Dear Sheriffs Songer, Hargrove, Eberle, West, Johnson, Watts, Noel and Brown,

Sheriff Mack asked me to share this with you immediately.

CSPOA will join with Mike Lindell at the Moment of Truth Summit, August 20-21 in Springfield, MO

   https://frankspeech.com/momentoftruth

You are all invited. Travel expenses, food, and hotel will all be provided. Your airfare will be paid for or if you're driving, your gas will be reimbursed to/from Missouri.
Food and beverages will be provided throughout the entire event at the convention center.

We strongly encourage each of you to attend and hope you will participate in this very important Summit event.
Airline reservations and hotel accommodations need to be confirmed at the earliest possible convenience.

Venue: University Plaza Hotel and Convention Center

          333 S John Q. Hammons Parkway, Springfield, MO 65806

Lindell has blocks of hotel rooms already allocated at nearby hotels. It would be preferable to get all CSPOA's team in one block, so please let us know the earliest possible if you can make it.

 If you have any questions, please advise. Note, this is not a CSPOA event, so we do not have as much flexibility with the timeframe and other things. I will check on the details of airline reservations, but my guess is that you will be reimbursed once you reserve your flight and submit the invoice. There is a small airport, Springfield-Branson National airport about 6 miles from downtown Springfield.

Here is the program outline:

Events Scheduled From 9:00am to 9:00pm Saturday and Sunday

          Topics to be Covered:

          "How We Got Here" by Mike Lindell

          State by State Updates

          Premier of Lara Logan's movie Selection Code and Onstage Panel Discussion

          Expert Discussions

          Unveiling of New Evidence

          Calls to Action

          And Much, Much More

COVID-19 vaccine information breached in Europe

More hacking activity against the COVID-19 vaccine supply chain. More reports about cyber-operations in the Middle East. And the feds get a guilty plea in the Mirai botnet case. This is CyberScoop for Thursday, Dec. 10, 2020.

(Getty Images)

Pfizer-BioNTech vaccine is a target for hackers

The European Medicines Agency (EMA), which is currently helping to roll out two coronavirus vaccines, has been hit by hackers, the organization said Wednesday. Attackers successfully accessed "some documents relating to the regulatory submission for Pfizer and BioNTech's COVID-19 vaccine candidate," according to a BioNTech statement. A spokesperson for Moderna, another company working with the EMA on a vaccine candidate, told CyberScoop the firm had not been informed it was affected by the breach. It's just the latest hacking effort aimed at entities working on coronavirus research, as nation-states and criminals alike seek to steal valuable intellectual property or undermine confidence in vaccines. Shannon Vavra has more.

Coordinating a successful identity governance plan
Identity is the fabric of our digital economy, and executives from the private and public sectors are focusing on how to manage and govern identity and access across the lines of business within their organizations. Cyber leaders from Deloitte discuss why identity management has emerged as a core element to strengthening cybersecurity and how leaders can protect their most exploitable vulnerability. Listen to the conversation.

Al Jazeera anchor files suit in alleged hack-and-leak

An Al Jazeera anchor, Ghada Oueiss, is alleging in a U.S. federal court that the crown princes of Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates helped to coordinate a hack-and-leak operation intended to intimidate and disparage her. The civil lawsuit, filed Wednesday in Miami, says the scheme centered on disseminating manipulated financial documents and photos of the journalist, who has been critical of both countries' alleged human rights abuses. The campaign against her included a breach of her iPhone, court documents say. It's one of several suits filed in the last several years involving journalists and dissidents allegedly ensnarled in nation-state cyber-operations meant to intimidate or silence. Shannon has the court documents.

MoleRATs group tunnels around the Middle East

An Arabic-speaking hacking group known for exploiting current events to spy on officials in the West Bank is now using Facebook and Dropbox to cover its tracks, security firm Cybereason said Wednesday. MoleRATs isn't alone in this regard. Digital sleuths are increasingly using legitimate tech to avoid detection. Sean Lyngaas has the details.

The 6 pillars of zero trust and where to start
IT leaders are coming to terms with the need to apply zero-trust cybersecurity principles not just to their network operations, but to their entire IT operations. However, the challenge for most agencies is how to map out and deploy a zero-trust approach across an entire digital estate, given the scale and scope of the task. A recent Microsoft report aims to help agency executives tackle the questions of where and how to start deploying zero-trust principles. Read more on zero-trust.

Mirai botnet suspect pleads guilty. Remember that one?

The U.S. announced that an unnamed defendant has pleaded guilty in connection with a cyberattack that rocked the internet in 2016. The October 2016 distributed denial-of-service attack affected Dyn, an internet infrastructure company, before rippling out to cause outages for sites including Twitter, Netflix, Spotify, AirBnb and Reddit, among others. The incident had a resounding effect on the cybersecurity community when it occurred just weeks before the 2016 presidential election. Jeff Stone explains in more detail.

Zerologon, checkm8 discoveries, and more, win Pwnie Awards

The annual Pwnie Awards for "celebrating the achievements and failures of security researchers and the security community" were announced today at the virtual Black Hat Europe conference. Winners included the discovery of the " checkm8 " bug for jailbreaking Apple devices and the " Zerologon " attack allowing for credential spoofing within Microsoft's Netlogon protocol. The "Epic Achievement" award went to researcher Guang Gong for working out a method for remotely breaking into the root level of Android devices. Microsoft took home the "Most Epic Fail" award for a vulnerability in Windows 10 discovered by the NSA . See the full list of winners.

US, Australia partnering on virtual cyber range

U.S. Cyber Command recently announced that the U.S. and Australia are working together to continuously develop a virtual cyber training range. The Cyber Training Capabilities Project Arrangement will incorporate feedback from the Australian military into the Persistent Cyber Training Environment, Cyber Command's simulated training domain. Officials say the range is a new approach, given that similar efforts by U.S. and its allies in the past

More from the debate over the use of ID.me's facial recognition products by government agencies. A closer look at the tools used by the hackers who breached Iranian state TV. And another community college grapples with ransomware. This is CyberScoop for February 18. Editor's note: Due to Monday's federal holiday, our next issue will publish on February 22.

What's in a name

Identity verification technology company ID.me quietly deployed a powerful form of facial recognition on unemployment benefits applicants while encouraging state partners to dispel the idea that the company used the technology, according to Oregon state records that the American Civil Liberties Union shared with CyberScoop. Privacy advocates say the documents raise concerns about whether states knew what kind of risk ID.me's fraud detection technology held. But ID.me says it fully communicated with states over the differences in its fraud detection and verification systems. Tonya Riley takes a look at how states are dealing with revelations about the company.

New technical details from the Iranian state TV hack

An Iranian state television broadcast was hacked Jan. 27, during which a video showed opposition figures and called for the death of the Iranian supreme leader. A group called "Predatory Sparrow" claimed responsibility, without proof, and the hack was just one in a series of incidents seemingly aimed at embarrassing the Iranian government. Check Point Research obtained some of the malware associated with the hack, finding that the incident may have been more destructive than initially assumed. AJ Vicens has more.

Not all was lost in ransomware incident at college

A ransomware attack took out a Seattle-area community college's website and some other services this week, but the incident was relatively contained because the institution recently has moved a lot of its digital infrastructure to a cloud-based platform, officials said. "While the attack is clearly challenging and disruptive, we're in a better place to combat it due to changes we implemented over the last two years," Centralia College President Bob Mohrbacher said. Last week a Northern California community college also dealt with a ransomware incident. EdScoop's Emily Bamforth explains.

The SolarWinds attackers were clearly smart, and we're finding out more about it. The Biden administration fields questions about the breach almost immediately. And the new DNI officially gets underway. This is CyberScoop for Thursday, Jan. 21, 2020.

The remarkable opsec of the SolarWinds hackers

The spies who carried out the SolarWinds breaches were bound to cover their tracks. But they went above and beyond. New details from Microsoft's investigation show the lengths the attackers went to protect the crown jewel of the operation from getting burned. There's surely more to learn from the campaign, but this is a big piece of the puzzle. Sean Lyngaas has more.

Be sure to register early to get your pass for the 7th CyberWeek, taking place Oct 18th to the 22nd 2021.
U.S. CyberWeek is a week-long festival with over 10,000 attendees, featuring 100+ community events bringing together leaders from the cybersecurity community, tech, gov and policy who will come together to exchange information, share best practices and discuss the many ways we can revolutionize the way we protect against and overcome cyberthreats facing our nation. Save your spot today!

Biden's first SolarWinds question

WA-KLICKITAT-22-0904-A-000029

At the first White House press briefing of the Biden administration Wednesday evening, Press Secretary Jen Psaki's second question was on the SolarWinds breach. Psaki indicated the U.S. government may be interested in responding to the suspected Russian espionage operation, which has impacted federal agencies and the private sector. "We've spoken about this previously...of course we reserve the right to respond at a time and manner of our choosing to any cyberattack," Psaki told reporters. How the Biden administration reacts — or retaliates — to the campaign will be an early test of the Biden administration's cybersecurity chops. Our latest SolarWinds coverage.

Avril Haines confirmed

Avril Haines, the nominee for director of national intelligence, was confirmed Wednesday evening in the Senate. Haines, who is the first official Cabinet member of the Biden administration, told lawmakers during her confirmation hearing that she would provide Congress a threat assessment on QAnon as well as an unclassified intelligence report on who was responsible for the murder of journalist Jamal Khashoggi. Her testimony also touched on SolarWinds. More on Haines' thoughts on SolarWinds and cybersecurity.

Be sure to register early to get your pass for the 7th CyberWeek, taking place Oct 18th to the 22nd 2021.

that affected more than 9 million people between late 2013 and May 2015. The fine is for violations of privacy and security rules under the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act, according to the Department of Health and Human Services' Office for Civil Rights. The incident happened during an era known for high-profile data breaches — Target, Sony, Home Depot and so on — but the announcement of the fine comes as the feds are continuing to track multiple cyberthreats against health care organizations. Joe Warminsky has the story.

Social engineering gains momentum with cyber criminals

Cyber attackers are exploiting the COVID-19 crisis and pose a major security threat for health care organizations. According to Proofpoint's Ryan Witt, there is an uptick in social engineering techniques as threat actors look for more compelling lures to target people. Leaders need to be more focused on security strategies which provide visibility into who is being targeted in their organization. Read more from Witt.

A big 'oops' from a phishing campaign

A phishing campaign that targeted multiple industrial sectors in 2020 apparently was messier than the average cybercrime operation, according to cybersecurity company Check Point. The attackers made a "simple mistake in their attack chain," the researchers said, by not securing the pilfered information properly once it was uploaded to websites for temporary storage. In short, not only did people have their email credentials stolen, but they were also posted in a way that Google's search engine could publicly index them. The slip-up could've undermined the attackers' plans in several ways. Joe explains.
