailed justification" when a "new policy rests upon factual findings that contradict those which underlay its prior policy." FCC v. Fox Television Stations, Inc.,

[4] As the D.C. Circuit has emphasized in a different APA context, "the opportunity to comment is meaningless unless the agency responds to significant points raised by the public." Sherley v. Sebelius, 689 F.3d 776, 784 (D.C. Cir. 2012) (Sentelle, C.J.) (quotation omitted). We do not suggest that DHS needed notice-and-comment rulemaking to rescind MPP. But it did need to consider "relevant factors" to that rescission decision. Id. And you might reasonably think that one "relevant factor[]" to that decision was DHS's pledge "to consult Texas and consider its views before taking any action, adopting or modify[ing] a policy or procedure, or making any decision that" affects MPP. Compl., Ex. B at 2. Perhaps DHS has a good reason for its action. But it is likely arbitrary and capricious for DHS not even to acknowledge its agreement—let alone do anything to consult Texas or consider its views.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

556 U.S. 502, 515 (2009). The Secretary did not provide the required "more detailed justification." Id. This further indicates that the termination of MPP was arbitrary and capricious.

c.

The June 1 Memorandum also insufficiently addressed alternatives to terminating MPP. "[W]hen an agency rescinds a prior policy[,] its reasoned analysis must consider the alternatives that are within the ambit of the existing policy." Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1913 (quotation omitted). While considering alternatives, DHS "was required to assess whether there were reliance interests, determine whether they were significant, and weigh any such interests against competing policy concerns." Id. at 1915. As explained above, DHS did not adequately assess reliance interests. So it would be impossible for the June 1 Memorandum to properly weigh the relevant interests against competing policy concerns while considering alternatives.

The June 1 Memorandum offers a single conclusory sentence addressing potential modifications to MPP: "I also considered whether the program could be modified in some fashion, but I believe that addressing the deficiencies identified in my review would require a total redesign that would involve significant additional investments in personnel and resources." AR.5. But "belief" that a "total redesign" was required, id., is no substitute for a "reasonable and reasonably explained" decision. Prometheus, 141 S. Ct. at 1158.

Of course, "DHS was not required . . . to consider all policy alternatives in reaching [its] decision," and the agency has "considerable flexibility" to "wind-down" a program. Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1914 (emphasis added) (quotation omitted). But the problem is that the Secretary failed to mention any modification to MPP as a possible alternative, even though "the alternatives . . . are within the ambit of the existing policy." Id. at 1913

(quotations omitted). And merely stating that an alternative was considered is not enough to show reasoned analysis. Cf. United Techs. Corp. v. U.S. Dep't of Def., 601 F.3d 557, 562 (D.C. Cir. 2010) ("We do not defer to the agency's conclusory or unsupported suppositions." (quotation omitted)).

The Government's principal counterargument is that DHS considered an alternative outside "the ambit of the existing policy." Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1913. Specifically, the June 1 Memorandum pointed to a "Dedicated Docket" program designed to provide counsel to aliens in removal proceedings. AR.4–5 & n.6; see Stay Mot. at 16; Reply at 7. This argument is unpersuasive for at least two reasons. First, by the Government's own admission, the "Dedicated Docket" is outside the ambit of MPP—and hence it does not count as a reasoned consideration of alternatives "within the ambit of the existing policy." Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1913 (emphasis added). And second, neither the June 1 Memorandum nor the Government in its stay motion explains why MPP and the "Dedicated Docket" are mutually exclusive.

The June 1 Memorandum also failed to consider the legal implications of terminating the policy. After the Government suspended MPP—but before it rescinded the program—Texas filed this lawsuit. In its original complaint, and in its initial motion for preliminary injunction, Texas argued that the suspension of MPP violated § 1225. See Compl. at 36–38; Prelim. Inj. Mot., ECF No. 30. About a month and a half later, the Secretary issued the memorandum terminating MPP. So the government was on notice of the legal implications. Yet in the memorandum, the Secretary does not mention the lawfulness concerns involving § 1225—even though, the "natural response" to this "newly identified problem" would be to consider the problem. Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1916. This further indicates that "the process by which" the Secretary reached that result was neither "logical" nor "rational." Michigan, 576 U.S. at 750.

The Government offers a hodgepodge of counterarguments to justify the June 1 Memorandum's omissions. None is persuasive.

The Government repeatedly argues that DHS's statement that it considered this or that factor is enough to avoid any arbitrary-and-capricious problems. See Stay Mot. at 16. The law says otherwise. "Stating that a factor was considered . . . is not a substitute for considering it." Getty v. Fed. Sav. & Loan Ins. Corp., 805 F.2d 1050, 1055 (D.C. Cir. 1986); see also Corrosion Proof Fittings v. E.P.A., 947 F.2d 1201, 1226 (5th Cir. 1991) ("The EPA's failure to consider the regulatory alternatives, however, cannot be substantiated by conclusory statements . . . ."); United Techs., 601 F.3d at 562 ("We do not defer to the agency's conclusory or unsupported suppositions." (quotation omitted)); cf. Gerber v. Norton, 294 F.3d 173, 185 (D.C. Cir. 2002) ("And stating that a factor was considered—or found—is not a substitute for considering or finding it." (quotation omitted)); Gresham v. Azar, 950 F.3d 93, 103 (D.C. Cir. 2020) ("Nodding to concerns raised by commenters only to dismiss them in a conclusory manner is not a hallmark of reasoned decisionmaking."). This well-established principle makes sense. After all:

> [A]n agency's "experience and expertise" presumably enable the agency to provide the required explanation, but they do not substitute for the explanation, any more than an expert witness's credentials substitute for the substantive requirements applicable to the expert's testimony under Fed. R. Evid. 702. The requirement of explanation presumes the expertise and experience of the agency and still demands an adequate explanation in the particular matter.

CS Wind Viet. Co. v. United States, 832 F.3d 1367, 1377 (Fed. Cir. 2016) (citations omitted).

The Government also points to the June 1 Memorandum's observations on MPP's shortcomings. See Stay Mot. at 16–17. Even if creditable, these observations cannot justify the other omissions discussed above. But in any event, many of those observations are neither "logical" nor "rational." Michigan, 576 U.S. at 750. Take DHS's termination justification based on in absentia removal orders. DHS observed that "the high percentage of cases completed through the entry of in absentia removal orders (approximately 44 percent, based on DHS data) raises questions for me about the design and operation of the program." AR.4 (emphasis added). The district court found that "[t]he federal government's data shows similarly high rates of in absentia removals prior to implementation of MPP." D. Ct. Op. at 40. The Government has not said one word to suggest the district court's factual finding was clearly erroneous.[5] We therefore cannot conclude that the Secretary "examine[d] the relevant data and articulate[d] a satisfactory explanation" with "a rational connection between the facts found and the choice" to terminate MPP. State Farm, 463 U.S. at 43 (quotation omitted). And even on the Government's own terms—considering only half the statistics and ignoring the district court's factual finding—the June 1 Memorandum only said that in absentia statistics "raise[d] questions for [DHS] about the design and operation of the program." AR.4. But the process required by the APA requires agencies to seek answers and reasonably explain the outcome of that effort, including its conclusions.

[5] In its reply brief, the Government argues that it need not have commissioned an "in-depth empirical analysis" of the in absentia statistics before rescinding MPP. Reply at 9. Of course that is true. But it is equally true that the Government cannot cherry-pick only the statistics it likes in the administrative record. Nor can the Government fail to address statistics that already exist in that record. See Encino Motorcars, LLC v. Navarro, 136 S. Ct. 2117, 2126 (2016) (holding "an unexplained inconsistency in agency policy is a reason for holding an interpretation to be an arbitrary and capricious change from agency practice" (quotation omitted)).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

The June 1 Memorandum places much weight on COVID-19. According to the Memorandum, the pandemic "compounded" "challenges faced by MPP" when "immigration courts designated to hear MPP cases were closed for public health reasons between March 2020 and April 2021." AR.4. But DHS issued its memorandum terminating MPP at least one month after courts reopened. As the district court explained: "Past problems with past closures are irrelevant to the decision to prospectively terminate MPP in June 2021. This is especially true when the Secretary admits DHS had maintained the facilities during the pandemic." D. Ct. Op. at 41. The Government challenges this conclusion on the ground that "infrastructure used for MPP remains shuttered." Stay Mot. at 19 n.4. But the Government provides no indication that the facilities are not maintained or are shuttered because of the pandemic—as opposed to the choice the Government itself made when it suspended MPP in January 2021.

In addition to the APA, the district court also relied on 8 U.S.C. § 1225. The Government claims that the district court determined that "the Secretary is required to return any noncitizen he fails to detain" and that the district court's "core legal analysis" is that DHS has "a binary choice between detention or return to Mexico for noncitizens arriving from Mexico." Stay Mot. at 11–13. In essence, the Government characterizes the district court's decision and injunction as removing the Government's ability to use its discretion under 8 U.S.C. §§ 1182(d)(5)(A) and 1226. But as we explain in Part III, infra, the Government has mischaracterized the district court's order. This matters because all of the Government's § 1225 arguments hinge on an incorrect premise.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Therefore, we cannot conclude that the Government is likely to succeed on either its APA arguments or its § 1225 arguments—let alone that the Government is likely to succeed on both. The Government therefore has not come close to a "strong showing" that it is likely to succeed on the merits. Nken, 556 U.S. at 426.

III.

The Government also has not shown that it will be irreparably injured absent a stay pending appeal. The Government's arguments are largely built on two strawmen. We consider and reject those before turning to the Government's other arguments.

First, the Government complains that it will be irreparably harmed absent a stay because DHS is incapable of reinstating MPP "in a matter of days." Stay Mot. at 21; see also Decl. of David Shahoulian ¶ 16 (Aug. 16, 2021) (arguing DHS cannot immediately "reestablish the entire infrastructure upon which [MPP] was built"). This is a strawman. The district court did not order the Government to restore MPP's infrastructure overnight. It ordered that, once the injunction takes effect on August 21, DHS must "enforce and implement MPP in good faith." D. Ct. Op. at 52. DHS does not argue that good faith is an unreasonably high standard to meet.

Second, the Government asserts it will be irreparably injured because the injunction obligates DHS to detain "every single person described in 8 U.S.C. § 1225," which DHS cannot do because it lacks "sufficient detention capacity." Decl. of David Shahoulian ¶ 5 (Aug. 16, 2021). This is a second strawman. The injunction does not require the Government to detain every alien subject to § 1225. Nor does it order the Government to "build or obtain" additional detention facilities. Stay Mot. at 21. Instead, it requires the Government to "enforce and implement MPP in good faith . . . until such a time as the federal government has sufficient detention capacity to detain all aliens subject to mandatory detention." D. Ct. Op. at 52 (second emphasis added).

And far from ordering the Government to detain "every single person described in 8 U.S.C. § 1225," Decl. of David Shahoulian ¶ 5 (Aug. 16, 2021), the district court specifically acknowledged that the Government has other options. Under § 1225(b)(2)(A), which provides the statutory authority for MPP, an alien arriving on land from a contiguous foreign territory can be returned to that territory. See D. Ct. Op. at 43 & n.11 (noting this discretion). Under 8 U.S.C. § 1182(d)(5)(A), DHS can parole an alien into the United States "on a case-by-case basis for urgent humanitarian reasons or significant public benefit." (Emphasis added); see D. Ct. Op. at 43 & n.11 (noting this discretion). Under 8 U.S.C. § 1226, DHS can release on "bond" or "conditional parole" an alien arrested on a warrant and detained "pending a decision on whether the alien is to be removed." See also Stay Mot. at 12; D. Ct. Op. at 51 (noting this discretion). Last but not least, of course, the Government can choose to detain an alien in accordance with § 1225. See D. Ct. Op. at 43 (noting this discretion).

What the Government cannot do, the district court held, is simply release every alien described in § 1225 en masse into the United States. The Government has not pointed to a single word anywhere in the INA that suggests it can do that. And the Government cannot claim an irreparable injury from being enjoined against an action that it has no statutory authorization to take.

Third and finally, we turn to the Government's non-strawmen arguments for its irreparable injuries. Most of these are self-inflicted and therefore do not count. See 11A CHARLES ALAN WRIGHT, ET AL.,

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

MO-AG-22-0644-A-003478

FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 2948.1 (2021) ("[A] party may not satisfy the irreparable harm requirement if the harm complained of is self-inflicted"). For example, the Government notes that "DHS has been in the process of unwinding MPP and its infrastructure for months," such that restarting the program now would be difficult. Stay Mot. at 21. But as the district court noted, "Texas filed suit challenging the suspension of enrollments in MPP . . . nearly two months before DHS purported to terminate the program entirely in the June 1 Memorandum." D. Ct. Op. at 47. Therefore, DHS could have avoided this problem by waiting to unwind MPP until this litigation was resolved. The self-inflicted nature of the government's asserted harm "'severely undermines' its claim for equitable relief." Al Otro Lado v. Wolf, 952 F.3d 999, 1008 (9th Cir. 2020) (quoting Hirschfeld v. Bd. of Elections in City of N.Y., 984 F.2d 35, 39 (2d Cir. 1993)); accord Second City Music, Inc. v. City of Chicago, 333 F.3d 846, 850 (7th Cir. 2003) ("[S]elf-inflicted wounds are not irreparable injury."); Caplan v. Fellheimer Eichen Braverman & Kaskey, 68 F.3d 828, 839 (3d Cir. 1995) ("If the harm complained of is self-inflicted, it does not qualify as irreparable.").

Before the district court, the Government also suggested that it began unwinding MPP four or more months before the June 1 Memorandum. See D. Ct. Op. at 48. That understandably would make it harder for DHS to restart MPP on Saturday. But it also makes DHS's legal position dramatically weaker. It is a fundamental precept of administrative law that an administrative agency cannot make its decision first and explain it later. See, e.g., Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1908–10. Insofar as DHS concedes that its June 1 Memorandum is a post hoc rationalization for a decision that it made many months earlier, it has conceded that the June 1 Memorandum is arbitrary, capricious, and not a good faith explanation for its decision. Such inequitable conduct is "sufficient to deny" DHS's request for an equitable stay pending appeal. See In re GGW Brands, LLC, No. 2:13-bk-15130, 2013 WL 6906375, at *26–*27 (Bankr. C.D. Cal. Nov. 15, 2013).

The Government also asserts that reinstating MPP will cause harm because "DHS cannot restart MPP without significant cooperation with Mexico," and the injunction implicates "delicate and ongoing discussions with Mexico." Stay Mot. at 21. There are at least four problems with that. First, as the district court noted, DHS created MPP unilaterally and without any previous agreement with Mexico. See D. Ct. Op. at 49 & n.15. DHS does not explain why it cannot likewise restart MPP unilaterally. Second, the Government does not point to any evidence that Mexico has withdrawn its support for MPP. See AR.152–53 (Mexico's December 20, 2018 statement of support). Third, the Government "'could have avoided' any disruptions by simply informing Mexico that termination of MPP would be subject to judicial review." D. Ct. Op. at 47 (quoting Texas, 809 F.3d at 187). Insofar as the Government failed to do that, again, its injury is self-inflicted. Fourth, even assuming Mexico's support is required, assuming Mexico has withdrawn its support, and assuming Mexico will not support a new MPP, the injunction still does not irreparably harm the Government. The injunction only requires good faith on the part of the United States—if the Government's good-faith efforts to implement MPP are thwarted by Mexico, it nonetheless will be in compliance with the district court's order, so long as it also adheres to the rest of the statutory requirements.

Finally, because the Government has requested a stay pending completion of appellate proceedings, the relevant question is whether the Government will be irreparably harmed during the pendency of the appeal. Even if the Government were correct that long-term compliance with the district court's injunction would cause irreparable harm, it presents no reason to think that it cannot comply with the district court's requirement of good faith while the appeal proceeds. Therefore, the Government has failed to demonstrate that it will be irreparably injured absent a stay pending appeal.

IV.

The final two Nken factors also do not warrant a stay. See Nken, 556 U.S. at 434.

The district court concluded that the States have suffered, and will continue to suffer, harms as a result of the termination of MPP. See D. Ct. Op. at 17 ("The termination of MPP has [increased] and will continue to increase the number of aliens being released into the United States and has [imposed] and will continue to impose harms on Plaintiff States Texas and Missouri."). We agree. See supra Part II.A.1 (standing). A stay "would enable" aliens released into the interior "to apply for driver's licenses and other benefits, and it would be difficult for the states to retract those benefits or recoup their costs even if they won on the merits." Texas, 787 F.3d at 768.

Likewise, the "public interest [is] in having governmental agencies abide by the federal laws that govern their existence and operations." Washington v. Reno, 35 F.3d 1093, 1102 (6th Cir. 1994). Here, the Government has failed to carry its burden to show that its conduct comports with federal law. And "[t]here is generally no public interest in the perpetuation of unlawful agency action." League of Women Voters of U.S. v. Newby, 838 F.3d 1, 12 (D.C. Cir. 2016).

The Government is also wrong to say that a stay would promote the public interest by preserving the separation of powers. All the district court's injunction requires of the Government is that it act in accordance with the INA. And in all events, "it is the resolution of the case on the merits, not whether the injunction is stayed pending appeal, that will affect" principles of "separation of powers and federalism." Texas, 787 F.3d at 768.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

MO-AG-22-0644-A-003481

The DHS-Texas Agreement also suggests the public interest counsels against issuing a stay. That Agreement expressly acknowledged that if DHS failed to comply with the Agreement's terms, Texas would "be irreparably damaged" and would "not have an adequate remedy at law." Compl., Ex. B at 4. The Agreement remained binding until August 1, 2021, and the parties agree DHS violated its terms. See D. Ct. Op. at 14 ("The parties agree DHS did not follow the[] procedures" required by the Agreement.). The district court concluded that the expiration of the Agreement mooted Texas's claim under it. See id. at 44. As noted in Part II above, however, the States' likelihood of success on the merits of their APA claims means that DHS will have to consider all relevant factors before attempting to rescind MPP—including its effects on the States. The public interest plainly lies in not allowing DHS to circumvent those federalism concerns.

V.

Finally, the Government argues a stay is warranted because the district court should have remanded without vacating the June 1 Memorandum or issuing an injunction. Stay Mot. at 22; see also Reply at 12. "Remand, not vacatur, is generally appropriate when there is at least a serious possibility that the agency will be able to substantiate its decision given an opportunity to do so." Texas Ass'n of Manufacturers v. United States Consumer Prod. Safety Comm'n, 989 F.3d 368, 389 (5th Cir. 2021). But it is unclear how DHS can substantiate its decision on remand. Neither in its opening stay motion nor in its reply does the Government suggest how it can. See generally Stay Mot. at 22–23; Reply at 12. And Supreme Court precedent suggests that any later memorandum on remand elaborating on the June 1 Memorandum would be irrelevant to an arbitrary-and-capricious analysis because it is a post hoc rationalization. See Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1907–09. So at this stage, without any argument whatsoever to the contrary, it appears that DHS would have to issue "a new rule implementing a new policy" that

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

"compl[ies] with the procedural requirements for new agency action." Id. at 1908 (emphases added).

Vacatur, by contrast, would not cause "disruptive consequences". See United Steel v. Mine Safety & Health Admin., 925 F.3d 1279, 1287 (D.C. Cir. 2019) (also considering "the disruptive consequences of vacatur" (internal quotation marks omitted)). The Government makes no argument materially different from its irreparable-injury argument. So we reject the Government's arguments here for the same reasons we rejected them in Part III, supra.

* * *

The Government has failed to make the requisite showing for all four Nken factors. The Government's motion for a stay pending appeal is therefore DENIED. The Government's appeal is hereby EXPEDITED for consideration before the next available oral argument panel.

Appeal from the United States District Court

USDC No. 2:21-cv-67

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Before ELROD, OLDHAM, and WILSON, Circuit Judges.

PER CURIAM:

This case concerns the Migrant Protection Protocols ("MPP") created by the Secretary of the Department of Homeland Security on December 20, 2018, and purportedly rescinded by DHS in a memorandum on June 1, 2021 ("June 1 Memorandum").[1] After a full bench trial and 53 pages of findings of fact and conclusions of law, the district court concluded that DHS's purported rescission of MPP violated, inter alia, the Administrative Procedure Act ("APA"). DHS seeks a stay pending appeal. After carefully considering full briefing from the parties, we hold DHS failed to satisfy the four stay factors. See Nken v. Holder, 556 U.S. 418 (2009). The motion is denied.

I.

A.

On December 20, 2018, the Trump Administration implemented MPP in response to an immigration surge at the southern border. D. Ct. Op. at 7. The statutory authority for MPP is found in 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C), which authorizes the Government to return certain third-country nationals arriving in the United States to Mexico or Canada for the duration of their removal proceedings under 8 U.S.C. § 1229a. Id. at 8. Also on December 20, 2018, the United States obtained Mexico's agreement to permit entry of MPP enrollees. Id. The goal of MPP was to ensure that "[c]ertain aliens attempting to enter the U.S. illegally or without documentation . . . will no longer be released into the country, where they often fail to file an asylum

[1] We refer to the Secretary's actions as those of "DHS" unless otherwise stated.

application and/or disappear before an immigration judge can determine the merits of any claim." Id. (quotation omitted).

In January 2019, "DHS began implementing MPP, initially in San Diego, California, then El Paso, Texas, and Calexico, California, and then nationwide." Id. (citing AR.155–56, AR.684). In February 2019, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement issued guidance on MPP to its field offices, anticipating the expansion of MPP across the border. Id. at 9 (citing AR.165–70). By December 31, 2020, DHS had enrolled 68,039 aliens in MPP. Id. at 12 (citing AR.555).

DHS and Texas entered into a Memorandum of Understanding (the "Agreement"), which the parties finalized on January 8, 2021. Id. at 13 (citing Compl., Ex. B at 8). The Agreement required Texas to provide information and assist DHS to "perform its border security, legal immigration, immigration enforcement, and national security missions." Id. (quoting Compl., Ex. B at 2). In return, DHS agreed to consult Texas and consider its views before taking actions that could modify immigration enforcement. See id. at 13–14 (citing Compl., Ex. B at 2). DHS also agreed to "'[p]rovide Texas with 180 days' written notice . . . of any proposed action' subject to the consultation requirement," id. at 14 (quoting Compl., Ex. B at 3), so that Texas would have an opportunity to comment on the proposal. The Agreement further required DHS to consider Texas's input "in good faith" and, if it decided to reject Texas's input, "provide a detailed written explanation" of its reasons for doing so. Id. (emphasis omitted) (quoting Compl., Ex. B at 3).

On Inauguration Day, the Biden Administration announced that it would suspend further enrollments in MPP. The Acting Secretary of DHS wrote that "[e]ffective January 21, 2021, the Department will suspend new enrollments in the Migrant Protection Protocols (MPP), pending further review of the program. Aliens who are not already enrolled in MPP should be processed under other existing legal authorities." Id. at 15 (quoting AR.581).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

On February 2, 2021, DHS sent a letter to Texas purporting to terminate the Agreement "effective immediately." Id. at 14. Because it believed that the letter did not comply with the Agreement's required procedures, Texas interpreted the letter "as a notice of intent to terminate" the Agreement. Id. (citing ECF No. 53 at 21).

On April 13, 2021, Texas and Missouri (the "States") sued, challenging the temporary suspension of MPP. Id. at 1 (citing ECF No. 1). The States alleged that DHS's January 20 Memorandum violated the APA, the Immigration and Nationality Act ("INA"), the Constitution, and the Agreement. See id. at 2 (citing ECF No. 1 at 4; ECF No. 45). On May 14, the States moved for a preliminary injunction that would enjoin the Government from enforcing and implementing the January 20 Memorandum. Prelim. Inj. Mot., ECF No. 30.

On June 1, before briefing on the preliminary injunction had concluded, DHS issued a new memorandum permanently terminating MPP. D. Ct. Op. at 2. The district court concluded that the June 1 Memorandum mooted the States' complaint, and the court allowed the States to amend their complaint and file a new preliminary injunction motion. Id. The parties agreed to consolidate the preliminary injunction hearing with the trial on the merits pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 65(a)(2). Id. at 3.

B.

Following the bench trial, the district court issued a 53-page memorandum opinion and order, concluding that the States were entitled to relief on their APA and statutory claims. See D. Ct. Op. at 1. The district court made many findings of fact that are relevant here. Among other things,

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

the district court found that MPP had significant benefits before DHS purported to rescind it. For example, DHS's October 2019 Assessment of MPP concluded that "aliens without meritorious claims—which no longer constitute[d] a free ticket into the United States—[were] beginning to voluntarily return home." D. Ct. Op. at 10. And the court noted that DHS also found MPP effective in addressing the prior "perverse incentives" created by allowing "those with non-meritorious claims . . . [to] remain in the country for lengthy periods of time." Id. The court found that this caused a significant decrease in immigration-enforcement encounters along the southern border. Id. And more directly, the court found that caused a decrease in "the number of aliens released into the interior of the United States for the duration of their U.S. removal proceedings." Id. at 11 (citing AR.554). These benefits, DHS emphasized, were a "cornerstone" of the agency's prior immigration policy. D. Ct. Op. at 12.

The court made specific (and largely uncontested) factual findings that "[t]he termination of MPP has [increased] and will continue to increase the number of aliens being released into the United States," and that this increase "has [imposed] and will continue to impose harms on Plaintiff States Texas and Missouri." Id. at 17. On the basis of its factual findings, the district court determined that the States had Article III standing, that the court had jurisdiction to review the agency action, and that the States were within the zone of interests of the INA. Id. at 21–34. The court then concluded that DHS's termination of MPP was unlawful under the APA because the action was arbitrary and capricious and contrary to the INA. Id. at 34–44. Based on those conclusions, the district court "permanently enjoined and restrained [DHS] from implementing or enforcing the June 1 Memorandum" and ordered DHS "to enforce and implement MPP in good faith until such a time as it has been lawfully rescinded in compliance with the APA and until such a time as the federal government has sufficient detention capacity to detain all aliens subject to mandatory detention under Section 1255 without releasing any aliens because of a lack of detention resources." Id. at 52–53 (emphases omitted).

DHS noticed an appeal. On August 17, 2021, the Government requested an emergency stay under Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 8. The States opposed that request on August 18. On August 19, the Government filed a reply. The Government requested that we rule the same day, August 19. In considering the Government's request, we must consider four factors: (1) whether the Government makes a strong showing that it is likely to succeed on the merits; (2) whether the Government will be irreparably injured in the absence of a stay; (3) whether other interested parties will be irreparably injured by a stay; and (4) where the public interest lies. See Nken, 556 U.S. at 426.

II.

We begin with whether the Government has made a strong showing that it is likely to succeed on the merits. The Government makes two merits arguments: (A) the case is not justiciable, and (B) DHS's rescission of MPP did not violate federal law. The Government is likely wrong on both.

A.

The Government first argues that it is likely to succeed on the merits because two justiciability doctrines—standing and non-reviewability—operate as insuperable obstacles to the States' suit. We consider and reject each argument in turn.

1.

First, the States' standing. To establish standing, the States "must show an injury that is 'concrete, particularized, and actual or imminent; fairly traceable to the challenged action; and redressable by a favorable ruling.'"

Texas v. United States, 809 F.3d 134, 150 (5th Cir. 2015) (quoting Clapper v. Amnesty Int'l USA, 568 U.S. 398, 409 (2013)). "Only one of the [appellants] needs to have standing to permit us to consider the [complaint]."[2] Massachusetts v. EPA, 549 U.S. 497, 518 (2007); accord Nat'l Rife Ass'n Am., Inc. v. McCraw, 719 F.3d 338, 344 n.3 (5th Cir. 2013). Because the Government is seeking a stay, we must ask whether it has made a strong showing that the States lack standing. See Valentine v. Collier, 956 F.3d 797, 801 (5th Cir. 2020).

After a bench trial, we review the district court's factual determinations for clear error. See, e.g., Texas, 809 F.3d at 171–72 (reviewing a factual finding for clear error); Env't Tex. Citizen Lobby, Inc. v. ExxonMobil Corp., 968 F.3d 357, 367 (5th Cir. 2020) ("Because this case was tried, Plaintiffs needed to prove standing by a preponderance of the evidence. A factual finding that a plaintiff met that burden is reviewed for clear error." (citation omitted)). And any argument not raised on appeal (including a challenge to a district court's factual finding) is forfeited. See, e.g., United States v. Edwards, 303 F.3d 606, 647 (5th Cir. 2002) ("Many of the 'errors' cited by the defendants are unbriefed. These issues have been [forfeited]."); cf. Fed. R. App. P. 28(a)(9)(A) ("The appellant's brief must contain . . . appellant's contentions and the reasons for them, with citations to the authorities and parts of the record on which the appellant relies.").

We begin with (a) the district court's uncontested factual findings. Then we hold that the Government fails to make a strong showing that it is likely to succeed on appeal because it has not shown that the States lack (b) an injury-in-fact that is (c) traceable and (d) redressable. Finally, any doubt about the States' standing is resolved by (e) the special solicitude guaranteed to sovereign States in our federal system.

The district court found eight facts central to the standing issue. These include:

1. The court found that because of MPP's termination, the Government has been "forced to release and parole aliens into the United States because [the Government] simply [does] not have the resources to detain aliens as mandated by statute." D. Ct. Op. at 17; see also id. at 18 (finding that Texas's "border state" status means some of those aliens have ended up in Texas).
2. The court found that DHS previously acknowledged that "MPP implementation contributed to decreasing the volume of inadmissible aliens arriving in the United States on land from Mexico." Id. at 17 (quotation and alteration omitted).
3. The court found that "the termination of MPP has contributed to the current border surge." Id.
4. The court found that "[s]ince MPP's termination, the number of enforcement encounters on the southwest border has skyrocketed." Id.; see also id. at 18 n.7 (noting "the sworn statement of David Shahoulian, Assistant Secretary for Border and Immigration Policy at DHS," including Shahoulian's statement that "[b]ased on current trends, the Department expects that total encounters this fiscal year are likely to be the highest ever recorded" (emphasis omitted)).
5. The court found that many "aliens present in Texas because of MPP's termination would apply for driver's licenses," the granting of which would impose a cost on Texas. Id. at 19.

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

MO-AG-22-0644-A-003491

6. The court found that "[s]ome school-age child aliens who would have otherwise been enrolled in MPP are being released or paroled into the United States," and that (according to state estimates) Texas will expend an average of $9,216 per additional student in the 2021 school year. Id. at 19.
7. The court found that "[s]ome aliens who would have otherwise been enrolled in MPP are being released or paroled into the United States and will use state-funded healthcare services or benefits in Texas," imposing a cost on the state. D. Ct. Op. at 19–20 (citing AR.555, AR.587–88).
8. Finally, the court found that "[s]ome aliens who would have otherwise been enrolled in MPP are being released or paroled into the United States and [some] will commit crimes in Texas," imposing costs on the state's correctional apparatus. Id. at 20.

The Government does not challenge any of these findings.[3] But even if it did, we would not find any of them clearly erroneous in the light of the record as a whole. See, e.g., United States v. Ismoila, 100 F.3d 380, 396 (5th Cir. 1996) ("[A]s long as the determination is plausible in light of the record as a whole, clear error does not exist.").

Texas's injuries are actual and imminent. As just described, MPP's termination has caused an increase in immigration into Texas. And as

[3] On one reading of the Government's brief, it does contest the fifth finding. See Stay Mot. at 7 (discussing "speculation about an increase in the number of aliens released and paroled who will seek driver's licenses" (quotation omitted)). But in any case, neither our precedent nor the district court's record allows us to conclude the Government is likely to show the finding is clearly erroneous. See Texas, 809 F.3d at 156 (making a similar inference about driver's license applications).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

discussed at length in Texas v. United States, Texas law requires the issuance of a license to any qualified person—including noncitizens who "present . . . documentation issued by the appropriate United States agency that authorizes the applicant to be in the United States." 809 F.3d at 155–56 (alteration in original) (quoting TEX. TRANSP. CODE § 521.142(a)); see also id. (discussing other Texas requirements for a driver's license). Of course, unlike in the Deferred Action for Parents of Americans and Lawful Permanent Residents ("DAPA") program, the challenged action here does not ipso facto guarantee that a given alien will satisfy that requirement. Yet the district court's uncontested findings of fact likely compel the conclusion that MPP's termination has led to an increase in the number of aliens in Texas, many of whom will apply for driver's licenses. And the district court found that Texas incurs a cost every time it inquires into whether an alien satisfies the requirements for a license—even if the person does not in fact qualify for a license. D. Ct. Op. at 19 ("Each additional customer seeking a Texas driver's license imposes a cost on Texas."); see also Decl. of Sheri Gipson, Chief of the Texas Department of Public Safety Driver License Division, ¶ 8 ("DPS estimates that for an additional 10,000 driver['s] license customers seeking a limited term license, DPS would incur a biennial cost of approximately $2,014,870.80." (emphasis added)). So Texas has shown imminent injury in this case. See Texas, 809 F.3d at 156 (reaching the same conclusion on similar facts). Driver's licenses aside, the district court's unchallenged factual findings regarding educational, healthcare, and correctional costs provide equally strong bases for finding cognizable, imminent injury.

The Government's counterargument (limited to the driver's-license theory) is that the district court's analysis was "primarily based on speculation about an increase in the number of aliens released and paroled who will seek driver's licenses." Stay Mot. at 7 (quotation omitted). But the c.

MO-AG-22-0644-A-003493

Government has done nothing to show that district court's findings of fact about the increased number of aliens were clearly erroneous. And it is grounded in our precedent. Texas, 809 F.3d at 156 ("[T]here is little doubt that many [DAPA beneficiaries] would [apply for driver's licenses] because driving is a practical necessity in most of the state.").

Texas's injury is also traceable to the Government's termination of MPP. The district court's uncontested factual findings establish as much: MPP's termination has caused an increase in unlawful immigration into Texas. Many new immigrants are certain to apply for driver's licenses—and evaluating each application will impose costs on Texas. Cf. Texas, 809 F.3d at 160 (noting that new immigrants—in that case, DAPA recipients—"have strong incentives to obtain driver's licenses, and it is hardly speculative that many would do so if they became eligible."). Likewise, at least some MPP-caused immigrants will certainly seek educational and healthcare services from the state. And the States have incurred and will continue to incur costs associated with the border crisis, at least part of which the district court found is traceable to rescinding MPP. The causal chain is easy to see, and the Government does not meaningfully contest this point. See also Massachusetts v. EPA, 549 U.S. at 523 (finding traceability where the EPA's challenged action may have caused people to drive less fuel-efficient cars, which may in turn contribute to a prospective rise in sea levels, which may in turn cause the erosion of Massachusetts's shoreline).

d.

An injunction would remedy Texas's injury by requiring reinstatement of MPP. And with MPP back in place, immigration officers would once again have discretion to return (some) aliens to Mexico. The Government gives two arguments that it says undercut redressability. First,

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

the Government contends, an injunction would provide no redress because immigration officers under MPP would have discretion about whether to return any given immigrant to Mexico. Stay Mot. at 8. This argument ignores the fact that, during MPP's operative period, immigration agents did in fact order over 50,000 aliens back to Mexico from the Texas border. ECF 11 at 2. The Government offers no basis to conclude that a renewed MPP would have any different impact.

Second, the Government argues there is no redressability because aliens cannot be returned to Mexico without Mexico's consent. Stay Mot. at 8. This argument fails because for at least some aliens, MPP would permit DHS to simply refuse admission at ports of entry in the first place. See 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C) (allowing the Attorney General to "return [an] alien" "who is arriving on land (whether or not at a designated port of arrival) from a foreign territory contiguous to the United States . . . to that territory pending a" removal proceeding). Further, Mexico issued a statement in 2018 consenting to admit aliens excluded from the United States under MPP—and nothing in the record suggests Mexico has since retracted that consent. See AR.153 (Secretaría do Relaciones Exteriores, Position of Mexico on the Decision of the U.S. Government to Invoke Section 235(b)(2)(C) of its Immigration and Nationality Act (Dec. 20, 2018)).

To eliminate any doubt as to standing, we emphasize that the States are entitled to "special solicitude" in the standing analysis. Massachusetts v. EPA, 549 U.S. at 520; see also Texas, 809 F.3d at 151 (beginning with the special-solicitude question). Such special solicitude has two requirements: (1) the State must have a procedural right to challenge the action in question, and (2) the challenged action must affect one of the State's quasi-sovereign interests. Texas, 809 F.3d at 151–52 (citing Massachusetts, 549 U.S. at 516–

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

20). In both Massachusetts and Texas, the first prong was satisfied where a State challenged an agency action as invalid under a statute. 549 U.S. at 516–17 (Clean Air Act); 809 F.3d at 152–53 (APA). And in both cases, the second prong was satisfied where a State's challenge involved an agency's alleged failure to protect certain formerly "sovereign prerogatives [that] are now lodged in the Federal Government." Massachusetts, 549 U.S. at 520; see Texas, 809 F.3d at 152–54. Particularly relevant here is Texas, where this Court held that DAPA, by authorizing the presence of many previously unlawful aliens in the United States, affected "quasi-sovereign interests by imposing substantial pressure on them to change their laws, which provide for issuing driver's licenses to some aliens and subsidizing those licenses." 809 F.3d at 153 (quotation omitted).

Texas is indeed entitled to special solicitude. First, just as in the DAPA suit, Texas is asserting a procedural right under the APA to challenge an agency action. See id. at 152 ("In enacting the APA, Congress intended for those 'suffering legal wrong because of agency action' to have judicial recourse, and the states fall well within that definition." (quoting 5 U.S.C. § 702)). And second, Texas asserts precisely the same driver's-license-based injury here that it did there. See id. at 153–54 (explaining that DAPA, by greatly increasing the class of people to whom existing Texas law would entitle a subsidized driver's license, pressured Texas to change its own law—thus affecting a quasi-sovereign interest). Thus, Texas is entitled to special solicitude in the standing inquiry.

That solicitude means redressability is easier to establish for certain state litigants than for other litigants—and this should remove any lingering doubt as to that prong. See Massachusetts, 549 U.S. at 517–18 (holding a State "can assert [its] right[s] without meeting all the normal standards for redressability and immediacy" (quotations and citations omitted)). Texas would be able to establish redressability without this special solicitude—but it reinforces our conclusion that the States have standing and that the Government has failed to make a strong showing to the contrary.

2.

The Government next argues this suit is non-justiciable under the APA. The Government makes three arguments on this score. None is persuasive.

First, the Government argues that its termination of MPP is not a "final agency action" under the APA. The APA allows judicial review for "final agency action for which there is no other adequate remedy in a court." 5 U.S.C. § 704. And for an agency action to qualify as final, the action must (1) mark[] the consummation of the agency's decisionmaking process," and (2) either determine "rights or obligations" or produce "legal consequences." Texas v. EEOC, 933 F.3d 433, 441 (quoting Bennett v. Spear, 520 U.S. 154, 177–78 (1997)).

The Government does not contest that the June 1 Memorandum was the consummation of the decisionmaking process. As for the second prong, the Government simply asserts the Memorandum is a general policy statement—and therefore can neither determine rights nor produce obligations or legal consequences. Stay Mot. at 10–11. This argument ignores Circuit precedent establishing that a "policy statement" can nonetheless be "final agency action" under the APA. See Merchs. Fast Motor Lines, Inc. v. ICC, 5 F.3d 911, 919–20 (5th Cir. 1993). It also ignores the principle that "where agency action withdraws an entity's previously-held discretion, that action alters the legal regime, binds the entity, and thus qualifies as final agency action" under the APA. EEOC, 933 F.3d at 442 (quotation omitted). As the district court ably explained, the Memorandum withdrew DHS officers' previously existing discretion when it directed "DHS personnel, effective immediately, to take all appropriate actions to terminate MPP, including taking all steps necessary to rescind implementing guidance and other directives issued to carry out MPP." D. Ct. Op. at 27 (emphasis omitted) (quoting AR.7).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

b.

Second, the Government argues that the decision to terminate MPP is unreviewable under 5 U.S.C. § 701(a). Stay Mot. at 8. The APA creates a "basic presumption of judicial review." DHS v. Regents of the Univ. of Cal., 140 S. Ct. 1891, 1905 (2020) (quotation omitted). And to vindicate that presumption, the Supreme Court has read § 701(a)(2) "quite narrowly." Id. (quotation omitted). The presumption can be overcome "by a showing that the relevant statute precludes review, § 701(a)(1), or that the agency action is committed to agency discretion by law, § 701(a)(2)." Id. (quotations and alterations omitted). Here, the Government has tried but failed to make both showings.

The Government argues that 8 U.S.C. § 1225(b)(2)(C) is a "statute[] [that] preclude[s] judicial review." 5 U.S.C. § 701(a)(1). Section 1225(b)(2)(C) provides:

> In the case of an alien described in subparagraph (A) who is arriving on land (whether or not at a designated port of arrival) from a foreign territory contiguous to the United States, the Attorney General may return the alien to that territory pending a proceeding under section 1229a of this title.

That provision does confer the discretion to choose among various detention and non-detention options for aliens placed in § 1229a removal proceedings. But the question presented in the States' complaint is not whether a particular alien is subject to detention in any particular set of circumstances. The States are instead challenging DHS's June 1 decision to rescind MPP—

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

which is a government program that creates rules and procedures for entire classes of aliens. It remains true—with or without MPP—that DHS has discretion to make individualized detention and non-detention decisions in accordance with the strictures of § 1225. What DHS cannot do, the States allege, is rescind the MPP program in a way that is arbitrary, capricious, and contrary to law. DHS cites nothing to suggest that latter decision is committed to agency discretion. In fact, cases like Regents prove it is not. See 140 S. Ct. at 1905–06 (decision to rescind DACA not committed to agency discretion); Texas, 809 F.3d at 168–69 (decision to implement DAPA not committed to agency discretion).

The Government's argument that the decision to rescind MPP is "committed to agency discretion by law" fails for similar reasons. 5 U.S.C. § 701(a)(2); see Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1905. This form of non-reviewability occurs where a statute is "drawn so that it furnishes no meaningful standard by which to judge the [agency's] action." Dep't of Commerce v. New York, 139 S. Ct. 2251, 2568 (2019); see also Citizens to Preserve Overton Park, Inc. v. Volpe, 401 U.S. 402, 410 (1971) (holding a decision is committed to agency discretion when there is "no law to apply" (quotation omitted)). The Government argues that § 1225 provides no standard by which to evaluate DHS's action in this case. Stay Mot. at 8–9.

Once again, Supreme Court precedent undercuts the Government's argument. Even a statute that "leave[s] much to [an agency's] discretion" does not necessarily "leave [that] discretion unbounded." Dep't of Commerce, 139 S. Ct. at 2567–68 (holding a statute granting the Secretary of Commerce broad discretion to take the census "in such form and content as he may determine" did not commit the decision to reinstate a citizenship question to the Secretary's discretion (quotation omitted)). So too here. Section 1225(b)(2)(C) certainly confers discretion, but there is no reason to think that discretion is infinite—just as there is no reason to think the discretion extends beyond the bounds of individualized, case-by-case determinations to begin with. And like the statute in Department of Commerce, which included provisions that meaningfully restrained the Secretary of Commerce, see 139 S. Ct. at 2568–69, § 1225 includes provisions restraining the DHS in this case. See § 1225(b)(1)(B)(iii)(IV) (an alien subject to expedited removal, but without a credible fear of persecution, "shall be detained pending a final determination of credible fear of persecution"); § 1225(b)(1)(B)(ii) (an alien with a credible fear of persecution "shall be detained for further consideration of the application for asylum"); § 1225(b)(1)(B)(iii)(IV) ("Any alien subject to the procedures under this clause shall be detained pending a final determination of credible fear of persecution and, if found not to have such a fear, until removed."); § 1225(b)(2)(C) (Attorney General "may return" an alien not subject to expedited removal as an alternative to detention). We conclude that this is not a "case in which there is no law to apply." Dep't of Commerce, 139 S. Ct. at 2569 (quotation omitted).

c.

The Government's final justiciability argument is that the MPP-termination decision is nothing more than a non-enforcement decision, unreviewable under Heckler v. Chaney, 470 U.S. 821 (1985). This argument fails for two reasons. The first is that the termination of MPP is more than a non-enforcement policy, just like the DACA program at issue in Regents and the DAPA program at issue in Texas. As the district court explained, the termination of MPP will necessarily lead to the release and parole of aliens into the United States. And that will "create affirmative benefits for aliens such as work authorization." D. Ct. Op. at 31; see also Texas, 809 F.3d at 167 ("Likewise, to be reviewable agency action, DAPA need not directly confer public benefits—removing a categorical bar on receipt of those benefits and thereby making a class of persons newly eligible for them 'provides a focus for judicial review.'" (quoting Chaney, 470 U.S. at 832)).

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

Second and independently, the termination of MPP was simply not a non-enforcement decision. MPP was a government program—replete with rules procedures and dedicated infrastructure. It is precisely because MPP was a government program—and much more than a non-enforcement decision—that the Government now claims that it will be difficult to resume it. See infra Part III. And the Government cites nothing to suggest that the elimination of a such a program can be dismissed as mere "non-enforcement." The Government therefore has failed to make a strong showing that the States' claims are non-justiciable.

B.

The Government next argues that it is likely to succeed on appeal because the June 1 Memorandum accords with federal law. The district court held otherwise on two independent grounds. First, the district court determined that the termination of MPP violated the APA because the June 1 Memorandum was arbitrary and capricious. D. Ct. Op. at 34–42. Second, the district court concluded that in "these particular circumstances," the termination violated 8 U.S.C. § 1225. Id. at 42–44 (emphasis removed). We hold the Government has not come close to showing that it is likely to succeed in challenging either conclusion, let alone both.

First, the APA. The APA directs courts to "hold unlawful and set aside agency action[s]" that are "arbitrary, capricious, an abuse of discretion, or otherwise not in accordance with law." 5 U.S.C. § 706(2). "The APA's arbitrary-and-capricious standard requires that agency action be reasonable and reasonably explained." FCC v. Prometheus Radio Project, 141 S. Ct. 1150, 1158 (2021). While applying this "deferential" standard, we must not

AMERICAN OVERSIGHT

"substitute" our "own policy judgment for that of the agency." Id. But we must ensure that "the agency has acted within a zone of reasonableness and, in particular, has reasonably considered the relevant issues and reasonably explained the decision." Id.; see also Motor Vehicle Mfrs. Ass'n of U.S., Inc. v. State Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 463 U.S. 29, 43 (1983) ("[T]he agency must examine the relevant data and articulate a satisfactory explanation for its action including a 'rational connection between the facts found and the choice made'" (quoting Burlington Truck Lines v. United States, 371 U.S. 156, 168 (1962))). "Put simply, we must set aside any action premised on reasoning that fails to account for 'relevant factors' or evinces 'a clear error of judgment.'" Univ. of Tex. M.D. Anderson Cancer Ctr. v. HHS, 985 F.3d 472, 475 (5th Cir. 2021) (quoting Marsh v. Or. Nat. Res. Council, 490 U.S. 360, 378 (1989)). This review "is not toothless." Sw. Elec. Power Co. v. United States Env't Prot. Agency, 920 F.3d 999, 1013 (5th Cir. 2019). And in all events, we can consider only the reasoning "articulated by the agency itself"; we cannot consider post hoc rationalizations. State Farm, 463 U.S. at 50; see also Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1909 ("An agency must defend its actions based on the reasons it gave when it acted.").

The Government has not shown a strong chance of success on appeal. That is because when terminating MPP in the June 1 Memorandum, the Secretary failed to consider several "relevant factors" and "'important aspect[s] of the problem.'" Michigan v. E.P.A., 576 U.S. 743, 750, 752 (2015) (quotations omitted); see also Regents, 140 S. Ct. at 1910. These include (a) the States' legitimate reliance interests, (b) MPP's benefits, (c) potential alternatives to MPP, and (d) § 1225's implications. These four omissions likely doom the Government's appeal. The Governments counterarguments (e) are unpersuasive.
